

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. REPORTS OF THE DECISIONS

OF THE

FEBRUARY TERM, 1816.

NEGRESS SALLY HENRY, by WILLIAM HENRY, her father and next friend,
v.
BALL.

The act of assembly of Maryland, prohibiting the importation of slaves into that state for sale or to reside, does not extend to a temporary residence, nor to an importation by a hirer or person other than the master or owner of such slave.

ERROR on judgment, rendered by the Circuit Court for the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, against the plaintiff, who was in that court a petitioner for freedom.

The plaintiff being a child, and the slave of the defendant, who resided in Virginia, was, 2*] some short *time before the month of May, 1810, put to live with Mrs. Rankin, then residing also in Virginia, whose husband was an officer in the marine corps, stationed in the city of Washington. Mrs. R. was to keep the girl for a year, and was to give her victuals and clothes for her services. Some time in May, 1810, Mrs. R. removed to Washington, and brought the petitioner with her, whether with or without the permission of Mr. Ball is entirely uncertain. It was probably, though not certainly, with his knowledge. In October, 1810, Mr. Ball married, and soon after took the petitioner into his possession and carried her home, he then residing in Virginia. Mrs. R. gave her up, being of opinion, though the girl had remained with her only seven or eight months, that she was bound to give her up when required by her master. Mr. B. afterwards removed himself into the city, and brought the petitioner with him. Upon this testimony the counsel for the petitioner prayed the court below to instruct the jury that if they believed, from the evidence, that the defendant knew of the intended importation of the petitioner by Mrs. R., and did not object to it, then such importation entitled the petitioner to her freedom; and, further, that it was competent to the jury to infer, from his knowing of the importation, and not objecting to it, that such Wheat. 1.

importation was made with his consent. This instruction the court refused to give; but did instruct the jury that if they should be of opinion that Mrs. R. was, at the time she brought the petitioner into the city of Washington, a citizen of the United States coming into the city of Washington *with a bona fide intention [*3 of settling therein, then her importation of said slave was lawful, and did not entitle the petitioner to her freedom, whether the said importation were or were not made with the consent of the defendant. An exception was taken to this opinion, and the jury having found a verdict for the defendant, on which judgment was rendered by the court, the cause was brought into this court by writ of error.

Key, for the plaintiff in error, and petitioner, cited the act of the assembly of Maryland of 1796, c. 87, s. 1, 2, contending that its true construction applied only to bona fide owners, and not to bailees or hirers.

Law, contra, stated that the domicile of the owner had been in Virginia, and that she was a bona fide emigrant from that state. Being a hirer of the slave, she was pro hac vice owner.¹ The act of assembly must be construed to refer to both species of property, qualified and absolute. He referred to the 6th section of the act to show that a property may be, in slaves, limited in point of time.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court, and after stating the facts, proceeded as follows:

This cause depends on an act of the state of Maryland, which is in force in the county of Washington. The first section of that statute enacts, *that it shall not be lawful to [*4 bring into this state any negro, mulatto, or other slave, for sale, or to reside within this state; and any person brought into this state contrary to this act, if a slave before, shall, thereupon, immediately cease to be the property of the person or persons so importing or bringing such slaves within this state, and shall be free." The 2d section contains a proviso in favor of citizens of the United States coming into this state with a bona fide intention of settling therein, and bringing slaves with them.

1.—2 Black. Com., 254, and the civil law writers there cited.

The 4th section enacts, that "nothing in this act contained shall be construed or taken to affect the right of any person or persons traveling or sojourning with any slave or slaves within this state, such slave or slaves not being sold or otherwise disposed of in this state, but carried by the owner out of the state, or attempted to be carried."

This act appears to the court not to comprehend the case now under consideration. The expressions of that part of the first section which prohibits the importation of slaves, are restricted to cases of importation "for sale or to reside in this state." The petitioner was obviously not imported for sale, nor is the court of opinion that the short time for which she was to continue with Mrs. Rankin can satisfy the words "to reside within this state." The legislature must have intended to prohibit a general residence, not a special limited residence, where the slave is to remain for that portion of the year for which she was hired that still remained.

If on this point the first section of the act could be thought doubtful, the fourth section §* seems to remove that doubt. It declares that "nothing in the act contained shall be construed or taken to affect the right of any person traveling or sojourning with any slave or slaves within this state, such slave or slaves not being sold or otherwise disposed of in this state, but carried by the owner out of this state, or attempted to be carried."

This section sufficiently explains the residence contemplated by the legislature in the first section. The term "sojourning" means something more than "traveling," and applies to a temporary, as contradistinguished from a permanent residence. The court is also of opinion, that the act contemplates and punishes an importation or bringing into the state by the master or owner of the slave. This construction, in addition to its plain justice, is supported by the words of the first section. That section declares, that "a person brought into this state as a slave contrary to this act, if a slave before, shall, thereupon, cease to be the property of the person or persons so importing or bringing such slave within this state, and shall be free." It is apparent that the legislature had in view the case of a slave brought by the owner, since it is the property of the person importing the slave which is forfeited.

Upon the best consideration we have been able to give this statute, the court is unanimously of opinion that the petitioner acquired no right to freedom by having been brought into the county of Washington by Mrs. Rankin for one year's service, she having been in the course of the year carried back to Virginia by her master.

§*] The Circuit Court appears to have considered the case as coming within the proviso of the 2d section. If in this opinion that court were even to be thought mistaken, the error does not injure the petitioner, and is, therefore, no cause for reversal. The court is unanimously of opinion that the judgment ought to be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

NEGRO JOHN DAVIS ET AL. v. WOOD.

Evidence by hearsay and general reputation is admissible only as to pedigree, but not to establish the freedom of the petitioner's ancestor, and thence to deduce his or her own.

Verdicts are evidence between parties and privies only; and a record proving the ancestor's freedom to have been established in a suit against another party by whom the petitioner was sold to the present defendant, is inadmissible evidence to prove the petitioner's freedom.

THIS case was similar to the preceding, in which the petitioners excepted to the opinion of the court below: 1st. That they had offered to prove, by competent witnesses, that they (the witnesses) had heard old persons, now dead, declare, that a certain Mary Davis, now dead, was a white woman, born in England, and such was the general report in the neighborhood where she lived; and also offered the same kind of testimony to prove that Susan *Davis, mother of the petitioners, was lineally descended, in the female line, from the said Mary; and it was admitted that said Susan was, at the time of petitioning, free, and acting, in all respects, as a free woman; which evidence, by hearsay and general reputation, the court refused to admit, except so far as it was applicable to the fact of the petitioner's pedigree. 2d. That they having proved that the petitioners are the children of Susan Davis, and that she is the same person named in a certain record in a cause wherein Susan Davis and her daughter Ary were petitioners against Caleb Swan, and recovered their freedom, the plaintiffs offered to read said record in evidence to the jury, as prima facie testimony that they are descendants in the female line from a free woman, who was born free, and are of free condition, connected with the fact that the defendant in this cause sold said Susan to Swan, the defendant in said record, which the court refused to suffer the petitioners to read to the jury as evidence in this cause.

Lee, for the plaintiffs in error, and petitioners, referred to the opinion of the court (DUVALL, J., dissenting) in the case of Mima Queen and Child v. Hepburn, February Term, 1813, as to the admissibility of hearsay evidence in a similar case, remarking that unless the court was disposed to review its decision, it must be taken for law, and he could not deny its authority.

DUVALL, J. The petitioners in that case were descended from a yellow woman, a native of South *America. In this case they are [*8 descended from a white woman.

Lee cited the opinion of the Virginia Court of Appeals, in the case of Pegram v. Isabel,¹ as to the admissibility of the record, in which a record was admitted.

Key, contra, contended, that both grounds were irrevocably closed against the other party. The first certainly; and the second equally so; as the evidence could not be admissible as prima facie testimony merely, but if admitted must be conclusive. The decisions in the state courts of Virginia are against the evidence of the parent's or other ancestor's freedom being conclusive in favor of a child. The case of Pegram

v. Touzel is no authority here, for it was formerly considered and repudiated by this court in the decision alluded to.

Lee and Law replied, and cited 2 Washington's Rep. 64., and Swift's Law of Evidence, 18.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court, and stated that, as to the first exception, the court had revised its opinion in the case of Mima Queen and Child v. Hepburn, and confirmed it. As to the second exception, the record was not between the same parties. The rule is, that verdicts are evidence between parties⁹ ties and privies. The court does not feel inclined to enlarge the exceptions to this general rule, and, therefore, the judgment of the court below is affirmed.

[INSTANCE COURT.]

THE SAMUEL.

PIERCE AND BEACH, Claimants.

Prosecutions under the non-importation laws are causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and the proceeding may be by libel in the admiralty.

Technical nicety is not required in such proceedings; it is sufficient if the offense be described in the words of the law, and so set forth that, if the allegation be true, the case must be within the statute.

That the deponent is a seaman on board a gun-boat in a certain harbor, and liable to be ordered to some other place, and not to be able to attend the court at the time of its sitting, is not a sufficient reason for taking his deposition de bene esse under the judiciary act of 1789.

Where the evidence is so contradictory and ambiguous as to render a decision difficult, the court will order further proof in a revenue or instance cause.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court for the Rhode Island District. The brig Samuel sailed from St. Bartholomews, an island belonging to His Majesty the King of Sweden, in the month of November, 1811, with a cargo consisting of rum, molasses, and some other articles, and arrived in Newport, Rhode Island, on the 8th of the following December, where the vessel and cargo were seized and libeled in the District Court as being forfeited to the United States, under the act of Congress prohibiting the importation¹⁰ of articles the growth, produce or manufacture of Great Britain or France, their colonies or dependencies. The vessel and cargo were claimed by John Pierce and George Beach, both citizens of the United States. The District Court condemned both vessel and cargo. The Circuit Court condemned the vessel and the rum, but restored the residue of the cargo. From the sentence of the Circuit Court both the libelants and the claimants appealed to this court.

Daggett, for the claimants, made three points:

1st. The proceedings ought to have been at common law, and not in the admiralty.

2d. The information is insufficient.

3d. The testimony was insufficient to warrant a condemnation.

1. The act of the 1st of March, 1809, on which this libel is founded, directs, that the penalties and forfeitures "shall be sued for, prosecuted and recovered, with the costs of Wheat. 1.

suit, by action of debt, indictment, or information." The cases under the authority of which this proceeding was brought are The Vengeance,¹ *The Sally*² and The Betsey and Charlotte.³ But the act under which the Vengeance was prosecuted was the same with the collection law of the 2d of March, 1799, section 89, which prescribed a proceeding in the admiralty; the Sally was prosecuted under the slave-trade act of the 23d of March, 1794, which indicates no particular proceeding; *whilst The [*11 Betsey and Charlotte was prosecuted under the act of non-intercourse with St. Domingo, of the 28th of February, 1806, wherein no method of recovering the penalties was specified. Supposing this to be a civil cause of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and that the District Court has jurisdiction of it as such, the proceedings may still be by information, as in the exchequer. Where a statute prescribes a particular remedy, or particular remedies, no other can be pursued.⁴ 2. The statute is penal, and requires strictly accurate proceedings. The libel alleges, generally, that the cargo was laden on board in some foreign port. The cargo was stated to have belonged, in the alternative or disjunctive, to Pierce and Beach, or to one Stillman, or some other citizen, or consigned to one of said parties; and it was alleged that the offense was committed with "the knowledge of the owner, or of the master."⁵ 3. The testimony of Oldham, a witness in the cause, was taken irregularly, and not used in the court below. The vessel and cargo were condemned upon the testimony of tasters only, against all the oral and documentary evidence. This testimony is novel; professional men and artists are credible witnesses in their own peculiar science or art; but this is matter of speculative opinion only not of known art or certain science. The witnesses can never be made responsible for perjury. Their evidence is contradicted.

The Attorney-General, for the libelants. 1. The *cargo could not have been the [*12 produce of St. Bartholomews, a sterile and unproductive island, used as St. Eustatius was during the war of the American revolution. It is more likely it was transhipped from a British than a Spanish colony; and, therefore, the claim is clouded with improbability. The case of *The Odin*⁶ may be invoked from the law of prize to show how little the fairest documentary evidence is to be regarded in comparison with the evidentia rei. Strip off this veil, and the onus is thrown upon the claimants, from which they cannot relieve themselves but by the strongest positive testimony. As to the evidence of the tasters, all our knowledge is derived through the senses. It is not unerring, but weighty; and the revenue laws rely upon it in collecting the duties on wines. The spirit and equity of the judiciary act of the 24th of September, 1789, were pursued in taking the deposition of Oldham; he was a seaman serving in the flotilla of gun-boats at Newport, and liable to be ordered to some other place. 2. It is novel doctrine that this is a libel as contradistinguished from an information. It is a libel in the nature of an information; and the process of information is used in the admiralty as well as in the exchequer. In alleging the offense, reasonable certainty only was necessary; the charge is insufficiently specific to have put the claimants on their guard; and to require more would be to prevent the conviction of offenders. The case of The Bolina does not apply to the present question.

13*] *Daggett, in reply. The deposition of Oldham cannot be admitted, unless it be authorized by statute or common law; prize proceedings are peculiar; soldiers and sailors are not excepted by the letter of the judiciary act, and a class of exceptions cannot be implied. The burthen of proof in fiscal causes is not thrown on the claimants unless by positive law. There can be no difficulty in convicting offenders, as these proceedings are amendable.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the part of the claimants it is contended, 1st. That the proceedings ought to have been at common law, and not in the admiralty. 2d. That the information, if it be one, is insufficient. 3d. That the testimony is wholly insufficient to warrant a condemnation.

In arguing the first point, the counsel for the claimants endeavored to take this case out of 14*] the *principle laid down in The Vengeance, and in other cases resting on the authority of that decision, by urging a difference of phraseology in the acts of Congress. In that part of the act on which this prosecution is founded which gives the remedy, it is enacted, "that all penalties and forfeitures, arising under, or incurred by virtue of this act, may be sued for, prosecuted, and recovered, with costs of suit, by action of debt, in the name of the United States of America, or by indictment or information, in any court having competent jurisdiction to try the same." Debt, indictment, and information, are said to be technical terms designating common law remedies, and, consequently, marking out the courts of common law as the tribunals in which alone prosecutions under this act can be sustained. There would be much force in this argument if the term "information" were exclusively applicable to a proceeding at common law.* But the court is of opinion that it has no such exclusive application. A libel on a seizure, in its terms and in its essence, is an information. Consequently, where the cause is of admiralty jurisdiction, and the proceeding is by information, the suit is not withdrawn, by the nature of the remedy, from the jurisdiction to which it otherwise belongs.

2d. The second objection made by the claimants to these proceedings is, that though the words of the act may be satisfied by a libel in the nature of an information, yet the same strictness which is required in an information at common law will be necessary to sustain a libel in the nature of an information in the court of admiralty; and that, testing the libel by this rule, it is totally insufficient. The court *is not of opinion that all those [15 technical niceties which the astuteness of ancient judges and lawyers has introduced into criminal proceedings at common law, and which time and long usage have sanctioned, are to be engrafted into proceedings in the courts of admiralty. These niceties are not already established, and the principles of justice do not require their establishment. It is deemed sufficient that the offense be described in the words of the law, and be so described that if the allegation be true the case must be within the statute. This libel does so describe the offense, and is, therefore, deemed sufficient.

3d. The third and material inquiry respects the evidence. Is this cargo of British origin?

In the examination of this question, the first point to be decided is the admissibility of the deposition of Thomas Oldham. That deposition is found in the record of the Circuit Court, with a certificate annexed to it, in these words: "N. B.—The deposition of Thomas Oldham was filed after the trial of the case, by order of the court." Some of the judges are of opinion that this certificate of the clerk is to be disregarded, and that the deposition, being inserted in the record, must be considered as a part of it, and must be supposed to have formed a part of the evidence when the decree was made; but the majority of the court is of a different opinion. The certificate of the clerk to the deposition is thought of equal validity as if forming a part of his general certificate. It shows that this deposition formed no part of the cause in the Circuit Court, and is, therefore, liable to every exception which [16 could be made to it, if it was not found in the record, and was now offered for the first time to this court. On inspection it appears to be a deposition taken before a single magistrate, not on order of court on a commission, with notice to the attorney of the claimant, who did not attend. It must be sustained by the act of Congress, or it is inadmissible. The reason assigned for taking it is, "that the deponent is a seaman on board a gun-boat of the United States, in the harbor of Newport, and liable to be ordered to some other place, and not to be able to attend the court at the time of its sitting." The 30th section of the judiciary act directs, that "the mode of proof by oral testimony, and the examination of witnesses in open court, shall be the same in all the courts of the United States." The act then proceeds to enumerate cases in which depositions may be taken de bene esse. The liability of the witness to be ordered out of the reach of the court is not one of the causes deemed sufficient by the law for taking a deposition de bene esse. In such case there would seem to be a propriety in applying to the court for its aid. But, supposing this objection not to be so fatal as some of the judges think it, still the deposition is taken de bene esse, not in chief; and a deposition so taken can be read only when the witness himself is unattainable. It does not appear in this case that the witness was not within the reach of the court, and might not have given his testimony in open court, as is required by law. Had this deposition been offered in court before, or at the time of the trial, and used without objection, the inference [17*] *that the requisites of the law were complied with, or waived, might have been justifiably drawn. But the party is not necessarily in court after his cause is decided, and is not bound to know the fact that this deposition was ordered to be filed. For these reasons it is the opinion of a majority of the court that the deposition of Thomas Oldham ought not to be considered as forming any part of the testimony in this cause.

1.—1 Gallison, 22. Anonymous.

The decision cited by the counsel applies only to the power of the Circuit Court to allow amendments in revenue causes or proceedings in rem, before appeal to the Supreme Court. But it may be interesting to the reader to be informed that the Supreme Court may remand the cause to the court below, with instructions to amend the proceedings. Thus, in the cases of The Caroline and The Emily, at February term, 1813, which were informations in rem on the slave-trade act of the 22d of March, 1794, the opinion of the court was, that the evidence was sufficient to show a breach of the law, but that the libel was not sufficiently certain to authorize a decree of condemnation. The following decree was therefore entered: "It is the opinion of the court that the libel is too imperfectly drawn to found a sentence of condemnation thereon. The sentence of the Circuit Court is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded to the said Circuit Court with directions to admit the libel to be amended." Vide infra, The Edward.

The deposition of Oldham being excluded, the prosecution rests chiefly on the depositions of Benjamin Fry and William S. Allen. These witnesses are both experienced dealers in rum; have both tasted and examined the rum of this cargo, and are both of the opinion that it is of British origin. In the opinion of all the judges this testimony is entitled to great respect. The witnesses say that there is a clear difference between the flavor of rum of the British and the Spanish islands, though they do not attempt to describe that difference, and that their opinion is positive that this is British rum.

To weaken the force of this testimony, the claimants have produced the depositions of several witnesses, also dealers in rum, who declare that the difference in the flavor of the best Spanish rum and that of the British islands, is inconsiderable, and that they cannot distinguish the one from the other; that they believe the best judges find great difficulty in making the discrimination. This testimony would, perhaps, have been entitled to more influence had the persons giving it tasted the rum imported in the Samuel, and declared [18*] themselves incapable of deciding *on its origin; for, although in some cases the difference may be nearly imperceptible, in others it may be considerable. The testimony, however, on which the claimants most rely is found in the deposition of Samuel Marshall and of Andrew Furnrad. Samuel Marshall, the brother of John and Joseph Marshall, merchants of St. Bartholomews, from whom the rum in question was purchased, deposes, that he has lived with them for two years, and had, at the time of giving his deposition, they being absent from the island, the care of their business. That the rum and molasses constituting the cargo of the Samuel were imported into St. Bartholomews from La Guira, in vessels which he names, and are of the growth and produce of that place. Andrew Furnrad is the collector of the port of Gustavia in St. Bartholomews, and deposes, that the quantity of rum and molasses which were laden on board the Samuel, and which cleared out regularly for New London, were regularly imported from La Guira in two vessels, which he names, whose masters he also names. They are the same that are mentioned by Samuel Marshall.

On this conflicting testimony much contrariety of opinion has taken place. The omission of the claimants to furnish other testimony supposed to have been within their reach, and of which the necessity would seem to have been suggested by the nature of the prosecution, impairs, in the opinion of several of the judges, the weight to which their positive testimony might otherwise be entitled. The court finds it very difficult to form an opinion satisfactory to itself. *So situated, and under [*19] the peculiar circumstances attending Oldham's deposition, the majority of the court is of opinion that the cause be continued to the next term for further proof, which each party is at liberty to produce.

THE SHIP OCTAVIA.

NICHOLLS ET AL., Claimants.

A question of fact under the non-intercourse act of the 28th of June, 1809.

APPEAL from the decree of the Circuit Court for the Massachusetts District, affirming the decree of the District Court condemning said vessel.

This ship was seized in the port of Boston, in October, 1810, and the information alleges that the ship, in March, 1810, departed from Charleston, S. C., bound for a foreign port, to wit, Liverpool in Great Britain, with a cargo of merchandise on board, without a clearance, and without having given the bond required by the non-intercourse act of the 28th of June, 1809, ch. 9, s. 3. The claimants admitted, that the ship proceeded with her cargo (which consisted of cotton and rice) to Liverpool; but they

1.—Revenue causes are, in their nature, causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. In Great Britain all appeals from the vice-admiralty courts in those causes are within the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty, and not of the privy council, which is the appellate tribunal in other plantation causes. This point was determined so long ago as the year 1754, in the case of The Vrow Dorothea, decided before the High Court of Delegates, which was an appeal from the vice-admiralty judge of South Carolina to the High Court of Admiralty, and thence to the delegates. The appellate jurisdiction was contested upon the ground that prosecutions for the breach of the navigation and other revenue laws were not, in their nature, causes civil and maritime, and under the ordinary jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty, but that it was a jurisdiction specially given to the vice-admiralty courts by stat. 7 and 8, Wm. III. ch. 22, s. 6, which did not take any notice of the appellate jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty in such cases. The objection, however, was overruled by the delegates, and the determination has since received the unanimous concurrence of all the common law judges, on a reference to them from the privy council. The proceeding in this case is called "a libel of information;" showing that libel and information in the admiralty are synonymous terms. (2 Rob., 245, The Fabius.)

alleged that the ship originally sailed from Charleston, bound to Wiscasset, in the District of Maine, with an intention there to remain until the non-intercourse act should be repealed, and then to proceed to Liverpool. That by reason of bad winds and weather, the ship was retarded in her voyage, and on the 10th of May, 1810, while still bound to Wiscasset, she spoke with a ship from New York, and was informed of the expiration of the non-intercourse act, and thereupon changed her course, [*21] and "proceeded to Liverpool. The manifest states the cargo to have been shipped by sundries, consigned to Mr. P. Grant, Boston.

The Attorney-General and Law argued the case for the appellees on the facts, and cited the case of The Wasp,¹ which was an information under the same section of the same act. They contended that the burden of proof was thrown upon the claimant, inasmuch as the law requires a bond to be given, if the ship was bound to a port then permitted, conditioned that she should not go to a prohibited port.

Dexter, for the appellants and claimants, stated, that the suit was not founded on the same act with that in the case of The Samuel,² but that the same objection existed as to the form of the process. It is true, the judiciary act of the 24th of September, 1789, c. 20, s. 9, has declared that certain causes shall be causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, but it does not, therefore, follow that a forfeiture created by a new statute shall be enforced by the same process. The arguments urged against it in the cases subsequent to that of The Vengeance,³ have always been answered by the mere authority of that case. But the decision in that case ought to be re-examined, because it affects the right of trial by jury, and because the argument was very imperfect. The word "including," in the judiciary act, ought to be construed cumulatively. It provides that the district courts shall "have exclusive [*22] original cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, including all seizures under laws of impost, navigation, or trade, of the United States, where the seizures are made on waters which are navigable from the sea by vessels of ten or more tons burthen, within their respective districts, as well as upon the high seas," &c. The presumption arising from the collective use of debt, information, and indictment, in the non-intercourse act, is, that they relate to a common law jurisdiction. The word information cannot be synonymous with libel, because the first is a common law, the second a civil law proceeding. A common law proceeding may be applied by statute to admiralty suits. The statute 28th Henry VIII., c. 15, prescribes a common law process (indictment) for offenses triable in the admiralty.

STORY, J. That was the High Commission Court.

Dexter answered that he was aware of it, but that a suit may be a cause of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and yet triable by common law process.⁴

*STORY, J., delivered the opinion of [*23] the court.

This case depends on a mere question of fact. After a careful examination of the evidence, the majority of the court are of opinion, that the decree of the Circuit Court ought to be affirmed. It is deemed unnecessary to enter into a formal statement of the grounds of this opinion, as it is principally founded upon the same reasoning which was adopted by the Circuit Court in the decree which is spread before us in the transcript of the record.

4.—Before the statute 28th Henry VIII., c. 15, the admiralty had a very extensive criminal jurisdiction, which seems to have been coeval with the very existence of the tribunal, in which it proceeded according to the civil law, and other its own peculiar codes; but by the process of indictment found by a grand jury, and a captas thereupon delivered by the admiral or his lieutenant, to the marshal of the court, or the sheriff. (See Clerk's Praxis, Rough-ton's Article cited therein, 122 note, c. 16, 17. Ex-ton, 32. Seiden de Dominio Maris, l. 2, c. 24, p. 209. 4 Rob., 73.) Note (a), The Rucker. This criminal jurisdiction, independent of statutes, still exists; and all offenses within it, which are not otherwise provided for by positive law, are punishable by fine and imprisonment. (See 4 Black. Com., 233. Brown's Civ. & Adm. Law, Appendix, No. 111.) The statute 28th Henry VIII., c. 15, provides, that all treasons, felonies, &c., on the seas, or where the admiral hath jurisdiction, &c., shall be tried, &c., in the realm, as if done on land; and commissions under the great seal shall be directed to the admiral or his lieutenant, and three or four others, &c., to hear and determine such offenses, after the course of the laws of this land for like offenses done in the realm. And the jury shall be of the shire within the commission. (Stat. 34 Geo. III., c. 46.) Under this provision the sessions at the Old Bailey are now held, at which the judge of the High Court of Admiralty presides, and common law judges are included in the commission. But it is held that this statute does not alter the nature of the offense, which shall still be determined by the civil law, but the manner of trial only. (Hale's P. C. 3 Inst., 112.)

5.—As the opinion of the court below is referred to for the grounds upon which its decree was affirmed, it may seem fit here to insert so much of that opinion as develops the principles and rules of evidence applied by the court in cases of this nature.

After stating the facts of this case, the learned judge proceeds: "Since I have had the honor to sit in this court I have prescribed to myself certain rules, by the application of which my judgment, in cases of this nature, has been uniformly governed. [*24] 1st. Where the claimants assume the onus probandi (as they do in this case) not to acquit the property unless the defense be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. 2d. If the evidence of the claimants be clear and precisely in point, not to indulge in vague and indeterminate suspicions, but to pronounce an acquittal, unless that evidence be clouded with incredibility, or encountered by strong presumptions of malitia fides, from the other circumstances of the case." He also alludes to the absence of documentary evidence as affording an example of the application of these rules, as well as of another rule equally important. "What strikes me as decisive against the defense is the entire absence of all documents respecting the cargo. Bills of lading, letters of advice, or general orders, must have existed. If the cargo had been destined for Boston only, there would not have been so much difficulty. But the defense shows its destination ultimately for Liverpool. Where, then, is the contract of affreightment, the bills of lading, the letters of advice, and the correspondence of the shippers, or of Mr. P

THE MARY AND SUSAN.

G. & H. VAN WAGENEN, Claimants.

Where goods were shipped in the enemy's country, in pursuance of orders from this country received before the declaration of war, but previous to the execution of the orders, the shippers became embarrassed, and assigned the goods to certain bankers to secure advances made by them, with a request to the consignees to remit the amount to them (the bankers), and they also repeated the same request, the invoice being for account and risk of the consignees, but stating the goods to be then the property of the bankers. It was held that the goods having been purchased and shipped in pursuance of orders from the consignees, the property was originally vested in them, and was not devested by the intermediate assignment, which was merely intended to transfer the right to the debt due from the consignees.

A PPEAL from the Circuit Court for the District of New York. The goods in question were part of the cargo of the ship Mary and Susan, a merchant vessel of the United States, which was captured on the 3d of September, 1812, by the Tickler, a private armed vessel of the United States. The cargo was libeled as prize of war; this portion claimed by Messrs. G. & H. Van Wageningen, and condemned in the District Court. In the Circuit Court this sentence was reversed, and restitution to the claimants was ordered; from which decree the captors appealed to this court. The cause having been heard in both the courts below, on the documentary evidence found on board, the original order for the goods does not appear. That they were shipped in consequence of 26*] *orders is, however, sufficiently proved by the letters addressed to the claimants, and the other papers which accompanied them. These are: 1. An invoice headed in the words following:

"Messrs. G. & H. VAN WAGENEN:

"GENTLEMEN—In consequence of the revocation of the British orders in council, on the first day of August next, we have lost no time in shipping the goods sent to Liverpool so long since, agreeable to your kind order. They are in the Mary and Susan, a most beautiful new vessel, to sail in all this week; the freights are very high, 70s. for measurement to New York, and 80s. to Philadelphia, and at this moment nothing less will be taken. We, therefore, thought you would prefer to have the goods at this rate, rather than wait for a reduction in the freight, which, we doubt not, will soon take place. By the letter of our friends, Messrs. Spooner, Atwood & Co., herewith, you will perceive the interruption to commerce has been an inconvenience to us as young merchants; but the unneighborly conduct of the old house will only serve to prompt us to new exertion for our friends in the States, for whose interest nothing shall be omitted within our power. We shall certainly serve them as well, if not on better terms, than heretofore. We will not be undersold. In a few days we shall send Mr. Oakley, for the use of our friends, a new and complete set of patterns, which, we trust, will meet with their approbation. Mr. O. and Messrs. B. W. Rogers & Co.

Grant? Can it be credible that, without any authority, the master, or part owner of the ship should, on their own responsibility, have gone to Liverpool without orders or consignment? That from a mere vague knowledge of the wishes of the shippers, they should place at imminent risk the whole property, without written authority to color their proceedings? There must have been papers. They are Wheat. 1.

not produced. The affidavits of the shippers of Mr. Grant, of the consignees in England, are not produced. What must be the conclusion from this general silence? It must be, that if produced, they would not support the asserted defense. At least, such is the judgment that both the common law and the admiralty law pronounce in cases of suppression of evidence."

will be able to give you more particulars respecting what has passed on this side. The amount of invoice herewith to your debt is £820 2 1, which, agreeable to the letter of Messrs. Spooner, Attwood & Co., you will please to remit to them on arrival of the goods: 28*] but hereafter things will move in the usual channel. Waiting your further favors,

We remain, gentlemen,

Your most obedient servants,

"Birmingham, 9th July, 1812.

"Messrs. G. & H. VAN WAGENEN,

Merchants, New York:

"GENTLEMEN—In consequence of the late unfortunate state of affairs between this country and the United States of America, great inconvenience and distress have naturally been experienced by the merchants and manufacturers here. Among others, our friends Messrs. Daniel Cross & Co. have been considerably embarrassed, and have received great relief and assistance from our house. We were induced to extend this assistance, as bankers, from motives of friendship and regard, and under the hope that the unnatural state of affairs between the two countries could not possibly last long, but as it was necessary that our assistance should be very considerable, we thought it right to obtain from them an assignment of certain quantities of goods which they had provided on account of your house, and of several others in the United States, previous to the 2d of February, 1811. We are thus introduced to your acquaintance, and we beg leave to send you herewith an invoice of the goods which Messrs. Daniel Cross & Co. had purchased for your account, and which are now forwarded to you, requesting that you will remit the amount, £820 2 2, to us at your earliest convenience. We cannot conclude this letter without expressing our satisfaction at the services we have had the opportunity of rendering to Messrs. Daniel Cross & Co., whom we consider to be persons of the greatest integrity and knowledge of business, and without earnestly recommending them to your future attention. We are convinced that their late difficulties will not at all affect their future proceedings, and that they will henceforth be enabled to carry on their business in the same regular and punctual way as they have formerly done; and we cannot but flatter ourselves, that as the orders in council are now revoked, and the British government has become alive to the true interest of the British people, the natural relations between the two countries will long continue, and that the connection between your respectable house and Messrs. Daniel Cross & Co. will be productive of permanent and mutual advantages. With best wishes for your prosperity and happiness, and that of your country,

"We are, respectfully, gentlemen,

"Your obedient humble servants,

"SPOONER, ATTWOOD & Co.,

"Bankers, Birmingham.

Merchants, New York."

29*) *Hoffman, for the appellants and captors. 1st. Probably a delivery from Cross & Co. to the ship-master would have been, in contemplation of law, a delivery to the claimants. But Attwood & Co. were the shippers, between whom and the claimants there was no privity. There is no proof that Cross & Co. ever accepted the order or commission sent to them by the claimants. There was a sale and delivery of the goods from Cross & Co. to Attwood & Co., and the order was executed by strangers to the claimants. Could any action have been maintained by the claimants against Attwood & Co.? None could have been maintained, even against Cross & Co. Possibly, if they had agreed to accept the commission, a special action on the case might have been brought against them as factors. But by the assignment to the bankers they disabled themselves from executing the order. The bankers did not acquire the mere lien; they would not have been secure without the absolute dominion of property. They were not obliged to ship, nor the claimants to receive. Both parties might, or not, according to their interest. Suppose the goods had been lost in their transit, could Attwood & Co. have maintained an action for the price against the consignees? I anticipate the unanimous answer of the court in the negative. Suppose the goods should be condemned as prize of war, could the bankers recover against the claimants? No! neither in consequence of a physical nor a legal loss. The case of Dunham and Randolph¹ is conclusive of the present. Attwood & Co. [*30 exercised acts of ownership on the goods after the transfer to them, and until the lading on board. The claimants could not have received the goods without paying Attwood & Co. They may have had an interest in paying Cross & Co., their correspondents, who may have had their funds in possession—who may have been their debtors. They had an election precisely as the claimants in the Frances had.

Dexter, for the respondents and claimants. The possession of the goods was continued in Cross & Co. by their agents at Liverpool, Earl & Co., who shipped as their, and, consequently, as our agents, on board a general ship, to us, for our account and risk. When the goods were first put in motion, their transit to New York began, and they were, in effect, delivered to the consignees at that port. Some act of the correspondent in Europe may be necessary to show that he elects to consider the goods, after being purchased of the manufacturer, as the property of the merchant in America. But such an act existed in this case; and the property changed when the goods were delivered to the common carrier on the canal from Birmingham to Liverpool, i. e. in 1811. The carrier was the bailee of the consignees in law, and the goods were at their risk from that time. It may be true that the bankers cannot maintain a suit against us; but it may be true that the property, nevertheless, vests in us. The only doubt whether such a suit could be maintained, is, that the debt due to Cross & Co. being a chose in action, could not be transferred. Still, the right to it subsists in them,*who may[*31 sue the claimants on account of the advances made by order from them. It is, therefore, immaterial which of the two parties in England may maintain the action. Except for the in-intervention of the capture and prize proceedings, the goods are delivered, and the claimants are debtors for the price. A bill of lading drawn in consequence of an order to ship goods, transfers the property to the consignee. There is no copy of what is termed the assignment; but it is easy to see that its object was not to defeat the arrangement, or the subsisting relations of creditor and debtor between Cross & Co. and the claimants; but merely to enable the bankers to receive their money from the consignees. Either the assignment was a sale or a mere naked authority to receive payment from the claimants. If a sale, then was it invalid for want of delivery; if an authority only, then the right of property remains where it was, though it is possible the bankers would have been entitled, in equity, to receive the money. The expression in the heading of the invoice, "which goods are now the property of Messrs. Spooner, Attwood & Co.," only proves them to be bad lawyers and bad logicians. Probably they are ignorant of the distinction between general and special property. The res gestæ do not warrant a pretension of general property in them, and we deny the conclusion they have drawn. Nothing passed but a right to receive the price of the goods. They had not even a lien, or other legal right, because they never had the possession; and, in whatever way they might have enforced their claim, they meant 32 nothing more by it than a *confident expectation, founded on mercantile courtesy, that the claimants would pay them. The original arrangement was to subvert, and Cross & Co. were, in fact, the shippers. Even supposing they have not fulfilled our order literally and strictly—suppose a right of election in the consignees to receive or reject the goods—are we not to wait for this election? Can they lose the property before this election is made? An irregularity or defect in the execution of their order may give them a right of action against their correspondents in a court of municipal law for damages; but if the rule of the prize court be, that the property must be vested in the claimants at the time of shipment, they are entitled to restitution in the present case.

Pinkney, for the appellants and captors, in reply. The question is, in whom did the property vest at the time of shipment, or at the time of capture? The claimants could not make an efficacious election after capture, because the rights of the captors interposed before any election could be made. If these rights had not thus interposed, then the power of election might be exerted. Therefore, the question stated is the only controversy in the cause. Take the transaction by its stages; break it up into its constituent parts, at what epoch—through the instrumentality of what circumstances—did the property pass to the claimants? If it did not so pass, it was, on the ocean, the property of an enemy, and, therefore, liable to capture and confiscation. The orders are not here; but will the documentary evidence, now 33 before the *court, justify restitution? 1. Did, then, the first purchase vest the property in the claimants? In The Frances, it was determined that it had no such effect; and the doctrine is upheld by all principle and all analogy. 2. The goods were sent to Liverpool, and they still remained the property of Cross & Wheat. 1.

Co. The delivery in the vehicle on the canal was inland, and preparatory to the maritime delivery. The agents of Cross & Co. at the outport were not agents of the claimants, nor liable to them in an action. The claimants were not bound, nor could they take possession at this epoch. Suppose Cross & Co. had become bankrupt, would the goods have vested in them? or would they have been obliged to ship? 3. Consider the legal effect and circumstances of the assignment. Cross & Co. were the complete proprietors of the goods, and the present claimants could not have shown themselves in a court of justice. The parties considered the transfer to have changed the property, and they knew better what they had done than the court can know. It must, therefore, have been calculated and adapted to change the property; the bankers could have had no indemnity otherwise. They must have had a discretion to dispose of the goods; and had they become bankrupts, their assignees must have had the same discretion. There is always a locus penitentie in the vendor before delivery (as to the right of property I mean, not as to the right of action in the vendee); the caprice of the vendor may influence him to change the direction of the property. Had the right of the claimants been a vested right, the vendor in England might *have brought an action against them at 34 any stage of the transaction. At what epoch could either he or the bankers have brought such an action? The remaining question is as to the concurrent acts of both. Did those acts vest a right to the price in either? or was it in the election of the claimants to receive the commodities? The intervening assignment to the bankers sundered the merchants in England from the claimants; it deprived them of their ability to obey the original order; all privity of contract between the principal and agent was gone. There was no obligation on the part of Attwood & Co. to ship, no authority, no power, no right. How is it that the rights of war on the property are to be defeated? By showing an authority to ship? It exists not. The question is stricti juris; the claimants are not bound to acquiesce in the new state of this transaction; they have an election to do so or not. Had the goods arrived without interruption at their port of destination, the claimants might have accepted them, and thus adopted the new state of the transaction, and the new parties to it. But the rights of war intercept transfer. The consignees are not liable for the retrospective charges at the foot of the invoice, unless the goods had been shipped by the agent, and received by the principal. The usage of trade is, that the factor always charges these expenses; were it otherwise, it would follow that the property would always be transferred on the first purchase, contrary to the express authority of The Frances, with which the present case coincides in principle.

*MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the 35 opinion of the court, and, after reciting the documentary evidence, proceeded as follows:

Upon these papers it is contended by the captors, that the goods remained the property of Daniel Cross & Co. until the transfer to Spooner, Attwood & Co., when they became the property of the assignees; that this change of property so operates upon the subsequent shipment as to make it a shipment without order, and to leave it in the election of G. & H. Van Wageningen to accept or reject the goods; and that this right of election is terminated by the intervening right of the captors.

On the part of the claimants it is contended, that their right commenced with the purchase, which was made by their order, and for their account and risk, and was completed when the goods were forwarded to Liverpool; that if this point be determined against them, still the whole transaction evidences an intention to assign the claim of Daniel Cross & Co. to Spooner, Attwood & Co., so as to give them a right to receive the money, but not in any manner to affect the interests of G. & H. Van Wageningen.

Whether Messrs. G. & H. Van Wageningen became the owners of the goods on their being sent from Birmingham to Liverpool, must depend on the orders under which Daniel Cross & Co. acted. If their authority was general to ship to G. & H. Van Wageningen, the goods might, according to the circumstances of the purchase, remain the property of Daniel Cross & Co. until they were delivered to the master of the vessel for the purpose of transportation. *If they were directed to purchase the goods, and to store them in Liverpool as the goods of G. & H. Van Wageningen, to be afterwards shipped to the United States, it appears to the court that the property changed on being sent to Liverpool, and immediately vested in the American merchants for whom they were purchased. The testimony respecting the orders is found in the letter from Daniel Cross & Co. to G. & H. Van Wageningen. The words of that letter which bear particularly on this point are: "In consequence of the revocation of the British orders in council, on the first day of August next, we have lost no time in shipping the goods sent to Liverpool so long since, agreeably to your kind order." This language is not equivocal. It imports, in terms not to be misunderstood, that the goods were sent from Birmingham to Liverpool, in consequence of the orders of Messrs. G. & H. Van Wageningen. This letter is addressed to the house which had given the order, and was written without an existing motive for misrepresenting that order. There is certainly nothing in the circumstances of the transaction which would render it probable that the order must be represented in this letter, either carelessly or intentionally, in any manner different from that which was really given. The situation of this country during what has been termed our restrictive system was notoriously such as to render it an object with every importing merchant to use the utmost dispatch in bringing in his goods so soon as they should be legally admissible. Nothing, therefore, can be more probable than that orders for making purchases which were to be executed at an inland place, by a house residing at such place, would be accompanied with orders directing them to be conveyed to a seaport, there to be held in perfect readiness for exportation. In the usual course of trade, if the purchasing and shipping merchant be the same, there would rarely be any actual change of property between the purchase and the shipment of the articles, nor could we expect to find any extrinsic evidence of ownership, other than the mere possession; but in the state of trade which existed at the time of this transaction, such change, and the evidence of it, may be reasonably expected. In the common state of things, the whole order respecting purchase and shipment, where the same agent is employed, is executed with expedition, and is, in appearance, one transaction. In the actual state of things, the purchase was to be made immediately, but the shipment was to take place at some future indefinite period. It would depend on an event which might be very near or very remote. It became a divided transaction, or, rather, two distinct operations. We look for some intervening evidence of ownership in the person for whom the purchase was made, and are not surprised at finding it. If, in such a state of things, the goods were procured under a general order to purchase, but not to ship until some future uncertain event should occur, and were, in the meantime, to remain the property, and at the risk of the agent, they would probably be retained at the place of purchase under his immediate control and inspection. Their conveyance to a seaport, there to be stored until their importation into the United States should be allowed, was such a fact as would scarcely have taken place without special orders, in the course of which an actual investment of the property in the person by whose order, and for whose use, the goods were purchased and stored at a seaport, is not unreasonably to be expected. The court considers this letter, then, as proving incontestably that the goods were conveyed to Liverpool, and there stored, to be shipped on the happening of some future event which it was supposed would restore the commercial intercourse between the two countries, in pursuance of specific orders from the claimants; and is further of opinion that the transaction itself furnishes strong intrinsic evidence that the goods, when stored in Liverpool, were the goods of the claimants, subject to that control over them which Daniel Cross & Co. would have as the purchasers, and intended shippers, who had advanced the money with which they were purchased. However this control and lien might be used for their own security, it could not be wantonly used to the destruction of the property of G. & H. Van Wageningen, and any conveyance to a person having notice of their rights ought to operate, and be considered as intended to operate, consistently with them, so far as the two rights could consist with each other. The words, then, in the invoice, which represent the goods as the property of Spooner, Attwood & Co., are introduced with no other object than to secure the payment of the purchase money to them. The invoice made out by Spooner, Attwood & Co. themselves, states the merchandise it specifies to have been purchased by Daniel Cross & Co., by order, and on account and risk of Messrs. G. & H. Van Wageningen, and to have been forwarded to Liverpool more than 12 months anterior to the date of the shipment. Goods thus purchased, and thus conveyed to a seaport, and stored under the orders of the American merchant, may well be considered as leaving in the purchasing agent only the lien which a factor has to secure the payment of the money which is due to him. If this was the true state of the property at the time of the assignment to Spooner, Attwood & Co., they having full notice that the assignment could only operate as an order for G. & H. Van Wagenen to pay the money to them (Spooner, Attwood & Co.), and would, probably, in its form and expressions, manifest this idea.

The court is much inclined to the opinion that these goods became the property of the claimants on being stored in Liverpool, if not at an antecedent time. The question, however, would, undoubtedly, be affected by the order under which Daniel Cross & Co. acted, by the deed of assignment to Spooner, Attwood & Co., and by other papers which are attainable. If, therefore, the case depended entirely upon this point, further proof might be required. But, in the opinion of the majority of the court, the case does not depend on this point alone.

If the goods were shipped in pursuance of the orders given by G. & H. Van Wagenen, the delivery on board the ship was a delivery to them; the property was vested in them by that act, and they had no election to accept or reject it.

40* In pursuing this inquiry, the legal effect of the transaction must depend, in a considerable degree, on the intent of the parties, and that intent is, in this case, to be collected chiefly from their letters, and from the circumstances in which they stood. G. & H. Van Wagenen were American merchants desirous of receiving the goods they had ordered as soon as the importation of those goods should be allowed. Daniel Cross & Co. were commission merchants of Birmingham, engaged in the American business. Spooner, Attwood & Co. were bankers, friendly to Daniel Cross & Co.; were desirous of promoting their interests, and recommending them to business, and had advanced them money while embarrassed by the difficulties consequent on the state of trade between the United States and Great Britain. Spooner, Attwood & Co. were desirous, not of purchasing the goods stored at Liverpool by Cross & Co. for the claimants; not of interrupting the shipment of those goods, or the connection between Daniel Cross & Co. and G. & H. Van Wagenen, but of permitting the shipment to proceed, and of receiving, themselves, the money to which Cross & Co. were entitled. Such was the situation, and such the objects of all the parties. Keeping this situation and these objects in view, let the testimony be examined. The letter of Daniel Cross & Co., dated the 8th of July, 1812, is in the language of men who were themselves the shippers of the goods. "We have lost no time," they say, "in shipping the goods, sent to Liverpool so long since, agreeably to your kind order." They speak of 41 the vessel and of the freight "as if the vessel were selected, and the contract made, by themselves." "We thought you would prefer to have the goods at this rate rather than wait for a reduction in the freight." They next refer to the letter of their friends, Spooner, Attwood & Co., to show the inconvenience they had sustained as young merchants, but without any indication of an interference of that house in the shipment, and conclude with saying, "the amount of invoice, herewith, to your debit, is £820 2 1, which, agreeably to the letter of Spooner, Attwood & Co., you will please to remit to them on arrival of the goods." This is the letter of Wheat. 1.

an agent who has executed, completely, the order which had been given him; but who, having been compelled to borrow money, had transferred his pecuniary claims to his creditor. The letter of Spooner, Attwood & Co. will next be considered. It is dated the day after that written by Daniel Cross & Co. After stating their friendship for Daniel Cross & Co., and the aid afforded that house, they add: "But as it was necessary that our assistance should be very considerable, we thought it right to obtain from them an assignment of certain quantities of goods which they had provided on account of your house, and of several others in the United States, previous to the 2d of February, 1811. We are thus introduced to your acquaintance, and we beg leave to send you herewith an invoice of the goods Daniel Cross & Co. had purchased for your account, and which we now forward to you, requesting that you will remit the amount of £820 2 1 to us at your earliest convenience." *Nothing is 42 said in this letter respecting the vessel by which the goods were sent; nothing indicating the exercise of any judgment by Spooner, Attwood & Co., respecting the time or manner of sending them; nor anything which would lead to the opinion that they interfered, in any manner whatever, in the transaction of the business. On comparing the two letters, the inference is inevitable, that Daniel Cross & Co. continued to execute the order of G. & H. Van Wagenen, in like manner as if their affairs had never been embarrassed. The contents of the two letters, in conformity with the situation and views of the parties, prove that Daniel Cross & Co. had only transferred to Spooner, Attwood & Co. their right to receive payment for the goods, and that the arrangements between them were intended only to secure that object. The assignment of the goods mentioned in the letter of Spooner, Attwood & Co. does not appear from the context, and from the nature of the transaction, to be intended to convey the idea of a sale, but to be used in rather a different sense, as an assignment of the adventure, or of the right to the debt due from G. & H. Van Wagenen. Whatever may have been the form of this assignment, it is apparent that it could not have been made, and certainly was not made, with the intention of enabling Spooner, Attwood & Co. to defeat the shipment to G. & H. Van Wagenen, or to control the proceedings of Daniel Cross & Co., under the order they had received. Why, then, are the goods, when put on board the Mary and Susan, in pursuance of the orders of the claimants, *to be con- 43 sidered not their property, but as the property of Spooner, Attwood & Co.? It is said that they were shipped by Spooner, Attwood & Co., not by Daniel Cross & Co.; that the confidence implied in the order for purchase and shipment was personal, and could not be transferred or executed by another. Allow to this argument all the weight which is claimed for it by the counsel for the captors; what part of this personal trust was transferred? What part of the order was executed by any other than Daniel Cross & Co.? The goods were purchased, sent to Liverpool, stored, and, afterwards, shipped by them. Every other auxiliary part of the transaction was performed by them. Nothing appears to have been done in pursuance of orders from Spooner, Attwood & Co., but everything in pursuance of their own judgment, acting under the order received from G. & H. Van Wageningen. On this ground the claimants could raise no objections to the conduct of Daniel Cross & Co. But it is said that Daniel Cross & Co. might have had the funds of G. & H. Van Wageningen in their hands, in which case the claimants would have been compelled, by receiving the goods, to pay their amount to Spooner, Attwood & Co.; consequently, this assignment must be considered as creating in Spooner, Attwood & Co. new rights, which released G. & H. Van Wageningen from the obligation to receive the cargo. But Daniel Cross & Co. did not purchase with the funds of the claimants. They purchased with their own funds. They inflicted, therefore, no injury on the claimants by transferring their [*42] right to the money *to Spooner, Attwood & Co. The effect of the transaction is precisely the same as if they had drawn a bill in favor of Spooner, Attwood & Co. for the amount of the invoice. It is said that the assignment gave Spooner, Attwood & Co. an election to ship the goods, or to dispose of them otherwise, and that the necessary consequence of this power of election is a correspondent right of election in G. & H. Van Wageningen to receive or reject them. The court does not view the transaction in this light. The assignment to Spooner, Attwood & Co. is understood by the court, from the evidence furnished by the letters, and the circumstances and objects of the parties, to have been subject to the right of Daniel Cross & Co. to execute, completely, the order of the claimants. The interest of all parties were best promoted by pursuing this course, and they appear to have pursued it. The court perceives nothing which can justify the opinion that Spooner, Attwood & Co. had a right, or would have been permitted, to intercept the shipment. Certainly it was neither their wish nor their interest to interrupt it. It is not reasonable, therefore, to suppose that they would have created any difficulty in obtaining a right to claim the amount of the invoice from G. & H. Van Wageningen by insisting on such an assignment as Daniel Cross & Co. would have been unwilling to make, because it might have proved injurious to them, without benefitting the house they meant to secure. It has also been argued that the orders most probably directed a shipment of the goods when the non-intercourse should be [*45] removed, *and that a shipment before that time was without orders, and at the risk of the shipper. The court does not think this probable. It is well known that the continuance of the laws of non-intercourse was considered as depending on the continuance of the orders in council. It is, also, perfectly clear that the American merchant, who should permit his goods to remain in Great Britain until intelligence of the repeal of the non-intercourse laws could be conveyed from this country to that, would be anticipated by all others, and would bring them to a market already supplied. Nothing, therefore, would be more reasonable than to order them to be shipped on the revocation of the orders in council. This idea is supported by the letter of Daniel Cross & Co. That letter indicates no doubt of the propriety of the shipment.

Upon a view of the whole case, the majority of the court is of opinion that this is not a case in which further proof ought to be required, and that the goods by the Mary and Susan were shipped in pursuance of the orders of the claimants, and became their property when delivered, for their use, to the master of the vessel, if not at an earlier period.

Sentence of the Circuit Court affirmed with costs.

THE MARY AND SUSAN.

RICHARDSON, Claimant.

Goods, the property of merchants actually domiciled in the enemy's country at the breaking out of a war, are subject to capture and confiscation as prize.

The fact that the commander of a private armed vessel was an alien enemy at the time of the capture made by him, does not invalidate such capture.

The President's instructions of the 28th August, 1812, prohibiting the interruption of vessels coming from Great Britain, in consequence of the supposed repeal of the British orders in council, must have been actually known to the commanders of vessels of war, at or before the seizure, in order to invalidate captures made contrary to the letter and spirit of the instructions.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court for the District of New York. This was a claim by Mr. Richardson for a portion of the cargo of the same ship mentioned in the preceding cause, which portion was condemned in the District and Circuit Courts. The claimant, a native of Great Britain, and a naturalized citizen of the United States, was a resident merchant of Liverpool at the breaking out of the late war, but returned to this country in the month of May, 1813, after knowledge of the capture, and pending the proceedings in the District Court. The capture was made on the 3d of September, 1812, within 18 miles of Sandy Hook, in 13 fathoms of water, where vessels are frequently passing and anchoring, and the privateer had previously spoken at sea another privateer and a pilot boat schooner from Philadelphia. *There was also [*47] contradictory testimony as to whether the commander of the privateer had knowledge of the President's additional instructions of the 26th of August, 1812, before the capture, which, as it is noticed in the opinion of the court, it is unnecessary to state. By those instructions the public and private armed vessels of the United States were not to interrupt any vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, coming from British ports to the United States, laden with British merchandise, in consequence of the alleged repeal of the British orders in council.

NOTE.—1. Claimants have no right to litigate the question whether the captors were duly commissioned, because they have no standing in court to assert the rights of the United States. Though the capture was made by a non-commissioned captor, the prize will be condemned to the United States. The Pizarro, 2 Wheat., 227.

Ships of war and privateers both cruise under a commission from their sovereign, and both make prizes under the authority of that commission. In both cases the sovereign is the captor, and the prize vests absolutely in him.

cil, but were, on the contrary, to give aid and assistance to the same, in order that such vessels and their cargoes might be dealt with on their arrival as might be decided by the competent authorities.

Stockton, for the appellant and claimant, stated that this was a case of summum jus, where the property of a citizen, shipped without knowledge of the war, upon the repeal of the British orders in council, was condemned upon the authority of The Venus,¹ and the doctrine of domicile. There is here no question of proprietary interest, or of national character, independent of this particular transaction. But, unless the court thinks proper to review its decisions upon the effect of commercial domicile, the appellant is confined to three points in support of his claim:

1st. That the capture was made after the commander of the privateer had knowledge of the instructions of the 26th of August, 1812. [48*] 2d. That if he had not such knowledge, condemnation cannot take place, as the capture was made subsequent to the issuing of the instructions.

3d. That the commander of the privateer is, and was at the time of the capture, an alien enemy, and, consequently, his commission is void.

1. This is a question of fact, to be determined by the weight of testimony. 2. The instructions were certainly communicated to the commander before prize proceedings were commenced, and it was the duty of the captors to have relinquished the property, subject to the decision of government, under the non-importation act. Capture does not vest the property of the goods in the captors, but merely authorizes them to carry in for adjudication. The prize act of the 26th of June, 1812, sect. 6, shows that the property is not vested in them until after condemnation. All laws take effect from their enactment, as to rights of property; and at common law, statutes take effect, by a fiction, from the first day of the session at which they are passed. The instructions, issued under the 8th section of the prize act, are legislative in their nature. Captors are the mere delegates and substitutes of the sovereign; their authority is derived from him, and must be exercised in conformity with the will of the state.¹ The power of the President to issue these instructions has already been recognized by the court. The rights of war and peace depend upon the fact of the existence of a state of war and peace, *not upon the knowledge of that fact. A prize made after a declaration of war, without knowledge of its existence, is good; and a prize made after the cessation of hostilities is bad, without regard to the circumstance of knowledge; unless, indeed, there be a stipulation in the treaty of peace to prolong hostilities at sea.² 3. The commission to Johnson, the commander of the privateer, is null. The President has been deceived in his grant; for he could never have intended to commissionate a person to commit treason against his own country. The acts of Congress, during the late war, put alien enemies under restraints which are altogether opposed to the idea of the executive being authorized to delegate to them such a power as letters of marque and reprisal import.

3. The instructions of the President of Aug. 28, 1812, referred to in above case, are considered in The Mary, 9 Cranch, 136, 149, 150. The court there say: "When the orders in council were repealed, large shipments were made of British merchandise by American merchants, in the full confidence that the American restrictive system would fall with the orders which produced it. This opinion, and the proceedings in consequence of it, were thought excusable both by the executive and legislative departments of government." "The instructions of the President relate only to the departure of the vessel." "That the instructions were intended to protect from capture all vessels which had sailed in that confidence which was inspired by the repeal of the British orders in council, however the voyage might be protracted, is apparent from their language, and from the fact that they continued to be delivered to the armed vessels of the United States after the passage of the act of the 2d of January, 1813."

cation of the law of domicile to this case, is at rest.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. The court considers that question completely settled, and not open for argument.

Hoffman. 1. As to the instructions. It is admitted that the former decisions of the court make them obligatory. The instructions could not, in fact, have been communicated to the commander of the privateer previous to the capture; and they are not, ipso facto, and per se, [50*] revocatory of the right to capture. *The instructions must either have been actually communicated or the privateer must have been in port after they were promulgated, in order to affect the right to capture. Such is the spirit of the former decisions.¹ Cruisers are not to act upon informal information at sea, as they might be deceived by their rivals and competitors; in port, knowledge must be implied, in law, from the certainty, publicity, and notoriety of the fact. The right of property does vest, by capture, to be subsequently consummated by condemnation; quoad, the belligerents the right vests; the property of the enemy is devoted as to his rights. The claimant is an enemy, pro hac vice. 2. The affidavits to prove the commander of the privateer an alien enemy, were irregularly taken. The cause was open, as it were, to plea and proof; but the further proof was confined to the communication of the instructions; and the simplicity of the prize proceedings forbids going out of the limits prescribed in the order for further proof.

Pinkney, on the same side. The court will not regard the particular hardship of the case, but will only be anxious to administer the law of nations and of the land, as they are applicable to the rights of the parties. 1. Knowledge of the instructions was communicated to the captor before the deductio infra præsidia; before the prize proceedings were commenced; before condemnation; but after the seizure, which vested an inchoate right in the captor. It is said, the written law prohibited him from [51*] making it; *but that is settled, and the court have said the instructions were not to be likened to statutes. They are merely directory from a superior to a person in a subordinate capacity; and they must be received by him, or they cannot have the binding force of instructions; they were not law until communicated: then only they rise into law. It is also said that the capture was well made, but subsequent knowledge shall overreach and vitiate it. In every case of capture of goods, in their transit to this country, after the repeal of the British orders in council, the same fact must have been known before condemnation. The instructions inhibited the capture and interruption of American vessels coming from British ports; but the President could have no authority to divest rights once vested; and there is nothing in the instructions to prohibit bringing in for adjudication after the capture was made, nor to prohibit prize proceedings after bringing in for adjudication. By the fourth section of the prize act, it is provided, "That all captures and prizes of vessels and property shall be forfeited, and shall accrue to the owners, officers, and crews of the vessels by whom such captures and prizes shall be made; and, on due condemnation had, shall be distributed," &c.; by which an inchoate right vested on the capture, to be consummated by condemnation. The prize law of France and Spain vests the property immediately; other countries require bringing infra præsidia and condemnation. Capture gives, everywhere, a right to privateers, though it may not give an indefeasible right to public ships. A qualified and provisional *prop- [52 erty is vested; and it is held, both in France and England, that the crown cannot interfere to stop prize proceedings where private parties have an interest. Admit that no right of property is acquired, is no right acquired? Most certainly an incipient right is acquired, to be afterwards consummated; and the instructions cannot have the effect, retroactively, to defeat the right of the captors to proceed to adjudication. The case of a treaty of peace, stated on the other side, illustrates this idea. Belief is nothing; fact is everything. The captor exercises a belligerent right; the treaty repeals his commission and abrogates his right. Suppose a capture made the day before the treaty is signed, does it prevent his going on and perfecting his right? Certainly not; and the same is the case with the instructions: if they do not stand in the way of the capture, they do not stand in the way of condemnation. They did not stand in the way of capture, because they were unknown; they do not stand in the way of condemnation, because that is a mere consummation of the incipient right acquired by capture. 2. The court have no right to look beyond the President's commission; the captor stands everywhere upon it, especially in the prize courts of the power by whom it is issued; and there is no case where the contrary was ever maintained.

Dexter, for the appellant and claimant. 1. It is said the claimant must either prove that the privateer had been in port or that the instructions were *actually communicated to the com- [53 mander. If it were intended to make him a wrong-doer, strict proof of knowledge might be essential; without such proof, he would be excusable from paying costs and damages; but he does not thereby acquire any indefeasible right to the thing captured; and restitution must be ordered. The claimant seeks restitution only, and the first question is, whether the captor had knowledge of the issuing of the instructions, no matter how it came to him. 2. But supposing that he had not this knowledge before the seizure; it was communicated to the prize-master while he was carrying in the ship for adjudication. He was bound by the instructions "not to interrupt, but, on the contrary, to give aid and assistance" to the ship he captured. Does the right to proceed contrary to the instructions vest at the time of boarding, or manning? It undoubtedly vested when the ship was completely brought infra præsidia. But the acts done in the intermediate time between that and the taking possession, constituted an interruption contrary to the letter and spirit of the instructions. The right acquired by the seizure was inchoate, and was sought to be consummated after the rule of conduct prescribed by the President became known to the captor. The rule as to capture vesting the property is various and fluctuating in different times and nations. The distinction here is, that an inchoate right may be defeated by a knowledge of the instructions subsequently communicated; but a consummated right cannot. The President has authority, both by our municipal constitution and public law, to [54*] prosecute 'a war lawfully declared; he may exempt this or that thing from attack' or capture, by land or by sea. Suppose an enterprise commenced before knowledge of an order from him countermanning it, could the blockade, or siege, or expedition, be continued after such revocation became known? The captor has acquired, in the present case, no private right which the instructions cannot defeat. Government may, by compact with foreign nations, divest inchoate rights; in a treaty of peace, restitution of captures on both sides may be stipulated.¹ 8. The order for further proof justifies the admission of testimony as to the alien enemy character of the commander. The President's commission is, doubtless, conclusive, wherever he acts within the authority confided to him by the laws; but he cannot commission an alien enemy, whose sovereign would have a right to punish him as a traitor; and even a naturalized citizen has no right to cruise against his native country.

JOHNSON, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is not necessary to go into a consideration of the national character or future designs of the claimant in this case. It has been solemnly settled, and must henceforth be considered as the positive law of this court, that shipments made by merchants, actually domiciled in the enemy's country at the breaking out of a war, [55*] partake of the nature of 'enemy trade, and, as such, are subject to belligerent capture. Whatever doubts may have once been entertained on this bench, with regard to the necessity or propriety of adopting the principle into the jurisprudence of this country, they are now either dissipated or discarded; and the character, views, and even the subsequent acts of such a shipper, cannot vary the conclusion of law upon his claim.'

[56*] Stress has been laid, in the argument before this court, on the fact that Charles Johnson, the commander of the Tickler, is an alien enemy; but on this point we are unanimous [57] mous that it makes no difference *in the case. Admitting that this circumstance should bear at all upon the decision of the court, the utmost that could result from it would be the condemnation of his interest to the government

1.—Vide Convention of 1800, between the United States and the French Republic; by the 30th article of which, restitution of public ships captured on both sides was stipulated.

2.—The effect of domicile or commercial inhabitation, upon national character was recognized by the Continental Court of Appeals in prize causes during the war of the revolution. (2 Dallas, 42. Claim of Mr. Vantelenger.) It was determined by the Supreme Court, during the hostilities with France, that a citizen residing in a foreign neutral country acquired the commercial privileges attached to his domicile, and was, consequently, exempt from the operation of the law of his own country suspending the intercourse with the French dominions. (2 Cranch, 65. Murray v. The Charming Betsey.) The national legislature have adopted the same principle in the act of the 3d of March, 1800, applying the rule of reciprocity in cases of salvage to 'the vessels or goods of persons permanently resident within the territory, and under the protection, of any foreign government.' &c.; and, finally, before he case of The Venus, the Supreme Court applied the same principle to the law of insurance, and held a warranty of neutrality to be satisfied by the residence of the party as a merchant in a neutral country. (Livingston and Gilchrist v. The Maryland Insurance Company, February Term, 1813.) This was an action on a policy of insurance, containing a warranty that the property was neutral. That war-

The only grounds, then, on which the right of restitution can be contended for in this case, arise out of the President's instructions of the 28th of August, 1812. On these, three points are made: 1st. That Johnson had, in fact, or ought from circumstances to be presumed to have had, notice of those instructions. 2d. If he had not at the time of the capture, yet, having received them before the arrival of the prize in port, he was bound then to have discharged her. 3d. That notice of the instructions was, in fact, unnecessary, as the instructions of the President had, as to the [58] conduct of privateers, all the operation of laws.

On the second and third of these points there exists but one opinion in this court. Although some doubt may be entertained relative to the form or nature of the notice necessary, yet we all agree that some notice is necessary, and that notice must precede the capture. Instruction, ex vi termini, is individual. Instruction to A, independent of legal privy or identification, is not instruction to B. Not so with laws; their power floats on the atmosphere we breathe. Necessity, or convention, or power, has given them a legal ubiquity co-extensive with the legislative power of the government that enacts them. Notice here is altogether unnecessary, unless made so by the law itself. It is the sic volo, sic jubeo, of sovereign power, of which every individual subject to its jurisdiction is presumed to have notice, though time and distance stamp absurdity on the supposition. Unquestionably, the same operation might by law have been given to instructions emanating from the President; but this has not been done; on the contrary, the clause itself which vests the power in the executive holds out the idea of the necessity of notice. That this notice must necessarily precede or accompany capture we are induced to infer from this consideration. By capture the individual acquires an inchoate statutory right, an interest which can only be defeated by the supreme legislative power of the Union. Condemnation does nothing more than ascertain that each individual case is within the prize act, and thus throws the individual 59] upon his right acquired by *belligerent capture. Should the prize act, in the interim, be repealed, or its operation be suspended by the provisions of a treaty, there no longer exists a law to empower the courts to adjudge the prize to the individual captor. We can see nothing in the objects of the law authorizing the President to issue his instructions, nor in the instructions themselves, which can support the idea, that that which was lawfully prize of war at the time of capture should cease to be so upon subsequent notice of the instructions. Both the act itself and the instructions, in their plain and obvious sense, may well be construed so as to arrest the arm of hostility before it has given the blow. But not only is there nothing either in the act or instructions to which an ulterior operation can be given, but the policy of the country, as well as the fair claims of the prowess, perseverance, and expenses of the individual forbid our giving an effect either to the act or the instructions which will deprive the captor of the just fruits of his bravery and enterprise. The fact of notice, then, alone remains to be considered; and this must either be inferred from circumstances or received upon the evidence of confession. On this point, computation of time becomes material. The capture was made, as we collect from the officers and crew, on the 8d of September; but as the nautical calculation of time commences at noon, this may mean on the morning of the 4th of September. The additional instructions bear date the 28th of August, and were, probably, forwarded by the mail of the 29th. It cannot, therefore, be supposed that they were published 60] in Philadelphia before the 31st *of August, nor in New York before the 2d; at any rate, not before the 1st of September. This certainly leaves time enough for the information to have been communicated from New York, but renders it impossible that it could have been received either from the Eagle or the pilot boat, as they were both spoken off

Charleston, and the latter was seven days out; whereas the Tickler left St. Marys, in Georgia, on the 24th. Whether such information was not in fact communicated off New York, is a point on which the evidence would leave us little room for a contrariety of opinion, were it not for the loss of the log-book and journal. For this circumstance, taken in conjunction with the evidence of confession, some of the court are inclined to entertain an unfavorable idea of the captor's cause. But the majority are of opinion that they cannot attach so much importance to it. The evidence of Paine, Ferris, and Warren, all officers of the privateer, and, at the time of testifying, divested of all interest in the capture, positively negatives the only fact from which notice could be implied, to wit, the speaking of any vessel beside the Eagle and the pilot boat, previous to the capture of the Mary and Susan. And this, we think, is supported by probability, when it is considered how very few vessels at that time could venture to leave our ports; that there is no probability the Tickler could have ventured to lie off and on the port of New York any length of time; and that, from her leaving the port of St. Marys to her arrival at New York, there elapsed no more than the ordinary time of performing that voyage. In addition to which considerations *we cannot but 61] think that a copy of the journal of this voyage was, as it ought to have been, deposited in the custom-house; and this circumstance, whilst it was calculated to make the captor less careful in preserving the original, enabled the claimant to avail himself of every advantage which could have been derived from the original. On the evidence of confession, we are not inclined to enter into the consideration of the depositions, intended on the one hand to support, and on the other to impugn, the credibility of Waldron and Garnsey. Nothing can be more painful than the necessity of entering upon such investigations; nothing more unsatisfactory than to found a legal decision as to the credibility of a witness upon oral testimony, unsupported by the evidentia rei. In this case we are induced to conclude that these witranty was determined to be satisfied by the emigration of the party, a Spanish subject, to the United States, and residing there before the breaking out of the war in 1804, between Great Britain and Spain, the property having been captured by a British cruiser, and condemned in the Prize Court at Halifax as Spanish property. A majority of the court were of opinion that the insured was to be considered as a merchant of the United States, whether he carried on trade generally or confined himself to a trade from the United States to the Spanish provinces.

See, also, 1 Johns. Cas., 303; Arnold v. The United Insurance Company; 1 Caines' Rep., 60; Jenks v. Hallett; 2 Johns. Cas., 481; Johnston v. Ludlow; 1 Caines' Cas. in error, 29, 2 Johns. Cas., 476; Duguet v. Rhinelander et al. It is much to be lamented, that we have not printed reports of the decisions in the British Supreme Court of prize, as many interesting points have been decided before the Lords of Appeal, of which we have no other account than occasional loose references to them. Among these is the case of Mr. Dutilith, mentioned by Dr. Robinson in The Indian Chief, 3 Adm. Rep., 21, which is more particularly stated by Sir John Nicholl, in a manuscript report, in the possession of the editor, of the hearing of the case of The Harmony, Bool, before the lords, 7th of July, 1808. "The case of Dutilith, also, illustrates the present. He came over to Europe, as it is stated, in 1783, about the end of July, a time when there was a great deal of alarm on account of the state of commerce in Europe. He went to Holland, then not only in a state of amity, but also of alliance with this country; he continued there until the French entered. During the whole time he was there he was without any establishment. He had no counting-house; he had no contracts nor dealings with contractors there. He employed merchants there to sell his property, paying them a commission. Upon the French entering into Holland he applied for advice, to know what was left for him to do under the circumstances, having remained there on account of the doubtful state of mercantile credit, which not only affected Dutch and American, but English houses, who were all looking after the state of credit in that country. In 1794, when the French came there, Mr. Dutilith applied to Mr. Adams, who advised him to stay until he could get a passport. He continued there until the latter end of that year, and having wound up his concerns he came away. Some part of his property was captured before he came there. That part which was taken before he came there was restored to him (The Fair American, Adm., 1790), but that part which was taken while he was there was condemned, and that because he was in Holland at the time of the capture." (The Hannibal and Pomona Lords, 1800.)

nesses misunderstood Johnson; that the knowledge of which the latter spoke was that acquired subsequent to the capture; that it could not have related to any other knowledge we think incontestible, from the single consideration that the evidence in the case proves it to have been inconsistent with the fact. It was not possible, under the circumstances of the case, that such knowledge could have been communicated for want of the means of communication, and that it was not, is positively sworn to by three witnesses whose testimony stands wholly unimpeached.

THE RUGEN. BUHRING, Claimant.

A question of proprietary interest, and of trading with the enemy.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court for the District of Georgia. The schooner Rugen and cargo were libeled in the District Court for that district, as a prize of war, either as belonging to the enemies of the United States or as the property of citizens who had been trading with the enemy. A claim was interposed by Mr. Buhring, a subject of the King of Sweden, on the ground that both vessel and cargo belonged to him, and were bona fide neutral property. This claim was rejected by the District Court; which sentence was affirmed by the Circuit Court, and thereupon the claimant appealed to this court.

Charlton, for the appellant and claimant, stated that the ship was formerly British, had been captured, condemned as prize of war in the District Court, and sold by the marshal to one Bixby, who sold to Buhring, the present claimant. 1. He cited the case of *The Sisters*¹ as to the proprietary interest, and argued that the regularity of the papers is prima facie evidence of neutrality, and conclusive, unless rebutted by contradictory proof. The primitive [63*] national character of the ship was changed by condemnation, and the sale to a neutral was legal.² Testimony was irregularly admitted, which was neither taken in preparatorio nor found on board, nor invoked from any other captured vessel. 2. The voyage was strictly within the range of neutral rights. If the neutral character of the ship and cargo was established, the destination was immaterial, whether to an enemy or neutral port. But the ship was, in fact, destined to a neutral port, and diverted from her course by the enemy's vessel La Decouverte. False papers may be used, if not to cover enemy's property, or evade belligerent rights;³ and this court is not bound to take notice of, or enforce, the revenue laws of other countries. 3. The property ought to be restored with costs and damages, because the documentary evidence proclaimed the neutral character of the ship and cargo.

The Attorney-General and Pinkney, for the respondents and captors, stated that this was one of the plainest cases for condemnation that ever came into a court of prize, upon two grounds:

1st. That the real property was not in the claimant, but in a citizen of the United States.

2d. That it was taken trading with the enemy.

1. In The Odin,⁴ where the papers were complete, and res gesta similar to the transactions in this case, confiscation was decreed. [64*] The conduct and resources of the claimant were the same as those of Krefting, The Dane. According to the doctrine of Sir William Scott, exercising ownership by the same master is conclusive;⁵ but here the former owner continued to exercise dominion over the thing pretended to be transferred in his own proper person. The ship also continued in her originally-intended employment, which was another badge of fraud.⁶ The cases cited were of a transfer by the enemy to a neutral, and the former master continued; but here the citizen wishing to trade with the enemy takes a foreign garb to deceive, not a foreign, but his own government. This case is to be arranged under that branch of public law which depends upon the municipal laws of allegiance; and the presumption is more irresistible than in the other, where the property is taken and proceeded against as enemy's property. The vis major, by which it is alleged the ship was compelled to enter an enemy's port on the outward voyage, is not such as would be admitted as an excuse for deviation, even in a fiscal case, or in an action on a policy of insurance. The indorsement of a ship's papers by the enemy's vessel might have produced a certain effect; but in the view of the law of nations, a parol order could have no effect, tending to confiscation in a prize court, or even detention for trial. The falsification and spoliation of papers, in this case, would alone be sufficient to justify condemnation.⁷

Spoliation of papers may be explained [65] by the preparatory examinations so as to affect the question of costs only; but here, taken in connection with the simulated papers, the false destination, and the other circumstances of mala fides, it is conclusive. Much of the evidence in the case, according to the strict regularity of prize practice, is inadmissible; but the proceedings may be considered as equivalent to an order for further proof. The case of The Sisters was before the Court of Admiralty as an instance court; an equitable title, conflicting with a legal, and there being no constat of property, the court, according to the notions which prevail in England, could not interfere. 2. Supposing the property to be in the claimant, it cannot be restored; he was a resident in the United States, and carried on a trade with the enemy, contrary to the obligations of his temporary allegiance.' And supposing the ship to have been compelled to enter the enemy's port by vis major, the purchase of a return cargo would import confiscation, being a voluntary act of trading with the enemy. Costs and 66 damages ought to be awarded to the captors, it being a fraudulent case, and the property delivered to the appellant upon bail.

Charlton, for the appellant and claimant, in reply. A national character is impressed by the flag and pass. If the property is neutral, the master had a right to clear out with a false destination, according to the authority of The Neptunus, since it is not usual to clear out from one hostile port to another. The simulated papers were not intended for the purpose, and could not have the effect of defrauding this country of its rights as a power at war. The destruction of papers was accidental, and the circumstances of the case are not like those of The Odin.

LIVINGSTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It has been contended that this vessel and cargo were bona fide the property of the appellant, a subject of Sweden, who had a right to trade with the enemy of the United States; and that having done nothing to forfeit his neutral character, both the sentences below were erroneous, and ought to be reversed. To entitle himself to such reversal, the claimant has undertaken to show, and insists that he has shown, that at the time of, and previous to, the departure of the Rugen from the United States, she, as well as the cargo on board, was his property, and that he was then, and still is, a subject of the King of Sweden, with whom the United States were at peace.

The court will now proceed to inquire how 67 far Mr. Buhring has succeeded in establishing the facts on which he relies for a restitution of this property. In pursuing this inquiry it may become unnecessary to decide whether the papers which were on board were sufficient to entitle the Rugen to the privileges or national character of a Swedish vessel; because, whatever may be their regularity and effect, yet, if the court shall be of opinion that they were only colorable, and that an American citizen, and not the claimant, was owner of the vessel and cargo, it will not be pretended that belligerent rights can be eluded in this way, or that the subject of a state at war can, under cover of neutral muniments, however regularly procured, or formal they may be, violate with impunity, his duty and allegiance to his own country. So far from such documents, when intended only as a cover, affording any protection to the property, they render the party resorting to them doubly criminal, by the scene of fraud and perjury which must be waded through in order to obtain them; and then, in case of disaster, to make a court believe that such papers disclosed nothing but the real truth of the case. The whole controversy will then be resolved into the single question, whether, in point of fact, Mr. Buhring, or Messrs. Samuel & Charles Howard, who are citizens of the United States, were owners of the Rugen and her cargo at the time of her sailing from Savannah, and on her return to the United States. It must ever be a painful task to investigate testimony where a result unfavorable to the claimant can only proceed from a conviction that the principal agents in the transaction have acted either fraudulently or contrary to their known duty as good citizens. Such is the duty now imposed on the court.

9.—A neutral subject domiciled in the belligerent state, is considered as a merchant of that country, so as to render his property taken in trade with the enemy liable to capture and confiscation, in the same manner as that of persons owing permanent allegiance to the state. (3 Rob., 26, The Indian Chief.) The converse of the rule is also applied to subjects or citizens of the belligerent state resident in a neutral country, whose trade with the enemy is considered as lawful; except in contraband of war, which is deemed inconsistent with their permanent allegiance, and, it may be added, is equally prohibited to them in their character of neutral merchants. (Vide 6 Rob., 408, The Neptunus.)

The claimant is said to be a Swede. If this be admitted, and it seems not to be denied, we are compelled, by the very suspicious circumstances of this case, to look beyond his national character, and to inquire very particularly into his situation at the time he embarked, or became connected with this adventure. Had he ever been a merchant in his own country, or elsewhere? Had he ever resided in any of our seaports, or carried on business of any kind there, or in any other place? Had he, at any time, means to purchase this vessel and cargo; or was he sufficiently known to have acquired a credit to that extent? These questions were all asked by the advocate of the captors, to which no satisfactory answer was given on the argument; and it is in vain that the proceedings are searched for a solution of either of them at all favorable to the present claim. On the contrary, easily as every difficulty on these points might have been dispelled, if this were a fair proceeding, no attempt of the kind has been made, or if it has, it has terminated in establishing that Mr. Buhring's situation and circumstances were such as preclude all reasonable doubt of his being any other than the ostensible owner of the vessel and cargo. He was a young man, only twenty one years old, residing, as well as his brother William, in South Carolina, with Mr. Scarborough, Vice-Commercial Agent of the King of Sweden, for the state of Georgia. From this retirement he is drawn, and, for the 68 first time, introduced to the notice of the mercantile world by the Messrs. Howard, who appear to be merchants of considerable property and credit, residing at Savannah, in the state of Georgia. Between these gentlemen and Mr. Buhring there could have been but very little previous acquaintance; for the latter arrived at Savannah from Europe only two or three months before we find him engaged in the concerns of the Rugen; and after remaining not more than three or four days in that city he went to reside in the country of South Carolina, whence he did not return to Savannah until he came back with Mr. C. Howard, a very few days before the Rugen sailed. It is not, then, harsh to presume that the strongest and only recommendation of Mr. Buhring was his national character. The Messrs. Howard appear, at the time, to have been in search of a Swede, and were not long in meeting with one whose youth and inexperience well fitted him for the purposes for which, there is so much reason to believe, he was wanted. A feeble attempt, however, has been made to show that Mr. Buhring was not without credit as well as funds. To the former point one witness has been examined, and to establish that he was not entirely destitute of property, it has been shown that he actually gave two notes, amounting, together, to about $4,300, for the Rugen and her cargo, in the month of May, 1813, payable in four months after date; that these notes, as they became due, were taken up by him with great punctuality at one of the banks in Savannah. Whether these notes were really made at the time [70*] when they bear date may well be doubted; but it admits of no doubt that they were discharged with the proper moneys of the Messrs. Howard, which had almost the moment before been drawn, by one of them, out of the bank, and put into the hands of Mr. Buhring for that purpose. With the funds, then, of Mr. Howard, and now with those of Mr. Buhring, were these notes taken up; and a contrivance, which was intended to make Mr. Buhring appear as a man of property, has not only altogether failed, but has added very considerable weight to the suggestion of the captors, that he was a young man totally destitute of the means of purchasing and paying for the property which, it is now alleged, belonged to him. But we now find Mr. Buhring at Savannah; and what is done with him? or what does he do with himself, on his arrival there? Does he go about to purchase a vessel? Does he, when he is told that the Rugen belongs to him, take any measures to fit her out? Does he provide a crew? Does he agree for their wages? Does he purchase a cargo? Does he see to its being put on board? Does he effect insurance? or is he found doing any one act which might naturally be expected from an owner? All this trouble had already been most kindly taken off his hands by his new friend and acquaintance, Mr. Howard. This gentleman had already (if we are to believe the history of this transaction as it is narrated by the claimant) provided him with a vessel and cargo, although it does not appear that he had instructions or funds of Mr. Buhring for the purpose. It is true, that with a caution that was very exact [71*] cusable, considering the circumstances of Mr. Buhring, the bill of sale which had been executed by the marshal, with a blank for the name of the vendee, was not put into the possession of Mr. Buhring, but carefully retained by the Messrs. Howard, they executing to him one in their own names, although they now say they never were the owners of the vessel. And even this bill of sale, it is very probable, remained in the custody of Mr. Samuel Howard during the whole of the voyage to Jamaica and back to the United States. Everything being now in readiness for their departure from Savannah, Mr. Buhring appears on board, and is introduced to the mate and crew, not merely as owner of vessel and cargo, but as master for the voyage. Whether any surprise was excited on board by the new character in which the claimant appeared, or whether they expressed any reluctance at placing themselves under his command, we know not; nor is it a fact very necessary to ascertain, because they must soon have discovered that Mr. Samuel Howard, whose friendship for Mr. Buhring seems to have had no limit, and in whose seamanship they may have had full confidence, intended to go with the vessel, and relieve Mr. Buhring from the Wheat. 1.

troublesome task, if he were equal to it, of navigating the Rugen. For this conduct, on the part of Mr. Howard, no other reasonable motive can be assigned than an interest in the vessel and cargo. The allegation of his going after certain funds in Carthagena is not at all made out. The Rugen leaves Savannah on the 5th or 6th of May, bound, as is alleged, for Carthagena, but arrives at Kingston, in the Island [72*] of Jamaica. The court is not at all satisfied with the excuses which have been made for her going there. It does not appear that a vis major of any kind existed. She was neither forced in by adverse winds, nor was she under any restraint from capture. When within only four leagues of the island she was boarded by a British brig of war called La Decouverte, whose commander ordered her into Kingston. He put no prize-master on board; nor did he indorse any of her papers; nor did he keep company with her; and yet we find her doing exactly what she was verbally directed to do. It is faintly pretended that if she had attempted, after that, to go to Carthagena, she could not have escaped the British cruisers which swarmed about the island. But what greater danger, if the property were neutral, would ensue on a capture by any other British vessel than by her going to a British port as prize to the Decouverte, or by her orders? It is believed, then, that her going to Jamaica was voluntary, and formed part of the original plan; which opinion derives considerable support from the fact of insurance having been made, not only for Carthagena, but also for a port in the West Indies; from the nature of the outward cargo; from the readiness with which they consented to dispose of it at that place, and procured another for this country promising a much greater profit than any which at that time could have been imported from Carthagena. There is yet a still stronger circumstance to prove that the destination of the Rugen to Carthagena was fictitious; and that is, her meeting at Kingston a ship called the Wanshop, which had sailed from [73*] Savannah but a little before the Rugen. On board of that vessel we find Mr. William Buhring, a brother of the claimant, and we have every reason to believe that she belonged, with her cargo, to the same concern. The Wanshop, it is also said, was destined for Porto Bello, on the Spanish Main; but by a strange coincidence of events, which can scarcely have been the effect of chance alone, she also gets out of her course, falls in with the same British vessel of war which afterwards boarded the Rugen; receives the like order to proceed to Kingston, which she also very promptly, and without any apparent reluctance, complied with. The business of these two vessels is managed by the same house in Kingston, and the proceeds of both of their cargoes are invested in molasses, rum, &c., which composed the return cargo of the Rugen. If the property claimed were bona fide Swedish, it would be superfluous to inquire whether the Rugen's going to Jamaica were voluntary or by coercion, a subject of Sweden having, for aught that appears, as good right to trade there as at Carthagena. But if it belonged to the American gentlemen, who have had an agency so conspicuous in the whole of this business (and that it did is our unanimous opinion), it will not be pretended that they could go to Kingston unless by compulsion, or that they had any right during the late war to purchase and bring a cargo from any British port to this or any other country.

The court having already expressed its opinion that this vessel and cargo did not belong [74] to the *claimant, but to citizens of the United States, the latter having been purchased at Kingston, as is believed, with their funds, it becomes quite unnecessary to inquire what was the real destination of the Rugen on her leaving Kingston; whether she were bound, in fact, to Amelia Island, or to the United States; although it might not be very difficult to come to a satisfactory conclusion that Hardwicke, in Georgia, was her real port of destination. But this examination is unnecessary; for the owners, being American citizens, are equally guilty of trading with the enemy, whether that trade were carried on between a British port and the United States or between such port and any foreign nation; and in the present case, if the court be correct in the view which it has taken of the evidence, the offense of trading with the enemy was complete the moment the Rugen sailed from Savannah with an intention to carry her cargo to Kingston, in Jamaica. Upon the whole, without taking notice of many of the arguments urged by the advocates of the captors in favor of condemnation, and which are entitled to great consideration, the court is unanimously of opinion that the decree of the Circuit Court, rejecting the claim of Mr. Buhring, was correct, and must, in all things, be affirmed.

Sentence affirmed with costs.

THOMPSON v. GRAY.

Where R. G. agreed with the managers of a lottery to take 2,500 tickets, giving approved security on the delivery of the tickets, which were specified in a schedule, and deposited in books of 100 tickets each, thirteen of which books were received and paid for by him, and the remaining twelve were superscribed by him, with his name, in his own handwriting, and indorsed by the agent of the managers, "Purchased and to be taken by Robert Gray," and on the envelope covering the whole, "Robert Gray, 12 books;" on the second day's drawing of the lottery, one of the last-designated tickets was drawn a prize of $20,000, and between the third and fourth day's drawing, R. G. tendered sufficient security, and demanded the last 1,200 tickets, and the managers refused to deliver the prize ticket; it was held that the property in the tickets changed when the selection was made and assented to, and that they remained in the possession of the vendors merely as collateral security, and that the vendee was entitled to recover the amount of the prize.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the county of Alexandria.

This was an action of trover, instituted by the defendant in error, against Jonah Thompson, agent for the managers of the Potomac and Shenandoah Navigation Lotteries, to recover a ticket in the 2d class of said lotteries, against which had been drawn a prize of $20,000.

On the trial, evidence was offered to prove that the president and managers of the Potomac Company had been created a corporation, under that corporate name; that they had been authorized by law to raise the sum of $300,000 by lotteries, *under which authority they had [*76 drawn one class, and had arranged and published a scheme of a second class.

That the plaintiff below, and one Joseph Milligan, projected another scheme, which they sent in to the president and managers, accompanied by a proposition in writing, in the words and figures following:

"If this scheme is adopted, we engage to take 2,500 tickets each, in the second class of the P. and S. Navigation Lottery: Provided the ten-dollar prizes we now hold, and may hereafter receive, deducting 15 per cent., shall be taken in liquidation of our joint bond; and we engage to place in the hands of Mr. Carlton all the funds we receive for new tickets, until it amounts to a sum equal to that which we now owe the company, as fast as we receive them; on the balance we shall expect the usual credit. It is understood that the discount of 5 per cent. is to be made from the above 5,000 tickets; approved security to be given on the delivery of the tickets.

(Signed) "JOSEPH MILLIGAN.
"R. GRAY."

It was admitted that this scheme was approved of and adopted by the president and managers, and their own scheme was abandoned; that the proposition of the plaintiff and Milligan was accepted by them, and became a binding contract between the parties. Evidence was also offered to prove that under the contract a schedule specifying the numbers of certain tickets, by books containing one hundred *each, to [*77 the extent of 2,500, selected by the plaintiff, and to be set apart for his use, had been delivered by him to the former agent of the lottery; that two of the books mentioned in the said schedule having been disposed of, or put out of the reach of the agent, another schedule was handed in by the plaintiff to the defendant, then, and at present, agent, in which two other books, containing the same number of tickets, were substituted in lieu of the two last-mentioned, the schedule, in respect to the others, being the same as the first. That the plaintiff had, at different times, received 13 books, of 100 tickets each, part of those specified in the schedule, and that he had paid for the 13 books, partly in certain promissory notes, received and approved of by the agent, and partly in cash, and had afterwards paid $108.80, on account of tickets in the 2d class, over and above the said 13 books. On the requisition of the plaintiff, the defendant produced on the trial a bundle containing twelve books of tickets of one hundred each (the residue of the numbers specified in the schedule), and, amongst others, the ticket in the declaration mentioned. On each of which books the name of the plaintiff was superscribed in his own handwriting; and on one of them (not that containing the ticket in the declaration claimed) was indorsed in the defendant's handwriting: "Purchased and to be taken by Robert Gray." And on the envelope covering the whole twelve books in one bundle was superscribed, in the hand and figures of the defendant, the words and figures following:

"ROBERT GRAY, 12 books."

*Similar proceedings took place as to [*78 W. Milligan, to whom only a part of the tickets selected by him had been delivered.

That the drawing of the lottery was commenced on the 17th day of November, 1812, and that, on the 27th of that month, the second day's drawing, a prize of $20,000 was drawn against the number in the declaration mentioned. The plaintiff also offered evidence to prove that on the 4th day of December, 1812, subsequent to the third and before the fourth day's drawing, the plaintiff tendered to the defendant a bond for the payment of dollars, executed by himself and two sureties, who were fully sufficient for that sum, and demanded from him the twelve books of tickets which had been selected and set apart for him. To which the defendant replied that he was ready to deliver 1,200 of any undrawn tickets, but would not deliver the high prize. The drawing of the lottery had been continued only fifteen days.

On which the counsel for the defendant below moved the court to instruct the jury,

"1st. That it is not competent for the jury to find, from the evidence so produced as aforesaid, that the twelve books of tickets including the said prize ticket, had been, prior to the commencement of the drawing of the said lottery, appropriated by plaintiff and defendant to the satisfaction of said contract, and delivered to plaintiff under and in fulfillment of said contract, and deposited by the plaintiff with the defendant, as collateral security for the payment of the purchase money until other security [79*] should be *given, (as was contended and insisted upon by the plaintiff's counsel to the jury,)" which instruction the court refused to give.

"2d. That the facts so given in evidence by the plaintiff, as aforesaid, do not import an absolute sale and delivery of the twelve books of tickets, including the prize ticket, but a selection and setting apart of such tickets as were to be delivered to the plaintiff, when he should comply with his contract in giving the stipulated security." Which instruction the court gave, but also directed the jury, "that such selection and setting apart, aforesaid, was sufficient delivery to the plaintiff to vest the property of the said tickets in him upon his giving or tendering approved security, according to the terms of the contract, in a reasonable time thereafter; and that the tender of the security, as before stated, was in reasonable time."

"3d. That the selection and laying apart of the twelve books of tickets, as aforesaid, and the said indorsements upon the said books, and upon the envelope of the same, did not vest in the plaintiff the property of said tickets, under the said contract, so as to entitle plaintiff to prizes drawn against those tickets before any security was given or offered, and whilst said tickets remained in the hands of defendant, awaiting the completion of said contract on the part of the plaintiff in respect of the stipulated security." Which instruction the court gave, but also instructed the jury, "that upon tendering the security, as before stated, if the jury should find such security to be sufficient, such [80*] selection and laying *apart of the said tickets did, under the said contract, entitle the plaintiff to all the prizes drawn by such tickets in the intermediate time between such selection and the tender of security, as aforesaid;" to Wheat. 1.

which refusal and several instructions the defendant excepted, and a verdict and judgment having been rendered for the plaintiff below, the defendant in the Circuit Court brought the cause into this court by a writ of error.

Jones, for the plaintiff in error. 1. The ticket was at the risk of the vendors, and drawing the prize is equivalent to any physical change in the thing. It was not left in the hands of the vendors as collateral security, for the pledge of the ticket would have thrown upon the vendors the whole risk of the drawing of these tickets, the essence of their value consisting in the chance. On the contrary, the thing was to remain in the vendors' possession, and as their property, until a condition of the sale had been accomplished. 2. There is a repugnancy between refusing the first instruction and granting the second. The court below admit that the right of property was not complete in Gray, until the security stipulated; and that, when given, it would retroactively vest the property. The title was then clearly incomplete.¹

Sheann, contra. The contract was consummated and binding on both parties. Gray's proposition *was accepted; some of the [*81 tickets were actually delivered; there was a payment of what may be considered as earnest. The thing sold was specifically designated by the vendors. The vendee had the right of property and the right of possession. All he wanted was the actual possession. The thing sold may be designated in various ways.² Property is transferred by the contract of sale without delivery, if the article is specifically designated.³

Jones, in reply. There is a distinction between this case and the authorities relied upon by the other side. The question is, whether the contract be executory or executed. It was not executed by specifying the particular ticket; the security to be given by Gray was a condition which preserved the original executory nature of the contract. Delivery, either actual or symbolical, is essential to a sale; and neither took place here. The cases cited are of contracts self-executory, and where the parties stipulated to waive delivery.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court, and, after stating the facts, proceeded as follows:

The question on which the correctness of the opinions given by the Circuit Court depends, is this: Was the purchase and sale of the twelve books not delivered so complete that the tickets had become the property and were at the risk of Robert Gray?

*In pursuing this inquiry it becomes [*82 necessary to decide whether the clause respecting security forms a condition precedent, on which the sale is made to depend, or a condition subsequent, the performance of which may be suspended until it shall be convenient to the vendee, or required by the vendor. It is apparent that a contract for the sale of 5,000 tickets was one of very considerable interest to the managers of the lottery. This is not only self-evident from the nature of the transaction, but is also proved by the fact that they changed the scheme of the lottery for the purpose of securing it. As the time of commencing the drawing must necessarily have depended on the sale of the tickets, it is reasonable to suppose that, in the calculations made on this subject, they must have considered the books selected and set apart for Mr. Gray either as sold or unsold. The indorsements on the books selected lead strongly to the opinion that they were considered as sold. If the proposition which forms the basis of the contract be inspected, it will be perceived that the contract was intended to be entire, not divisible. The scheme of the lottery was changed, not for the purpose of inducing Gray and Milligan to take any number of tickets less than 5,000, but on their engaging to take 5,000 absolutely; and the clause respecting the security is annexed to the delivery of the tickets. The delivery of some of the books was an execution in part of an entire contract. All the circumstances show, that the obligation of the contract was complete; but the examination of these circumstances *is dispensed with by the admission on record, that it "became a binding contract between the parties."

What, then, was this binding contract?

That the scheme proposed by Milligan and Gray should be adopted, and certain facilities of payment allowed, on their bond to the company for tickets taken in the first class. That they should, on their part, take 2,500 tickets each in the second class, and that approved security should be given on their delivery. Certainly Milligan and Gray were absolutely bound to take 2,500 tickets each. A refusal to do so would have been a breach of contract, for which they would have been responsible in damages. When the parties proceed one step further; when the vendee, in execution of this contract, selects the number of tickets he has agreed to purchase, and the vendor assents to that selection; when they are separated from the mass of tickets, and those not actually delivered are set apart and marked as the property of the vendee; what, then, is the state of the contract? It certainly stands as if the selection had been previously made and inserted in the contract itself. An article purchased in general terms from many of the same description, if afterwards selected and set apart with the assent of the parties as the thing purchased, is as completely identified, and as completely sold, as if it had been selected previous to the sale, and specified in the contract. After this selection, the parties stood in the same relation to these tickets as if the 25 books, afterwards agreed upon, had been named in the contract as containing the numbers purchased §4 by Gray. The *contract, then, amounts to this: The managers agree to sell Gray 2,500 tickets, which are specified, and he agrees to, give approved security for the purchase money on the delivery; in the meantime the tickets remain in possession of the vendors, who proceed to draw the lottery, without having received or required security for the whole number of tickets sold. The stipulation respecting security could not in such a case be considered as a condition precedent, on the performance of which the sale depended. Certainly, the managers could have required, and have insisted on this security; but they might waive it, without dissolving the contract. They were, themselves, the judges, whether they would consider the contract of Robert Gray, with the collateral security furnished by the possession of the tickets, as sufficient for their protection; and their conduct shows that they thought it sufficient.

The majority of the court is of opinion that the property in the tickets changed when the selection was made and assented to; and that they remained in possession of the vendors merely as collateral security. Had the tickets been all blanks, Gray was compellable to take them.

*Judgment affirmed with costs.

ANDERSON v. LONGDEN.

Where a bond was given by the agent of an unincorporated joint stock company, to the directors for the time being, for the faithful performance of his duties, &c., and the directors were appointed annually, and changed before a breach of the condition of the bond, the agent and his sureties were held liable to an action brought by the obligees after they had ceased to be directors.

ERROR from the Circuit Court for the County of Alexandria.

This was an action of debt instituted by the defendants in error (plaintiffs in the Circuit Court), as directors of the Domestic Manufacture Company of Alexandria, against Robert Anderson (the plaintiff *in error) on a bond [*86 given by him and others as sureties for John MacLeod, agent of the said company, to the said directors, to recover the amount of money and merchandise which the said agent had re-

1.—When commodities are sold by the bulk, for a gross price, the sale is perfect, for it is known with certainty what is sold; but if the price is regulated at the rate of so much for every piece, pound or measure, the sale is not perfect, except only as to so much as is actually counted, weighed, or measured; for, till then, it is not known with certainty what is sold. (3 Johns. Cas., 254, Coit v. Houston; Domat, l. 1, tit. 2, s. 4, art. 7; Code Napoleon, liv. 3, tit. 6, ch. 1, art. 1585; 2 Erskine's Inst., 480, 481.) This distinction is recognized by Pothier, who remarks that the contract of sale is usually perfected by the agreement as to the price; and that this rule applies where the sale is of a specific article, for a gross price. Sic ut quid venierit appareat quid quate quantume sit, and pretium, and pure vendi; perfecta est emptio, l. 8; Dig. de petic. et comm. R. vend. But, if the commodity be of that description of articles, which consist in quantitate, and which are sold by the weight, number, or measure, the sale is imperfect until it is weighed, counted or measured. In the first case, the goods sold are at the risk of the vendee, from the moment the contract is made; in the last case, they remain at the risk of the vendor, until they are designated by the act of weighing, counting or measuring. But, in both cases, the contract is so far completed from the time of its being entered into, as to give the vendee a right of action for the delivery of the thing on tendering the price, and the vendor an action for the price, on tendering a delivery of the thing sold. Contrat de Vente, No. 308. ceived for the use of the company, and for which he had failed to account.

On the 17th of November, 1809, a number of persons in Alexandria associated together, and formed a company, for the purpose of encouraging the manufacture and use of domestic merchandise. They entered into articles for their government, of which the following extracts are all that are material in this case:

"Art. 2. As soon as the whole, or 1,000 shares of the said capital stock, shall have been subscribed for, and the first payment made thereon, a meeting of the stockholders shall be called by public notice in the Alexandria and Washington newspapers, to meet in the court house of Alexandria, either in person or by proxy duly authorized, at which meeting the stockholders, either personally or by proxy, shall elect by ballot seven of their own body to act as directors of the said company for one year."

"Art. 3. The affairs of the said company shall be carried on in the town of Alexandria, under the superintendence and control of the said directors, of whom any four shall form a board or quorum. They shall choose a chairman from among themselves, and in case of vacancy by death, resignation or otherwise, such vacancy shall be immediately filled by themselves from among the stockholders. And the said directors shall in no case whatever con-87 tract debts or engagements, by bill, bond, or otherwise, for, or on account of, the company, but all dealings under their superintendence and control aforesaid, shall be for cash or barter, except goods on deposit, which may be sold by the direction of the consignor. The said directors shall also exhibit, at the annual meeting of stockholders, for their inspection, a statement of the affairs of the company for the year preceding."

"Art. 4. The directors, when elected, shall proceed, without delay, to appoint an agent and such other officers as may be requisite, all of whom shall hold their offices during the pleasure of the board, and who shall, before they enter upon their functions, give bond, with sufficient security, to the said directors, and their successors in office, for the faithful discharge of their duties, as prescribed by the board of directors."

The company having proceeded to elect directors, John MacLeod was appointed agent by them; and on the 18th of February, 1810, the said agent, with the plaintiff in error and others, his sureties, executed and delivered to the defendants in error, directors of the said company, their joint and several bond, in the penalty of $10,000, the condition of which was, "that the said John MacLeod should, in all respects, faithfully execute and perform the duties assigned to him as agent, according to the terms and meaning of the articles of association, and also such other duties as are, or from time to time should be, assigned to the office of agent by the board of directors, and should, from time to time, when called upon, render a just and true account of all money, 88 goods, &c., of the said company which should come to his hands, and should apply the same as he should be directed; and should, in all respects, whilst he held the office, conduct himself with honesty, and fidelity, and attention to the interest of the company." The said agent continued in the service of the company, without any new appointment, until June, 1812, when he was dismissed; and having gone out in arrears to the company, this suit was brought against the plaintiff in error to recover the amount due to the company. To this suit the defendant in the Circuit Court, taking over of the bond, pleaded: 1st. "Conditions performed;" to which the plaintiff replied, specially setting forth, as the breaches relied on, "that money and merchandise, the property of the company, had come to the hands of J. MacLeod, as agent, &c., to the amount of $4,000, for which he had failed to account, though required by the directors, and which he did not deliver over to his successor, as ordered by the directors. On this replication issue was taken. The defendant in the Circuit Court pleaded: 2d. That the plaintiffs (Longden and others) ceased to be directors at the expiration of one year from the time of their appointment, and were not directors when the suit was brought: To this plea the plaintiffs demurred generally.

In his third plea the defendant states that John MacLeod was appointed agent on the 18th February, 1810, and that for one year from the time of such appointment, and during the time the plaintiffs acted as directors, he had faithfully executed and performed his duty, &c.

*To which the plaintiffs (protesting [89 that he had not faithfully performed his duties for one year) replied that J. MacLeod had continued in office for more than one year from the 18th of February, 1810, under the said appointment, and after the plaintiffs ceased to be directors; during which time merchandise, &c., to the amount of $4,000, came to his hands, &c., which he had failed to account for; to which the defendant demurred.

The defendant pleaded: 4th. That the plaintiff had not instituted any suit at law against MacLeod for the breach of the condition of the bond; to which the plaintiff demurred generally.

The law on the demurrers was adjudged by the court for the plaintiffs (Longden and others), and on the trial of the issue the jury found for the plaintiff, and assessed damages, &c.

The record presents a bill of exceptions, which states that the defendant offered in evidence to the jury the books of the company, from which it appeared that the agent had been in the habit of selling merchandise on credit, from the month of January, 1810, until June, 1812; which books were open to the examination of the directors; that it appeared from the books that sales on credit had been made to three of the directors, plaintiffs in this suit; that the defendant also offered a copy of the report of a committee of directors made on the 19th of September, 1812, in pursuance of an order of the 6th of June, preceding.

Evidence was also offered to prove that the directors, to the number required by the articles, held meetings, at which they [90 gave directions for the management of the affairs of the company; that their proceedings were regularly reduced to writing, and signed by the chairman.

On which evidence the defendant's counsel moved the court to instruct the jury, "that if from the evidence aforesaid they should be of opinion that the directors of the company had permitted the said credits to be given, and had acquiesced in the same, the defendant would not be liable for the merchandise sold on credit, and appearing on the books of the company;" which instruction the court refused, and instructed the jury, "that the evidence did not, in law, justify an inference that the directors, acting as a board under the articles, had authorized the agent to sell the merchandise aforesaid, on credit, and that the agent could not, in law, be justified in selling on credit by any direction of the directors, individually made, when not acting as a board under the articles;" to which opinion and instruction the counsel for defendant excepted.

Seann, for the plaintiff in error, argued that the bond must conform to the articles of association, which was not incorporated. He cited the case of the Commonwealth v. Fairfax et al., where the words "so long as he shall continue in office," in the condition of a sheriff's bond, were construed not to extend to a second and new appointment.

Lee, for the defendant in error, was stopped by the court.

¶1*] *MARSHALL, Ch. J. The case of the sheriff's bond is very different. The commission of sheriff, in Virginia, is annual; of course, his sureties are bound for one year only. It is true, the directors of this company are elected annually; but the company has not said that the agent shall be for one year only; his appointment is during pleasure. The sureties do not become sureties in consequence of their confidence in the directors, but of their confidence in the agent whose sureties they are. The court is unanimously of the opinion that the judgment of the Circuit Court ought to be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

THE CORPORATION OF NEW ORLEANS

v.

WINTER ET AL.

A citizen of a territory cannot sue a citizen of a state in the courts of the United States, nor can those courts take jurisdiction by other parties being joined, who are capable of suing. All the parties on each side must be subject to the jurisdiction, or the suit will be dismissed.

ERROR from the District Court for the District of Louisiana. The defendants in error commenced their suit in the said court to recover the possession and property of certain ¶2*] lands in the city of New Orleans; claiming title as the heirs of Elisha Winter, deceased, under an alleged grant from the Spanish government, in 1791; which lands, it was stated, were afterwards reclaimed by the Baron de Carondelet, governor of the province of Louisiana, for the use of fortifications. One of the parties, petitioners in the court below, was described in the record as a citizen of the state of Kentucky, and the other as a citizen of the Mississippi territory. The petitioners recovered a judgment in the court below, from which a writ of error was brought.

Winder, for the plaintiffs in error. The court below had no jurisdiction of the cause. The case of Hepburn & Dundas v. Ellzey determined that a citizen of the District of Columbia could not sue a citizen of the state of Virginia in the courts of the United States. The subsequent case of Straubridge et al. v. Curtis et al.,² shows that all the parties on the one side, and all the parties on the other, must be authorized to sue and be sued in those courts, or there is a defect of jurisdiction. The right of action was joint, but they might have severed it, which they did not, and they are incompetent to join in point of jurisdiction.

• Key, contra. A citizen of the Mississippi territory has a right to sue in the courts of the United States. This point was left open in the decision of *the case of Sere v. Pitot.³ ¶93 There is a manifest distinction, in this respect, between the right of a citizen of the District of Columbia and of the Mississippi territory. The jurisdiction of the District Court of Louisiana is the same with that of Kentucky. The several territories are "members of the American confederacy." The constitution puts the citizens of the District of Columbia on the same footing with inhabitants of lands ceded for the use of dockyards, &c.; they are not "members of the American confederacy." The district has no legislative, executive, nor judicative authority, power, or privileges. The territories have them all. They are in a sort of minority and pupilage; have the present right of sending delegates to Congress, and of being hereafter admitted to all the immunities of states, in the peculiar sense of the constitution. In this case, each party takes an undivided interest, and has a right to a separate action, whether the inheritance be of moveable or of real property.

Harper, in reply. There is no distinction, in this particular, between the District of Columbia and the territories. Congress might give to the district a delegate, with the same privileges as the delegates from the territories. The United States are the common sovereign of all these communities; and may grant or refuse this, or any other privilege, at their pleasure. The action is brought jointly, not each claiming his several part; and the court cannot *disconnect the parties. The petitioners [¶94 complain under the civil law, by the rules of which it is not competent for them to sever. Spanish law, which prevailed in Louisiana before its acquisition by this country, is a modification of the Roman. By the civil law, inheritances of real, as well as personal property, are joint. What is the mode of proceeding? Though ambiguous and mixed, it is chiefly the civil law process, like our chancery proceedings. All parties must, therefore, regularly have been before the court.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court, and, after stating the facts, proceeded as follows:

The proceedings of the court, therefore, is arrested in limine, by a question respecting its jurisdiction. In the case of Hepburn & Dundas v. Ellzey,¹ this court determined, on mature consideration, that a citizen of the District of Columbia could not maintain a suit in the Circuit Court of the United States. That opinion is still retained.

It has been attempted to distinguish a territory from the District of Columbia; but the court is of opinion that this distinction cannot be maintained. They may differ in many respects, but neither of them is a state, in the sense in which that term is used in the constitution. Every reason assigned for the opinion of the court, that a citizen of Columbia was not capable of suing in the courts of the United States, under the judiciary act, is equally applicable to a citizen of a territory. *Gabriel Win-95ter, then, *being a citizen of the Mississippi territory, was incapable of maintaining a suit alone in the Circuit Court of Louisiana. Is his case mended by being associated with others who are capable of suing in that court? In the case of *Straubridge et al. v. Curtis et al.*² it was decided that where a joint interest is prosecuted, the jurisdiction cannot be sustained, unless each individual be entitled to claim that jurisdiction. In this case it has been doubted whether the parties might elect to sue jointly or severally. However this may be, having elected to sue jointly, the court is incapable of distinguishing their case, so far as respects jurisdiction, from one in which they were compelled to unite. The Circuit Court of Louisiana, therefore, had no jurisdiction of the cause, and their judgment must, on that account, be reversed, and the petition dismissed.

Judgment reversed.

96*) *[INSTANCE COURT.]

THE AURORA. WALDEN ET AL., Claimants.

A hypothecation of the ship by the master is invalid, unless it is shown by the creditor that the advances were necessary to effectuate the objects of the voyage, or the safety of the ship, and the supplies could not be procured upon the owner's credit, or with his funds, at the place.

A bottomry bond given to pay off a former bond, must stand or fall with the first hypothecation, and the subsequent lenders can only claim upon the same ground with the preceding, of whom they are virtually the assignees.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court for the District of Pennsylvania. The brig Aurora, commanded by Captain Owen F. Smith, and owned by the claimants, sailed in July, 1809, from New York, on a trading voyage to the Brazils, and from thence to the South Sea Islands, for the purpose of procuring a cargo for the market of Canton or Manilla; with liberty, after completing this adventure, to continue in this trade, or engage in that between Canton and the north-west coast of America. The brig duly arrived at Rio Janeiro, where the principal part of her outward cargo was sold, and from thence proceeded to Port Jackson, in New Holland. At this port, the brig underwent considerable repairs; on account of which, advances and supplies were furnished by Messrs. Lord & Williams, who were merchants there. The original objects of the voyage seem here to have *been lost sight of, [*97 and the brig was chartered by the master, to Messrs. Lord & Williams, for a voyage of discovery, and was actually retained in their service for about a year, under this engagement. At the end of this time the brig had returned to Port Jackson, and Captain Smith was here put in jail, by some persons whose names are unknown, for debts contracted, as it was asserted or supposed, on account of the vessel, and was relieved from imprisonment by Messrs. Lord & Williams. About this time, viz., in July, 1811, the brig was again chartered to Messrs. Lord & Williams, for a voyage from Port Jackson to Calcutta, and back to Port Jackson; and a bottomry bond was executed for the same voyage by Captain Smith, in favor of Messrs. Lord & Williams, for the sum of £1,482 6 1, and interest at nine per cent., being the amount, as the bond expresses it, of "charges incurred for necessaries and stores, found and provided by Messrs. Lord & Williams, of, &c., at various times and places, for the use of the said brig." The vessel duly proceeded to Calcutta, and landed her cargo there; but being prevented, as it was alleged, by the British government in Calcutta, from returning to Port Jackson, the voyage was broken up. In December, 1811, Captain Smith entered into a contract with the libelants, Messrs. Chamberlain & Co., at Calcutta, by which he engaged to charter the brig to them, to carry a cargo on their account to Philadelphia, for the gross freight of 12,000 sicca rupees, to be paid to him in advance in Calcutta; and also, to give the charterers the appointment of the master for the voyage. *He further agreed, in [98 consideration of the libelants paying the bottomry bond of Messrs. Lord & Williams, and advancing any sums necessary for the repairs and supplies of the ship, to execute a bottomry bond to them for the same voyage, for the principal sum thus paid and expended, and 20 per cent. interest. In pursuance of this agreement, on the 17th of December, a certain captain George Lee, with the assent of Smith, was appointed by the libelants to superintend the repairs, equipments, and loading of the brig, and afterwards sailed as master on the voyage. A bottomry bond, for 18,000 sicca rupees, was formally executed by Captain Smith on the 23d, and a charter-party on the 26th December. In the latter part of January, 1812, Captain Smith resigned his nominal command of the ship to Captain Lee, and delivered to him the ship's papers and letters for the owners. The ship duly sailed on the voyage, and arrived at Philadelphia, and there safely delivered her cargo. The advance freight was paid to Captain Smith, according to the contract, and he remained behind at Calcutta, under the pretense that, with this advance freight, it was his intention to prosecute the plan of his original voyage, and to endeavor to repair the losses sustained by his former conduct. It also appeared in evidence that Captain Smith was, during the whole voyage, much addicted to intoxication, both at sea and on shore; and Messrs. Lord & Williams, and the libelants, seem to have been fully apprized of his incapacity to manage the concerns of the voyage. The owners refused to pay the bottomry bond executed at Calcutta, and the 99] present libel was brought to enforce it. The District Court, at the hearing, decreed the full amount of the principal and interest of the bond, deducting the 12,000 sicca rupees advanced at Calcutta. Upon an appeal, the Circuit Court reversed this decree, and upon the merits dismissed the libel.

Harper, for the appellants and libelants. 1. As to the first hypothecation at Port Jackson, a bottomry bond may be taken after debts are incurred necessarily, in order to secure the person advancing the moneys. 2. The hypothecation at Calcutta was to discharge the first loan, and for further repairs. The master was not, in effect, changed before the second bond was executed. But, suppose he was, how is that to affect the first hypothecation? It attached until discharged by the new loan. The instrument passes by delivery, and the new lenders became invested with all the rights of the former holders of the bond. The present holders ought, at least, to receive so much of their money. All that lenders upon bottomry are bound to do, is to see that a necessity actually exists at the time. How came the ship enabled to prosecute her voyage and earn freight? By the loan. The payment of the freight in advance to the master, subsequently, could not, by relation back, affect the lien acquired by a previous loan.

Sergeant, for the respondents and claimants. The power of a master to hypothecate the vessel, though necessary for the purposes of commerce, would, without limitations, be ruinous to the owner, and destructive of the purposes it was intended to subserve. It is conferred by no express delegation, but is the offspring of necessity. This necessity must be shown, to warrant the master's conduct. The owner's interest is the object of the power; the master has no authority to bind the owner or his property, contrary to his orders and his interest. 1. The master can hypothecate only in case of clear necessity, which must be clearly shown.¹ It is incumbent upon the party who claims to have a right under the bond, to show this necessity. A contrary doctrine would make the bond, which is nothing unless the master has the power, evidence of that power. To allow it the force even of prima facie evidence, would be to invert the law; for, then, instead of saying, that the state of necessity must be clearly shown, we should be obliged to say, the absence of necessity must be shown. 2. The master can hypothecate only when the hypothecation is the condition of the loan. The money ought to be advanced solely on the faith of the bond, and the hypothecation cannot be taken after the advances are made, without stipulating for such security. If the loan has been once made on personal credit, for the use of the ship, it cannot be afterwards secured by hypothecation; for there is, then, no existing necessity. A menace against the master, or the power*of attaching the ship, by the [*101 creditor, will not legalize such a contract.² If the master can obtain funds by any other means, he is not authorized to hypothecate. The master can hypothecate only for the interest of the owner, and for the purpose of prosecuting the voyage.³ This is a case which requires the application of the strictest principles of law, and, at the same time, illustrates the wisdom and policy of those principles, as essential to the security of trade. The hypothecation at Calcutta, so far as it is founded upon that at Port Jackson, was given, in part, at least, for a pre-existing debt; and it is not for us to separate what the obligees have confounded and mixed together. As to the expenditures at Calcutta, the freight received ought to have been applied to pay them.

Harper, in reply. The principles advanced on the other side are too narrow to subserve the interests of trade; and the authorities cited do not warrant them. Any condition of a ship, disabling her from performing her usual service to the owner, if money cannot be raised in any other way to refit her, creates such a necessity as will justify a hypothecation by the master. Do not the claims of material men, of tradesmen who have furnished supplies upon the credit of the ship, of merchants who have advanced moneys for her repair, and who may all proceed in rem*, or by process of at- [*102 tachment, imply such a condition of the ship? By the universal law of the civilized world, the master is the agent of the owner, unless notice of his special instructions to the party contracting with him can be proved. The lenders in this case had no such notice.

STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court, and, after stating the facts, proceeded as follows:

Such are the material facts of the case, and the question to be decided is, whether, under all the circumstances, the bottomry bond executed at Calcutta constitutes a valid lien upon the ship.

The law in respect to maritime hypothecations is, in general, well settled. The master of the ship is the confidential servant or agent of the owners, and they are bound to the performance of all lawful contracts made by him, relative to the usual employment of the ship, and the repairs and other necessities furnished for her use. This rule is established as well upon the implied assent of the owners as with a view to the convenience of the commercial world. As, therefore, the master may contract for repairs and supplies, and thereby, indirectly, bind the owners to the value of the ship and freight, so, it is held that he may, for the like purposes, expressly pledge and hypothecate the ship and freight, and thereby create a direct lien on the same, for the security of the creditor. But the authority of the master is limited to objects connected with the voyage, and, if he transcend the prescribed limits, his acts become, in legal contemplation, mere nul-

103*] lities. Hence, to make *a bottomry bond executed by the master a valid hypothecation of the ship, it must be shown by the creditor that the master acted within the scope of his authority: or, in other words, it must be shown that the advances were made for repairs and supplies necessary for effectuating the objects of the voyage, or the safety and security of the ship; and no presumption should arise that such repairs and supplies could be procured upon any reasonable terms, with the credit of the owner, independent of such hypothecation. If, therefore, the master have sufficient funds of the owner, within his control, or can procure them upon the general credit of the owner, he is not at liberty to subject the ship to the expensive and disadvantageous lien of an hypothecatory instrument.

Let us now, with these principles in view, proceed to the consideration of the validity of the bottomry bond executed at Port Jackson, which enters so materially into the subsequent one executed at Calcutta. This bond purports, on its face, to have been given for advances, or supplies, furnished for the ship's use, not immediately before its date, but at various times and places; and, from the other evidence in the case, it distinctly appears that the greater part was furnished before and during the voyage of discovery in which she was engaged, under the contract with Messrs. Lord & Williams, and for their immediate benefit. Not the slightest account is given of the earnings of the ship during this long voyage of a year, nor of the terms or stipulations of the charter. This silence would be wholly unaccountable 104*] *if it were not in proof, that Captain Smith was guilty of the most shameful misconduct, and either fraudulently sacrificed, or grossly neglected, the interests of his owner.

The advances made by Messrs. Lord & Williams do not appear to have been originally made upon a stipulation for an hypothecation of the ship. On the contrary, there is the strongest reason to believe that they were originally made upon the general credit of the owner, or master, or both. If there had been a stipulation for an hypothecation, it must have been carried into effect by the parties on the next ensuing voyage; and, as this was not done, there arises an almost irresistible presumption that Messrs. Lord & Williams looked for their reimbursements out of the freight of the voyage in which the ship was then engaged by them. If, indeed, there had been a stipulation, originally, for an hypothecation, it must be deemed, in point of law, to have been waived by the omission to have had it attached to the first voyage then next to be prosecuted; and the party who thus waives his right cannot be permitted, at a subsequent time, and under a change of circumstances, to re-instate himself in his former condition to the injury of the owner. It is said that the ship might have been arrested for these advances; and that, in point of fact, the captain was put in jail on account of debts contracted for the ship, and was relieved from imprisonment by Messrs. Lord & Williams. That Captain Smith was imprisoned on account of some debts appears in the evidence, but it is by no means 105*] clear that these *debts were contracted for the use of the ship. The presumption is repelled by the consideration that the necessities and supplies are expressly stated in the bond to have been furnished by Messrs. Lord & Williams; and the only other creditors who are alleged to have furnished stores, are admitted not to have instituted any suits. It is undoubtedly true that material men, and others, who furnish supplies to a foreign ship, have a lien on the ship, and may proceed in the admiralty to enforce that right. And it must be admitted that, in such a case, a bona fide creditor who advances his money to relieve the ship from an actual arrest on account of such debts, may stipulate for a bottomry interest, and the necessity or the occasion will justify the master in giving it, if he have no other sufficient funds, or credit, to redeem the ship from such arrest. But it would be too much to hold, as was contended for by the counsel for the appellants, that a mere threat to arrest the ship, for a pre-existing debt, would be a sufficient necessity to justify the master in giving a bottomry interest, since it might be an idle threat, which the creditor might never enforce; and until enforced the peril would not act upon the ship itself. And even supposing a just debt might, in such a case, be a valid consideration to sustain a bottomry interest in favor of a third person, such an effect never could be attributed to a debt manifestly founded in fraud or injustice. Nor does it by any means follow, because a debt sought to be enforced by an arrest of the ship, might uphold an hypothecation in favor of a third person, that a general creditor would be entitled *to acquire a like interest. It [*106] would seem against the policy of the law to permit a party, in this manner, to obtain advantages from his contract for which he had not originally stipulated. It would hold out temptations to fraud and imposition, and enable creditors to practice gross oppressions, against which even the vigilance and good faith of an intelligent master might not always be a sufficient safeguard in a foreign country.

These are not the only difficulties which press upon the claim of Messrs. Lord & Williams. The terms of the charter-party, entered into by them on the voyage to Calcutta, as well as on the voyage of discovery, are nowhere explained. It was certainly their duty, in the first instance, to apply the freight in their hands, earned in these voyages, to the discharge of the debt due to them for advances. What was the amount of this freight, and what was the manner in which it was to be paid, and how, in fact, it was paid or appropriated, are inquiries which have never been answered. These inquiries are at all times, and in all cases, important, but are emphatically so in a case where there is but too much reason to suspect that the interests of the owner were wilfully abandoned by the fraud or the folly of the master.

It is incumbent upon the creditor who claims an hypothecation, to prove the actual existence of the necessity of those things which give rise to his demand; and if, from his own showing, or otherwise, it appears that he has had funds of the owners in his possession which might have been applied to the demand, *and [*107] he has neglected or refused so to do, he must fail in his claim. So, if various demands are mixed up in his bond, some of which would sustain an hypothecation and some not, it is his duty so to exhibit them to the court that they may be separately weighed and considered. And it would be perilous indeed if a court were called upon to grope its way through the darkness and intricacies of a long account without a guide, and decide upon the interests of the ship-owner by obscure and doubtful lights which here and there might cross the path.

Upon the whole, it is the opinion of the court that the bottomry bond of Messrs. Lord & Williams cannot be sustained as a valid hypothecation upon the proofs now before the court. It appears to have been founded, to a very large amount, upon advances made by Messrs. Lord & Williams, in previous voyages; and if some portion of the debt might have been immediately applicable to the necessities of the ship at the time of the voyage to Calcutta, that portion is not distinctly shown, and no reason as yet appears why the freight in their hands, if the transactions were bona fide, might not have been applied in discharge of these necessities.

As the bottomry bond of Messrs. Lord & Williams has not been established, the subsequent bottomry bond executed at Calcutta, so far as it includes and covers the sum due on the first bond, cannot be sustained. The plaintiffs, in this respect, can claim only as the virtual assignees of Messrs. Lord & Williams, with the assent of the master, and the same defects which infected the original title pass along with the 108 muniments of that title under the assignment.

And this observation leads to the consideration of the validity of the bottomry bond executed at Calcutta, as to the sum remaining, after deducting the amount of the first bond. Notwithstanding some obscurity in the testimony, it must be taken as true, from the express acknowledgments of Captain Smith, that the whole sum expended in repairs and supplies of the ship in Calcutta, including the sum of ten thousand seven hundred and thirteen sicca rupees, paid on account of the first bottomry bond, did not exceed the sum of eighteen thousand sicca rupees. It follows, therefore, that a sum, a little more than six thousand rupees, was expended in these supplies and repairs. By their charter-party with the master, the plaintiffs agreed to pay an advance freight to Captain Smith of twelve thousand sicca rupees for the voyage to Philadelphia. There was, therefore, within their own knowledge, an ample fund provided for all the repairs and supplies necessary for the voyage; and this fund absolutely within their own control, if they were disposed to act for the interest of the owners, instead of lending their aid still farther to involve them in difficulty and distress. There is, therefore, but too much reason to believe that the plaintiffs were not unwilling to derive undue advantages from the intemperance and negligence of the master, whatever might be the sacrifices brought upon the owners. The plaintiffs expressly stipulated, in their charter-party, for the right to appoint a new master for the voyage, obviously *from a total want of confidence in [*109] Captain Smith. They would not even suffer the repairs and loading of the ship to be made, except under a master specially in their own confidence. They retained Captain Smith in the nominal command of the ship until all their own purposes were answered, and then discarded him with as little ceremony as any indifferent personage. Yet, at the very moment that they were withdrawing their whole confidence from him, they advanced the whole freight of the voyage, to be applied at his own pleasure to any objects disconnected with the voyage. They could not be ignorant that the master was not about to return to the home of the owner, and that the ship was; and the argument which imputes to them a collusive combination with the master, is certainly not without considerable weight. At all events, here funds are shown to exist sufficient to meet the necessities of the ship, and, consequently, a resort to the extraordinary expedient of an hypothecation was not justified in point of law.

On the whole, it is the opinion of the court, that the decree of the Circuit Court ought to be affirmed with costs.

*Decree affirmed.*¹

1.—It is stated by Blackstone in the Commentaries, vol. 2, p. 457, that the contracts of bottomry and respondentia took their rise from the practice of allowing the master to hypothecate the ship in a foreign country in order to raise money to refit. This opinion is doubted by Mr. Abbott, in his Law of Shipping, part 2, c. 3, s. 15, p. 163 (Story's ed.), who remarks, that there is no mention in the text of the civil law, of this contract entered into by the master of the ship in that character. This remark does not appear to have been made with the usual accuracy of that excellent writer; for, in the law, De exercitoria actione in the Pandects, the master is authorized to take up money upon the credit of the ship when necessary; and Bynkershoek attributes the origin of maritime hypothecation to the Roman law, and states that it was originally confined to hypothecation by the master, from necessity, in foreign parts, and by degrees came to be entered into by the owners of the ship and cargo for more general purposes. Q. J. Priv. 1. 3, c. 15, De Contractu qui dicitur, Bodemery. The same great jurist also states in his Q. J. Pub. c. 18, p. 151, of Du Ponceau's translation, that the lender is entitled to the benefit of his security, even if the moneys advanced be unsatisfied by the master, and not laid out in the refitting the ship. This, however, must be understood of a bona fide case, where there is no fraud on the part of the lender, nor collusion between him and the master.

Roccus lays down the following rules on this subject: "Verum adverte, quia quatuor requiruntur, ut dominus navis teneatur ad restitutionem pecunie mutuatae. Primum, ut causa sit vera, et in illam causam pecunia sit versa, licet precise creditor non teneatur habere curam, ut in illam causam pecunia expendatur. Secundo, quod mutuans sciat magistratum ad id esse propositum. Tertio, ut non plus mutuetur, quam sit navis necessarium dicte refectiois, vel causae. Quarto, ut in eo loco compari possint res illae necessariae, ubi mutuum fuit factum." He adds, that if the master deceive the lender, either in the repairs or the price of the articles purchased, the owner is responsible, and also for money borrowed to repay other moneys advanced to refit the ship; nor is he discharged even if the master converts the money to his own use. Notabilia de Nav. et Naul. note 23, 24. The Consolato del Mare recognizes the power of the master to bind the owners in this manner, excepting in cases of fraud and misconduct, c. 245. By the ancient law of France, the master might hypothecate the ship when abroad, with the consent of the mate and pilot, who were required to certify upon the ships' journal the necessity of the loan, and its applica-

THE VENUS. JADEMEROWSKY, Claimant.

A case of further proof.

APPEAL from the decree of the Circuit Court for the District of Georgia. This ship having taken in a cargo at London, proceeded to Portsmouth, and from thence, on the 12th of April, 1814, sailed for St. Bartholomews, under convoy of a British ship of war. From St. Bartholomews she sailed for the Havannah, but on her passage thither was captured and sent into the island of St. Thomas, for adjudication, by a British cruiser. Upon being released from this detention, she abandoned her destination for the Havannah, and was proceeding to Amelia Island, when she was captured by the flotilla under the command of Commodore Campbell, and sent into the port of Savannah, where the vessel and cargo were libeled as prize. The ship was restored by consent, in the court below, as Russian property; the cargo was condemned as prize of war, and an appeal entered from that sentence by the claimant. The proofs of property consisted: 1. Of a recital in a power of attorney, from one Jones, the alleged agent, in London, of the claimant (who was stated to be a Russian merchant domiciled at St. Petersburg), to Mr. Diamond, the supercargo. 2. A certificate of property from the Russian Consul-General in London. 3. The testimony of Mr. Diamond, and other witnesses, taken in preparatorio, expressing their belief that the property was as claimed.

Charlton, for the appellant and claimant, offered to read affidavits in the nature of further proof.

Story, J. Until the cause is heard, further proof cannot be admitted.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. If, upon the opening, it appears to be a case for further proof, then it may be admitted instantly, unless, indeed, the court should be of the opinion that the captors ought to be allowed to produce further proof also. The cause is before us as if in the inferior court.

Charlton. We contend that it is a case entitled to further proof, and that there is no circumstance of fraud or mala fides to preclude it.

The Attorney-General, contra. It is incumbent upon the claimant to make out his title by competent testimony, according to the rules of the prize court; and if the court should be of opinion, that the property does not belong as claimed, the captors will be entitled to condemnation, without specifically proving to whom it does belong.¹ The recital in the power from Jones to Diamond cannot be sufficient to show the interest of Mr. Jademerowsky. *The recital in a deed binds only the [*114 parties, and those claiming under it; we are entitled to the production of the original power, duly authenticated.² The certificate of the Russian Consul-General is no proof of the real property.³ The failure on the part of the supercargo to testify, positively, as to the property, is, in the prize court, always held strongly against the title of the claimant. The cargo was purchased and loaded in a British port, and the ship had an alternative destination to a British colony. The voyage is different from that authorized in the original power from Mr. Jademerowsky to Jones; and, therefore, such power either never existed or it is falsified by the evidence, and must be repudiated by the court.

Pinkney, in reply, agreed that, in a suspicious case, restitution could not be demanded upon the original evidence; but, this is a case of further proof, and there is no evidence of fraud or unneutral conduct to preclude it. The documentary evidence expresses neutral account and risk. By the law of nations, the papers must be supported by the examinations in preparatorio; but, there is no determination which warrants the position, that the supercargo must swear to anything more than belief. He is, in this respect, in the same predicament with the master. In both cases, it is matter, not of positive knowledge, but of inference from the circumstances which *come to his knowl- [*115 edge. The consular certificate is a part of the ship's papers, and, as such, is necessarily a part of the documentary evidence in the cause. The recital of the procuration is said not to be admissible at common law; but, this court is now sitting as a court of prize.

The cause was this day ordered to further proof on the part of the captors and claimants.

Further proof ordered.

Usage also required that a procès verbal of the transaction should be copied from the journal, and signed by the parties, whose consent was necessary. But Valin informs us that these formalities were merely required in order to disculpate the master; that they were not of the essence of the contract, and the omission of them did not invalidate the security of the lender, who was not obliged to prove that the sums advanced had been appropriated to the use of the vessel; and he cites a sentence of the tribunal at Marseilles, of the 9th of August, 1748, in support of his exposition, which decision (he states) is founded upon the first law, s. 9, Dig. de exercitoria actione. He remarks that Loccenius, de Jure Maritimo, l. 3, c. 8, n. 7 and 8, Vinnius in Peckium, fol. 183, n. A., and Casaregis, Disc. 71, n. 15, 33 and 34, hold, that the lender should prove the necessity of the loan in order to prevent ship-owners from being the victims of the frauds and malversations of masters. But Valin alleges that this rule had been rejected by the usage of trade as too refined and subtle; and that to enable the lender to enforce his claim, it is sufficient to show that he had acted with good faith; that is to say, that there is no proof or sufficient presumption of collusion between him and the master. Valin sur l'Ordonnance, tom. 1, p. 442. See also Pothier, de Pret a la Grosse, n. 52. In the new Commercial Code of France, the further precaution is added of requiring that the master should obtain the consent of a tribunal of commerce, or justice of the peace, if the loan be made in France; if abroad, by the French Consul, or if there be no consul, by the magistrate of the place. Code de Commerce, liv. 2, tit. 4, Du Capitaine, art. 234. This amendment to the ancient law was made upon the suggestion of the Tribunal and Chamber of Commerce of Caen, who remarked, in their observations upon the original plan of the Code, that it but too often happened that ship-masters, in the course of their voyage, put into port upon the most frivolous pretext, and incurred expenses ruinous to the owners; which required the interposition of judicial authorities, who would certainly authorize no other expenses than those really urgent and necessary to the prosecution of the voyage. Espirit du Code de Commerce, par J. [LOCAL LAW.]

PRESTON v. BROWDER.

The act of assembly of North Carolina, of November, 1777, establishing offices for receiving entries of claims for lands in the several counties of the state, did not authorize entries for lands within the Indian boundary, as defined by the treaty of the Long Island of Holston, of the 20th of July, 1777. The act of April, 1778, is a legislative declaration explaining and amending the former act, and no title is acquired by an entry contrary to these laws.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of East Tennessee. This was an action of ejectment commenced by the plaintiff in error in that court. On the trial of the cause, the plaintiff produced and read in evidence an entry 116 made on the 25th of February, 1778, in the name of Ephraim Dunlap, for 400 acres of land in the point between Tennessee and Holston rivers. Also, a grant to said Dunlap, issued in virtue of, and founded upon, said entry, under the great seal of the state of North Carolina, dated the 29th of July, 1798; which grant was duly registered. The plaintiff also produced, and read in evidence, a deed of conveyance, with the certificates of probate and registration indorsed, from Dunlap, the grantee, to John Rhea. Also, a deed of conveyance from said Rhea to the lessor of the plaintiff. It was also proved that the land lies within the boundaries of what was the state of North Carolina at the time of making said entry, and within the county of Washington; likewise, within the territory ceded by the state of North Carolina to the United States, in 1789, and within the now county of Blount, in the District of East Tennessee; that it lies on the south side of Holston River, and between Big Pigeon and Tennessee River, and west of a line described in the 5th section of the act of the general assembly of North Carolina, passed in April, 1778, chap. 3. Also, within the tract of country secured to the Indians in 1791, by the treaty of Holston, and that the Indian title thereto was relinquished in 1798, by the treaty of Tellico. The defendant produced, and gave in evidence, a grant from the state of Tennessee to himself, made out and authenticated in the manner prescribed by the laws of Tennessee, and dated the 18th of May, 1810, which covers and includes the whole of the land in his possession, and for which this suit was brought. 117 The plaintiff, by his counsel, moved the court to charge and instruct the jury, "that an entry was actually made with the entry-taker of Washington county, within which the land lay; that the entry was evidence that the consideration money was paid as required by law; that paying the consideration money, and making the entry, created a contract between the state of North Carolina and the said Dunlap, which vested a right in him to the land in dispute, and that it was not in the power of the legislature, at a subsequent period, to destroy the right thus vested, or rescind said contract, without the consent of the said Dunlap. That having the same land afterwards surveyed and granted, in the manner prescribed by the laws of North Carolina, vested in the said Dunlap and his heirs a complete title both at law and in equity; and, that the conveyance from Dunlap to Rhea, and from Rhea to the lessor of the plaintiff, vested a complete legal title in him, and, therefore, he was entitled to a verdict." Which charge and instruction the court refused to give to the jury; but, on the contrary, charged and instructed them, "that the said entry and grant were both null and void, and vested no title whatever in the said Dunlap, because, at the time of making said entry, and obtaining said grant, the land included therein lay in a part of the country where the laws of North Carolina had not authorized their officers to permit lands to be entered, or to issue grants therefor; and although the entry and grant might have been made in the form required by law, yet no interest whatever passed 118 from the state of North Carolina to Dunlap thereby, and, therefore, they ought to find a verdict for the defendant." A verdict was rendered accordingly, and a judgment pronounced thereon. To which charge and instruction the plaintiff's counsel excepted, and the cause was brought into this court by writ of error.

Key, for the plaintiff in error. The question in this cause turns upon the validity of an act of assembly of North Carolina of April, 1778, repealing a former act of November, 1777, c. 1, s. 3, under which the plaintiff's entry was authorized. It is an ex post facto law, which the state is incompetent to pass; its own courts have decided, that a law depriving a university of its lands was unconstitutional and void.¹ This court has determined that a law in the nature of a convention or contract cannot be so repealed as to divest rights of property previously acquired under it.² As to the Indian title, the usufruct only of this waste land was reserved to them; and the legislature might grant lands subject to the extinguishment of their title to the domain of property. This was a mere temporary arrangement, and the title of the natives was extinguished by the treaty of Tellico. There was, therefore, nothing to prevent an entry of lands anywhere within the territorial limits of North Carolina.

Pickens and Jones, contra.* 1. The *119 correct mode of ascertaining the nature and effect of the contract (as it has been called) between the state and the plaintiff, is by a reference to the plain interpretation of the act of 1777, connected with the local history of that period, and the circumstances of the entry. The law provides that entries may be made in the several counties of the state of all lands therein, not previously granted, and which shall have accrued to the state by treaty or conquest; most manifestly implying the necessity of a previous extinguishment of the Indian title. By the treaty of the Long Island of Holston, of the 20th of July, 1777, art. 5th, a boundary between the Indians and the whites is defined; and, by art. 6th, the Indians are guaranteed against all intrusion. The whole system of local laws establishes a police over the territory in question, with the express view of preventing the natives from being disturbed in the enjoyment of their rights. In 1778, finding that individuals, in the situation of the plaintiff, either wilfully or through mistake, had made entries within the Indian reservation, the legislature passed an act recognizing the limits fixed by the treaty of the year preceding, prohibiting future entries, and avoiding those already made within those limits. 2. But supposing the entry to have been valid as a claim, or right of pre-emption, against other citizens, it was not lawfully consummated by a subsequent survey and patent. Is the entry of such stern, unbending authority, as, by relation back, to dispense with the necessity of subsequent steps? Certainly not. By the act of 1783 the Indian 120 boundary was changed, in conformity with the treaty of Hopewell, and the issuing of grants for lands within the reservation was prohibited. The land in question continued by that treaty, and by a subsequent treaty made in 1791, between the United States and the Cherokees, within the limits of the latter. The survey and grant were made in opposition to all these treaties and laws; and, in 1789, North Carolina ceded to the United States this territory, in which the state of Tennessee was erected. In 1791 the treaty of Holston once more guaranteed the Indians against intrusion. So that the plaintiff's counsel has to bear up, not only against the municipal laws of the country, but against the most solemn pacts and conventions.

1.—Heywood, Trustees of the University v. Foy.
2.—6 Cranch, 87, Fletcher v. Peck.

Key, in reply. The plaintiff's right, commenced by a valid entry, could never be impaired by subsequent laws and treaties. The primitive Indian title was merely subordinate, and subject to extinction.¹ If, by the payment of the fees upon his entry, the plaintiff acquired an incipient right under the law then in force, it cannot be affected by any subsequent act. His grant is dated 1793, and a presumption thence arises that he had complied with all preceding requisites. The cession of 1789 contains a reservation for perfecting titles where entries had been made. The act of 1778 shows that the former law had allowed and countenanced entries in Washington county: it is not 121 a declaratory, but a repealing statute, showing that the first law had not been mistaken nor misconstrued.

TODD, J., delivered the opinion of the court, and, after stating the facts, proceeded as follows:

The question now to be decided by the court is, whether the charge and instructions required by the plaintiff's counsel ought to have been given, and whether the one given was correct.

In the construction of the statutory or local laws of a state, it is frequently necessary to recur to the history and situation of the country, in order to ascertain the reason, as well as the meaning, of many of the provisions in them, to enable a court to apply, with propriety, the different rules for construing statutes. It will be found, by a recurrence to the history of North Carolina, at the time of passing this act, that she had, but a short time before, shaken off her colonial government and assumed a sovereign independent one of her own choice; that, during the colonial system, by instructions and proclamations of the governor, the citizens were restrained and prohibited from extending their settlements to the westward, so as to encroach on lands set apart for the Indian tribes; that these encroachments had produced hostilities; and that, on the 20th of July, 1777, a treaty of peace had been concluded at Fort Henry, on Holston River, near the Long Island, between commissioners from the state of North Carolina and the chiefs of that part of the Cherokee nation called the Overhill Indians; and that a boundary between the state and the said Indians was *established. When [*122] the legislature of North Carolina were passing the act of November, 1777, establishing officers for receiving entries of claims for lands in the several counties within the state, it is improbable that the foregoing circumstances were not contemplated by them; and hence must have arisen the restriction in the act, as to lands "which have accrued, or shall accrue, to this state, by treaty or conquest." If this be not the ground or reason of the provision, it will be difficult to find one on which it can operate. It may be asked, where was the land which was to accrue by treaty or conquest, if not within the chartered limits of that state? If it was in a foreign country, or from a sister state, the restriction was unnecessary, because, in either case, it was not within the limits of any county within that state, and, of course, not subject to be entered for. The restriction must apply, then, to lands within the chartered limits of the state, which it contemplated would be acquired, by treaty or conquest, from the Indian tribes, for none other can be imagined. It is not, to be presumed that the legislature intended, so shortly after making the treaty, to violate it, by permitting entries to be made west of the line fixed by the treaty. From the preamble of the act, as well as other parts of it, it is clearly discernible that the legislature intended "to parcel out their vacant lands to industrious people, for the settlement thereof, and increasing the strength and number of the people of the country, and affording a comfortable and easy subsistence for families." Would these objects be attained by permitting settlements encroaching *on the lands lately [*123] set apart, by treaty, for the use of the Indian tribes? By provoking hostilities with these tribes, and diminishing the strength of the country by a cruel, unnecessary, and unprofitable warfare with them? Surely not. However broad and extensive the words of the act may be, authorizing the entry-takers of any county to receive claims for any lands lying in such county, under certain restrictions, yet, from the whole context of the act, the legislative intention, to prohibit and restrict entries from being made on lands reserved for Indian tribes, may be discerned. And this construction is fortified and supported by the act of April, 1778, passed to amend and explain the act of November, 1777, the 5th section of which expressly forbids the entering or surveying any lands within the Indian hunting-grounds, recognizes the western boundary as fixed by the above-mentioned treaty, and declares void all entries and surveys which have been, or shall thereafter be made within the Indian boundary.

It is objected that the act of April, 1778, so far as it relates to entries made before its passage, is unconstitutional and void.

If the reasoning in the previous part of this opinion be correct, that objection is not well founded. That reasoning is founded upon the act of 1777, and the history and situation of the country at that time. The act of 1778 is referred to as a legislative declaration, explaining and amending the act of 1777. It is argued that there is no recital in the act of 1778 declaring that the act of 1777 had been misconstrued *or mistaken by the citizens of the state; or, that entries had been made on lands, contrary to the meaning and intention of that act; and, that the 5th section is an exercise of legislative will, declaring null and void rights which had been acquired under a previous law. Although the legislature may not have made the recital and declaration in the precise terms mentioned, nor used the most appropriate expressions to communicate their meaning, yet it will be seen, by a careful perusal of the act, that they profess to explain, as well as to amend, the act of 1777. Upon a full review of all the acts of the legislature of North Carolina, respecting the manner of appropriating their vacant lands, and construing them in pari materia, there is a uniform intention manifested to prohibit and restrict entries from being made on lands included within the Indian boundaries. Therefore, this court unanimously affirms the decision of the Circuit Court with costs.

1.—6 Cranch, 87, Fletcher v. Peck.
Wheat. 1.

Judgment affirmed.

THE ASTREA.

An enemy's vessel was captured by a privateer, recaptured by another enemy's vessel, and again recaptured by another privateer, and brought in for adjudication. It was held that the prize vested in the last captor. An interest acquired in war, by possession, is devested by the loss of possession.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court for the District of Georgia. This was an enemy's vessel, captured by the privateer Ultor, in sight of Surinam, on the 17th of May, 1818; and on the 18th of June, 1818, recaptured by an enemy's vessel of war, about two leagues from the coast of Georgia, and, on the same day, recaptured by the privateer Midas, and brought into the port of Savannah for adjudication. The prize was adjudged to the last captors, by the decree of the court below, from which the first captors appealed to this court.

Charlton, for the appellants, contended that the prize interest vested in the first captors. He argued that the opinions of eminent civilians, and the practice of the continental nations of Europe, ought to prevail, rather than the decisions of the British courts of prize; which last are founded on reasons of commercial and naval policy, peculiar to England. Sir William Scott himself admitted that there is no general *rule,¹ but adopted the rule of condemnation, as most convenient for his own country; because, by protracting the period for the devesture of British interests, it places the property of British subjects upon a better and more secure footing than the rule adopted by any other nation. It gives a wider range to the jus postliminii, and enlarges the probability of recapture; a probability which is converted almost into a certainty by the maritime strength of Great Britain. Other nations, not having the same means of giving protection and security to captures, have adopted rules requiring a less firm and shorter possession, in order to divest the property. These rules are: 1st. That of immediate possession. 2d. That of pernoculation and twenty-four hours' possession. 3d. The bringing infra præsidia.² The first is held sufficient by Azuni;³ and though his own opinion is entitled to but little weight, it deserves consideration how far he is supported by authorities. It is the maxim of the civil law, that things taken from the enemy immediately become the property of the captors. Quæ ex hostibus capiuntur statim capientium fiunt. Grotius and Vattel are guilty of great inconsistencies in expounding the rule in question. Burlamaqui is clear and explicit, that mere possession immediately vests a title.⁴ Bynkershoek does not require a sentence of condemnation; and *he enumerates "fleets" among the præ-sidia,⁵ under the protection of which the thing taken may be considered as safe;⁶ so that a bringing into the territorial limits is not indispensable, because the fleet into which the captor brings his prize may be remote from the coasts of his country. It results, then, that the loss of the spes recuperandi is the true foundation of the rule established by jurists; it is this which consummates the title of the captors, and destroys the jus postliminii of the law of nations; it is the municipal code of England alone which requires a sentence of condemnation to perfect the title. 2. But, supposing the jus postliminii still to continue, it is a right to be asserted by the subjects of the state from whom the property has been captured. But is it competent for one citizen of the belligerent state to divest another of the incipient inchoate title he had acquired by the first capture? The recapture by the enemy might, indeed, enable the original owner to reclaim his property; if a sentence of condemnation be necessary, it might affect the title of a neutral purchaser; but the jus postliminii can have no operation as between the first and second captors.

Harper, contra, was stopped by the court.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. An interest acquired by possession, is devested by the loss of possession from the very nature of a title acquired in war. [LOCAL LAW.]

MATSON v. HORD.

The law of Kentucky requires, in the location of warrants for land, some general description designating the place where the particular object is to be found, and a description of the particular object itself.

The general description must be such as will enable a person intending to locate the adjacent residuum, and using reasonable care and diligence, to find the object mentioned in that particular place, and avoid the land already located. If the description will fit another place better, or equally well, it is defective.

"The hunter's trace, leading from Bryant's Station over to the waters of Hinkston, on the dividing ridge between the waters of Hinkston and the waters of Elkhorn." is a defective description, and will not sustain the entry.

APPPEAL from a decree in chancery in the Circuit Court of Kentucky. This cause was argued by Hughes and Talbot for the appellants, and Hardin for the respondents. It was, principally, a question of fact arising under the local laws of real property in Kentucky, for an outline of which the general reader is referred to the Appendix, note I., where [131*] *will be found an exposition of the elementary principles applicable to this class of causes.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

whether this was a case of salvage. Johnson, J., by whom the opinion of the court was delivered, stated that "the fact of the gift was established by a writing under the hand of the commander of the squadron of frigates, in these words, Je donne au capitaine, &c., in the language of an unqualified donation, inter vivos. In this case, the most natural mode of acquiring a definite idea of the rights of the parties in the subject-matter will be, to follow it through the successive changes of circumstances, by which the nature and extent of those rights were affected: the capture, the donation, the arrival in the neutral country, and the subsequent state of war. As between belligerents, capture undoubtedly produces a complete divestiture of property. Nothing remains to the original proprietor but a mere scintilla juris, the spes recuperandi. The modern and enlightened practice of nations has subjected all such captures to the scrutiny of judicial tribunals as the only practical means of furnishing documentary evidence to accompany vessels that have been captured, for the purpose of proving that the seizure was the act of sovereign authority, and not of mere individual outrage. In the case of a purchase made by a neutral, Great Britain demands the production of such documentary evidence, issuing from a court of competent authority, or will dispossess the purchaser of a ship originally British. (1 Rob., 135, The Flad Oyen.) Upon the donation, therefore, whatever right might, in the abstract, have existed in the captor, the donee could acquire no more than what was consistent with his neutral character to take. He could be in no better situation than a prize-master, navigating the prize in pursuance of orders from his commander. The [120*] *vessel remained liable to British recapture on the whole voyage; and on her arrival in a neutral territory, the donee sunk into a mere bailee for the British claimant, with those rights over the thing in possession which the municipal law (civil and common) gives for care and labor bestowed upon it. The question then recurs, is this a case of salvage? On the negative of the proposition it was contended that it is a case of forfeiture under the municipal law, and, therefore, not a case of salvage as against the United States; that it was an unneutral act to assist the French belligerent in bringing the vessel infra præsidia, or into any situation where the rights of capture would cease; and, therefore, not a case of salvage as against the British claimant. But, the court entertains an opinion Wheat. 1.

This is an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court of Kentucky, by which the plaintiff's bill was dismissed.

The object of the suit is to enjoin the proceedings of the defendant at law, and to obtain from him a conveyance for so much of the land contained in his patent as interferes with the entry and survey made by the plaintiff.

The plaintiff claims by virtue of an entry made on the 17th of January, 1784, the material part of which is set forth in the bill in these words: "Richard Masterson enters 22,277½ acres of land, on treasury warrant No. 19,455, to be laid off in a parallelogram twice as long as wide, to include a mulberry tree marked thus, "F," and two hickories, with four chops in each, to include the said three marked trees near the center thereof; the said trees standing near the hunter's trace, leading from Bryant's Station over to the waters of Hinkston, on the dividing ridge between the waters of Hinkston and the waters of Elkhorn." This entry has been surveyed, he states, according to location, and that part of it which covers the land in controversy has been assigned to him.

The validity of this entry constitutes the most essential point in the present controversy. If it cannot be sustained, there is an end of the plaintiff's title; *if it can, other points [*132 arise in the case which must be decided.

This question depends on the construction of that clause in the land law which requires that unfavorable to both those objections. This could not have been a case within the view of the legislature when passing the non-importation act of March, 1809. The ship was the plank on which the shipwrecked mariners reached the shore; but to have cast into the sea the cargo, the property of a belligerent, would have been to do him an injury, by taking away the chance of recovery, subject to which they took it into their possession. Besides, bringing it into the United States does not necessarily presuppose a violation of the non-importation laws. If it came within the description of property cast casually on our shores, as the court is of opinion it did, legal provision existed for disposing of it in such a manner as would comport with the policy of those laws. At last, they could but deliver it up to the hands of the government, to be reshipped by the British claimants, or otherwise appropriated under the sanction of judicial process. And such was the course that they pursued. Far from attempting any violation of the laws of the country, upon their arrival they delivered it up to the custody of the laws, and left it to be disposed of under judicial authority. The case has no feature of illegal importation, and cannot possibly have imputed to it the violation of municipal law. As to the question arising on the interest of the British claimants, it will, at this time (war having supervened), be a sufficient answer, that they who have no rights in this court cannot urge a violation of their rights against the libellants. But there is still a much more satisfactory answer. To have attempted to carry the vessel infra præsidia of the enemy, would, unless it could have been excused on the ground of necessity, have been an unneutral act. But where every exertion is made to bring it into a place of safety, in which the original right of the captured would be revived, and might be asserted, instead of aiding his enemy, it is doing an act exclusively resulting to the benefit of the British claimant." A salvage of one-half [*130 was allowed by the court, and as to the residue, it was determined that it must stand on the same footing with other property found within the territory at the declaration of war, and might be claimed upon the termination of war, unless previously confiscated by the sovereign power. The court, therefore, made such order respecting it as would preserve it, subject to the will of the court, to be disposed of as future circumstances might render proper.

warrants shall be located so specially and precisely as that others may be enabled, with certainty, to locate other warrants on the adjacent residuum.

In the construction of an act so interesting to the people of Kentucky, it is of vital importance that principles be adhered to with care, and that as much uniformity as is practicable be observed in judicial decisions. This court has ever sought, with solicitude, for the true spirit of the law, as settled in the state tribunals, and has conformed its judgments to the rules of those tribunals whenever it has been able to find them established.

In the cases which have been, on different occasions, examined, that absolute certainty which would remove every doubt from the mind of a subsequent locator appears never to have been required. The courts of Kentucky have viewed locations with that indulgence which the state of the country, and the general character of those who first explored and settled it, would seem to justify; and have required only that reasonable certainty which was attainable in such a country, and might be expected from such men as were necessarily employed. The effort has been to sustain rather than to avoid entries; and, although the motives which led to this course of adjudication are inapplicable to late entries, made on land supposed to be previously appropriated, yet it is not understood that different rules of construction *have ever been applied to entries of different dates.

By these rules, a certainty to a common intent, a description which will not mislead a subsequent locator, which will conduct him, if he uses reasonable care and diligence, to the place where the objects are to be found, will satisfy the law, and sustain the entry; but such a certainty must exist, or the entry cannot be sustained.

A location usually consists of some general description which designates the place in which the particular object is to be found, and of a description of the particular object itself. The general description must be such as would enable a man intending to locate the adjacent residuum, by making those inquiries which would be in his power, and which he would naturally make, to know the place in which he was to search for the particular or locative call, so nearly that, by a reasonable search, he might find the object mentioned in that particular or locative call, and avoid the land located. If the description will fit a different place better, or equally well, it is too defective, because, if it does not mislead the subsequent locator, it leaves him in doubt where to search.

The general description in this case is, "the hunter's trace, leading from Bryant's Station over to the waters of Hinkston, on the dividing ridge between the waters of Hinkston and the waters of Elkhorn."

Will this description designate the place in which the trees called for in the location are to be found?

134*] *Bryant's Station is a fixed place of public notoriety. It is on the great road leading from Lexington to Limestone, on the Ohio, which road crosses the dividing ridge between the waters of Elkhorn and Licking, which is the ridge mentioned in Masterson's entry. This road had been traveled by hunters, but seems to have been known by the name of the Blue Lick, or buffalo trace, and not by the name of the hunter's trace.

A trace which was, at the time, called the hunter's trace, leaves this great road at Bryant's Station, and proceeds in a direction west of north, until it crosses North Elkhorn, where it divides; the left-hand, or more western trace, after entering a road leading from Lexington to Riddle's Station, on Licking, or that branch of Licking called Hinkston, crosses the dividing ridge about the head waters of a creek now called Townsend, which empties into the stream running by Riddle's Station a little above that station. This creek was, in the year 1784, known by the name of Hinkston Creek, or, perhaps, Hinkston's Mill Creek.

The right, or more eastern fork, again divides nearly two miles before it reaches the dividing ridge. Each of these traces crosses the dividing ridge to the head waters of Cooper's Run, which empties into Stoner's Fork. The more eastern of them crosses Stoner's Fork, and, passing Mastin's Station, terminates very near that place. Cooper's Run empties into Stoner's Fork, which either empties into Hinkston, and then passing by Riddle's Station, empties into Licking; or, uniting with Hinkston, forms the *south [*135 fork of Licking, and passes Riddle's Station with that name. The river, from the junction between Stoner and Hinkston, seems to have been known both by the name of the South Fork and of Hinkston's Fork.

All these traces were, in fact, hunters' traces; but each of them, except that leading to Mastin's Station, was distinguished by some name peculiar to itself, generally by the station or place to which it led, as Riddle's trace, the Blue Lick trace, &c.; and no one of them, except that leading to Mastin's, was notoriously and pre-eminently called "the hunter's trace." There is some testimony that this was also known by the name of Mastin's trace; but the great mass of testimony in the cause proves, incontrovertibly, that this trace was known and distinguished, generally, by the peculiar appellation of "the hunter's trace." It is on this trace that the location was made.

The hunter's trace, then, used in such a manner as to satisfy those interested in the inquiry, that it was intended to be employed as the name of some particular trace, would have been considered as designating the trace leading from Bryant's to Mastin's Station, and would have been sufficient to show that the lands located by Masterson were on that trace. Had no further description of it been attempted, but the trees called for had been said to stand on "the hunter's trace," where it crosses the dividing ridge between the waters of Hinkston and Elkhorn, it would have been clear that the trace was referred to by its name of greatest notoriety, by a name *which no other trace re- [*136 ceived; and, both the trace and the part of the trace where the objects specially called for must be found, would have been designated with sufficient certainty. There is no evidence in this cause, nor is the court apprised that any other trace, distinguished as "the hunter's trace," led from any other place than Bryant's Station, over the dividing ridge between the waters of Elkhorn and Hinkston, and, consequently, a reference to this trace, by its name, was all that was necessary for its designation, and would have designated it most unequivocally. But a further description has been attempted, and this has produced the difficulty felt in deciding this cause.

It will not be pretended that the locator was confined to this reference to the name, or might not add to the description, and make it more minute; but if, in doing so, he has destroyed its certainty, if he has created doubts with respect to the trace intended, which may mislead subsequent locators, the validity of his location becomes questionable.

The words added to "the hunter's trace" are, "leading from Bryant's Station over to the waters of Hinkston."

These words are not unmeaning, nor does the court feel itself authorized to reject them as surplusage; nor do they form any part of the name of the trace. Why, then, are they introduced? Subsequent locators might consider them as explanatory of the words "the hunter's trace." If they are so explanatory, there is, certainly, much plausibility afforded to the conclusion that the locator did not 137 mean to refer to the trace by its name; for if such was his intention (there being no other trace of the same name), a further description would be unnecessary, and a more particular description would be impossible. Perplexity and confusion may be introduced, but an object cannot be rendered more certain than by bestowing on it its particular and appropriate name, if that name be one of general notoriety. The court felt the force of the argument, that "the hunter's trace," leading from Bryant's Station over to the waters of Hinkston, might be understood in the same sense with the words "the hunter's trace," or, "that hunter's trace which leads from Bryant's Station over to the waters of Hinkston." Understood in that sense, the additional and explanatory part of the description might be considered as its essential part, and might control the words "the hunter's trace," which, connected as they are in this description, are not incapable of application to other hunters' traces, though not usually designated by that particular name. If this were to be received as the true construction, there are so many other traces leading across this dividing ridge, from Bryant's Station to the waters of Hinkston, that all pretension to certainty, in this location, must be surrendered.

On this part of the case, the court has felt considerable difficulty; and it is not without hesitation that it has finally adopted the opinion that "the hunter's trace" is to be considered as referred to by its name; and, that the additional words, "leading from Bryant's Station over to the waters of Hinkston," 138 are nearly an affirmation that "the hunter's trace" does lead from that station to those waters. It leads to Stoner's Fork, which empties into, or unites with, Hinkston's Fork, which afterwards empties into the main Licking. These branches are, all of them, called Forks of Licking, and, therefore, it would seem to the court reasonable (as is indeed indicated by much of the testimony) that this ridge was rather considered as dividing the waters of Elkhorn from those of Licking than from those of Wheat. 1.

Hinkston. But Stoner's Fork, to which this trace leads, may, without impropriety, be denominated, as it sometimes has been denominated, "the Waters of Hinkston."

It cannot escape notice, that if this trace had been designated as that leading to Mastin's Station, it would have been freed from all ambiguity. But it has been decided in Kentucky, and necessarily so decided, that a locator ought not to be held to the most certain description of which the place is susceptible. A description which distinguishes it from any other, although a better or still more certain description might be given, is all that is required.

Having, with much difficulty, ascertained the trace, the next inquiry is, on what part of this trace the land entered by Masterson ought to lie. The location says, generally, "on the dividing ridge between the waters of Hinkston and the waters of Elkhorn." It has been objected that neither the side of the ridge nor the side of the trace is specified; and that, to search both sides of the ridge and of the trace, is imposing an unreasonable labor on subsequent locators. The court does not think so. *The ridge is not of such breadth 139 as to render the search on both sides the trace, from the foot of the ridge on one side, to the foot of the ridge on the other, a very unreasonable one. But the trees must be found on the ridge, and a subsequent locator is not bound to search for them elsewhere. The trees having in themselves no notoriety, it is the more necessary that the place on which they stand should be correctly described, and so described that persons interested in discovering them might know how to find them. Let us then examine the testimony to this point.

Richard Masterson, who made the location, proves the place where the trees stood. They are now cut down, but a mulberry stump remains, which is the stump of the tree he marked, is No. 33, west three poles from a white oak, now standing. He gives no description of the place.

Henry Lee was with Masterson when he marked the trees, and saw him mark them. They had been hunting on the trace on Cooper's Run; and, on their return, he says, "on the aforesaid trace, or path, after crossing the dividing ridge, near a small branch, waters of Elkhorn, Richard Masterson marked," &c.

This testimony would rather indicate that, in the opinion of the witness, the trees did not stand on the ridge.

Simon Kenton describes the crooked oak mentioned by Masterson and Jay: "It does not stand on the dividing ridge." On being further interrogated he says, "he well believes that the crooked oak stands on ground which is a spur of the dividing ridge which 140 leads down to the junction of the branches," which unite a small distance below the mulberry stump.

In the course of his examination, this witness says, that if he could not have found these trees on the ridge, and had found them where they stood, he should have taken them for the trees called for in Masterson's entry; but in no part of his testimony does he indicate that he would have searched for them on the spur where they stood.

Zachariah Easton, the surveyor, gives a very accurate description of the place. The mulberry stump stands between two branches, three poles from the eastern, thirty poles from the western, and forty-one poles from their junction. Along the trace, which crosses the branch several times, the stump is one hundred and ninety poles from the top of the ridge. The stump stands, not on the dividing ridge itself, but on a spur of the ridge, which does not continue along the trace, but takes a direction west thereof, and unites with the main ridge, as would seem from the plat, sixty or seventy poles west of the point at which the trace crosses it.

Not a single witness deposes that the stump is on the ridge.

No testimony has been offered to the court to induce the opinion that, in Kentucky, a spur of a ridge is considered as the ridge itself, and the contrary seems reasonable. Spurs sometimes extend for considerable distances, and are certainly distinguishable from the ridge from which they project. If, in this case, the trace had led up this spur, a subsequent locator might have considered it as a continuation of the ridge. But the trace does not lead up the spur. It crosses a branch after passing the spur, and then comes to the ridge. The court is of opinion that subsequent locators could not be expected to continue their search after reaching the foot of the ridge, and that the description fails in stating the marked trees to be on the dividing ridge, instead of stating them to be on a spur of the dividing ridge.

The decree, therefore, dismissing the plaintiff's bill, is affirmed with costs.

Decree affirmed.

TAYLOR v. WALTON AND HUNDLY.

A question of fact respecting the validity of the location of a warrant for land under the laws of Kentucky.

APPEAL from a decree in chancery in the Circuit Court of Kentucky. The cause was argued by Key for the appellants, and Talbot and Hardin for the respondents.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

142* "This is an appeal from a decree rendered in the Circuit Court of Kentucky, directing the appellant to convey to the appellees lands lying within his patent, which the appellees claimed by virtue of a junior patent.

In all such cases the validity of the entry which is the foundation of the title of the junior patentee is first to be examined.

This entry was made on the 4th of December, 1788, and calls to begin "in the fork of Chaplin's Fork, and the Beech Fork, and to run thence up Beech Fork to the mouth of the first large creek, which is called, &c., thence to run up the creek and up Chaplin's Fork till a line run straight across will include the quantity to exclude prior legal claims."

The places called for being proved to have been places of notoriety which could not be mistaken, no want of certainty can be ascribed to this location, unless it be produced by the words "to exclude prior legal claims." These words are obviously attached to the quantity, not to the beginning, or to the lines bounded by the creeks. They can then affect only the back line, which is to extend from one creek to the other. The locator seems to have supposed that this line might approach towards, or recede from, the point of junction between the two creeks, as the amount of prior legal claims might require; that a location could adapt itself to circumstances, could assimilate itself to an elastic substance, and contract or expand as might secure the quantity of land it sought to appropriate. In this he was mistaken. The boundaries of an entry must be fixed precisely "by its own terms, and cannot depend [*143] on previous appropriation. So much of this entry, therefore, as would so extend the back line as to comprehend, in one event, more land than the quantity mentioned in the location, is utterly void. The back line must run as it would run if all the land was vacant. But it would be unreasonable that this futile attempt to extend the back line further than it is by law extendible, should destroy an entry. In all other respects certain. Accordingly, the courts of Kentucky, so far as their decisions are understood, have rejected such words as surplusage.

The entry of the appellees being good, it obviously comprehends, and has been surveyed to comprehend, the land of the appellant, and this brings us to the consideration of his title.

The appellant claims under an entry made by John Pinn, the 13th of May, 1780, in these words: "John Pinn enters 2,000 acres of land by virtue of a treasury warrant, on the dividing ridge between Chaplin's Fork and waters of the Beech Fork, about one and a half miles north of a buffalo lick, on a creek, water of the Beech Fork, about 25 miles from Harrodsburgh, and to extend eastwardly and westwardly for quantity."

The plaintiffs below allege, in their bill, that this entry is void on account of its uncertainty, that the survey is unlawful and contrary to the location, and, therefore, pray that the land so surveyed and patented may be conveyed to them. The Circuit Court determined that the entry was void, and decreed according to the prayer of the bill. From this decree the defendant *has appealed to this court, and [*144] the validity of Pinn's location forms the principal question in the cause.

The report of the surveyor, which is found in the record, is defective and unsatisfactory. He has neither placed Harrodsburgh nor the dividing ridge on the plat; the court is under the necessity of supplying these defects, as far as they can be supplied, from other testimony which appears in the record. From that testimony it appears that the ridge must extend from some point below Pinn's entry, up the creek near which it is made, now called Long Lick Creek; and that the trace leading up that creek was a trace leading from Cox's Station to Harrodsburgh. The inference seems inevitable that Harrodsburgh lay eastward from this location, since the trace leading up the creek to Harrodsburgh took that direction. The testimony must be understood as showing that in going up the Long Lick Creek you approach Harrodsburgh.

This is a material fact in the inquiry we are making. Harrodsburgh is admitted to have been a place of general notoriety, as are Chaplin's Fork, and the creek called for in Pinn's location. The dividing ridge between Chaplin's Fork and the waters of Beech Fork is also, of necessity, a place of notoriety, since the waters it divides are so.

The first call of Pinn's entry is for this dividing ridge; a general call for the ridge would be certainly too vague; but the land must lie on some part of it, and we must look to other calls of the entry to ascertain on what part. It is to 145 be about one and a half miles north of a buffalo lick, on a creek, water of the Beech Fork.

The question, whether this buffalo lick was, on the 13th of May, 1780, a place of such notoriety as to instruct a subsequent locator how to find Pinn's beginning, is one of some doubt. The degree of proof which can now be adduced, and ought now to be required, respecting such a fact, must be affected by many circumstances. The contiguity of stations, the number of persons who frequented that particular part of the country, and, above all, the lapse of time, will have their influence.

Richard Stephens deposes that he had traveled Powell's trace, which leads up the Long Lick fork, three times; understood there was a lick at the place, and thinks he was at it, but was not much acquainted with it.

Edward Willis became acquainted with this lick in 1781 or 1782; there were several other licks on the same creek, but this was the largest and most frequented. Its reputed distance from Harrodsburgh was better than twenty miles.

Joseph Willis hunted a good deal in that part of the country, and knew this lick; never knew but one buffalo lick, though there are a number of small licks. Its reputed distance from Harrodsburgh was upwards of twenty miles, but does not recollect whether it was a place of notoriety in 1780.

John Gritton calls it a buffalo lick, and has been acquainted with it ever since the month of June, in the year 1780. Its reputed distance from Harrodsburgh was from twenty to twenty-five miles. There are several other small licks on the creek, and one, a tolerably large one, lying on the south fork, a different creek from Long Lick; but no other than this was called a buffalo lick. In a subsequent part of his deposition he is asked whether this lick was a place of notoriety in 1780, and answered that he knew nothing about it at that time. This must be intended for the month of May, 1780, one month sooner than the date of his knowledge, or is a positive contradiction to his first assertion.

James Raig says that this lick was generally known by the hunters about Harrodsburgh, prior to the month of May, 1780; that he encamped at it with three hunters in the summer of 1776, and hunted about there; that there are several other licks in the neighborhood, but no other buffalo lick; that its reputed distance from Harrodsburgh, in 1781 or 1782, was about 25 miles.

This is all the testimony respecting the notoriety of the buffalo lick called for in Pinn's entry. Did the validity of this entry depend solely on the notoriety of the lick, a court would find some difficulty in pronouncing it too obscure an object to be noticed by subsequent locators.

But, admitting that the lick wants sufficient notoriety to fix of itself the place of Pinn's entry, still, it must be allowed to be an object easily found and easily distinguished, by those who are brought into its neighborhood by the other descriptive parts of the entry. Let us, then, inquire whether this entry does contain such description as would conduct a subsequent locator into its neighborhood.

The lick is within a mile and a half [*147] of the dividing ridge, on the south side of that ridge, and on a creek, water of Beech Fork. This description, which, though not expressly, is substantially given, precisely fits Long Lick Creek, and fits no other creek. The location calling to begin a mile and a half north of the lick, which lies on the creek, it is sufficiently apparent that no creek is crossed between the lick and the place on the dividing ridge, called for by Pinn's entry; consequently, the lick must lie on the creek nearest this dividing ridge. This is what has been since called Long Lick Creek, but which was then without a name, and could be designated only by description. A subsequent locator searching for this lick, would look for it, then, on Long Lick Creek. He is informed by the entry, that it lies on a creek so described as to be completely ascertained, about twenty-five miles from Harrodsburgh. The part of that creek, then, which lies about twenty-five miles from Harrodsburgh, is the place where he must search for this lick.

Walton and Hundly state in their entries that Powell's trace, which leads from Cox's Station to Harrodsburgh, and which arrives at Long Lick Creek a short distance above this lick, goes up the creek five or six miles. James Ray says that the trace leads nearly to its head; and the surveyor in his report states that it leads quite to its head. Long Lick Creek, then, heads between Harrodsburgh and this lick, and is the creek on which the buffalo lick must lie. The entry tells us it lies twenty-five miles from Harrodsburgh.

If an object be called for as lying on [*148] a creek, so described as to be distinguished and ascertained, twenty-five miles from a given place of general notoriety, which object has disappeared or cannot be found, it is understood to be settled, in Kentucky, that such location is not void for uncertainty, but is to be surveyed at the distance of twenty-five miles along the creek, from the place of departure. If the object be found and be identified, especially if it be such an object as would readily attract attention, and be easily distinguished, exactness in the distance is not required. On such occasions the distance was, in fact, seldom measured by the locator, and could not be measured in a straight line without the aid of a surveyor. The locator, in estimating distances, where they are considerable, is governed by general computation; and this is known to subsequent locators. Exactness of distance, then, is introduced for the purpose of giving certainty to locations, which can by no other means be rendered certain. Where the object called for is easily found and identified, the want of precision in distance will not defeat the location, unless the difference between the actual and estimated distance be such as to mislead subsequent locators.

James Ray says that the estimated distance from Harrodsburgh to the mouth of Hanger Run was 27 or 30 miles, and that the lick was about three miles nearer than the mouth of Hanger Run to Harrodsburgh. James Ray says, that the estimated distance from Harrodsburgh to the lick was about 25 miles, and that it lies 149 three or four miles above the junction* of the Beech and Chaplin forks. Several witnesses depose that the estimated distance from Harrodsburgh to this lick was upwards of twenty miles. The distance has been measured, and is in a straight line twenty miles and one quarter of a mile.

If this difference of distance could in such a case, when unaided, affect the entry, yet there are other circumstances which relieve it from this difficulty.

From the lick to the mouth of the creek on which it must lie, cannot in a straight line, amount to two miles. Measured along its meanders, the distance is about three miles. This fact is ascertained by the surveys made of the two entries. The farthest point, then, of this creek from Harrodsburgh, cannot, in a straight line, exceed twenty-two miles. But the lick lies, not at the mouth of the creek, but on the creek. The locator must, then, search for it up the creek, and nearer to Harrodsburgh. The extent of this search for such an object as a buffalo lick, an object to which he must be led by traces of the buffalo, which are in themselves so visible, so distinguishable, so readily found, cannot, without totally disregarding the whole system of Kentucky decisions, be pronounced too great a labor to be imposed on a subsequent locator. He is brought to the mouth of a creek, on which the object for which he searches lies; the object must lie up that creek, and cannot lie far from its mouth. It is an object discernible and distinguishable at a distance, and calculated from its nature to engage attention. He is within two miles of it on a straight line, and within three miles pursuing the meanders 150 of the creek; if he does not find *it, it is to his own indolence, not to the obscurity of the object or the difficulty of the search, that the blame attaches.

The lick being found, there is no difficulty in ascertaining its identity. The witnesses certainly say that there are many other licks on the same creek, and the surveyor has laid down two others; but they also say that no other lick was a buffalo lick. It has been stated and argued at the bar that, although licks are of very different dimensions, and the difference is immense between the extremes, yet the gradations approach each other so nearly that the exact line between them can scarcely be drawn. Admitting this to be true, yet there are licks which are indubitably buffalo licks, there are others which are as indubitably deer licks. Now, the witnesses pronounce, positively, that this is a buffalo lick, and that the others are deer licks. In addition to this, it is nearest to the mouth of the creek, and farthest from Harrodsburgh; consequently, it is nearer the distance required by the location. There is no doubt, then, respecting the identity of this lick.

The lick called for in Pinn's entry being found and identified, there can be no difficulty in finding his land. It lies one and a half miles due north of this lick, on the dividing ridge. The place at which the mensuration is to commence being ascertained, the rules established in Kentucky will give form to the land, and direct the manner of making the survey.

It is the opinion of this court that the decree of the Circuit Court is erroneous, and ought to be reversed; *and that the cause be re-[151 mandated to that court, with directions to order the land claimed by the appellant to be surveyed conformably to his location. In doing this, a point will be taken one mile and a half due north of the buffalo lick mentioned in Pinn's entry, from which a line is to be extended east and west, to equal distances, until it shall form the base of a square to contain 2,000 acres of land, which is to lie north of the said line.

Decree reversed.

J. & T. BARR v. LAPSLEY ET AL.

A question under a bill in equity, to obtain a specific performance of an alleged agreement to receive a quantity of cotton bagging, at a specified price, in satisfaction of certain judgments at law. Bill dismissed.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia. This cause was argued by Jones for the appellants and complainants, and Harper for the respondents and defendants.

JOHNSON, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The object of this bill is to obtain a specific performance of an alleged agreement to receive a quantity *of cotton bagging, at a [152 specified price, in satisfaction of certain judgments at law. The defendants deny that the circumstances proved ever rendered the agreement final and obligatory upon them; and this is the principal, perhaps the only, question the case presents.

It appears that the complainants were indebted to one West, who assigned this debt (then unliquidated), together with the residue of his estate, to Lapsley et al.; that Lapsley liquidated the debt with the Barrs, and took their notes payable at different periods, making up, together, the amount due. These notes having become due, and judgment being recovered on some of them; in October, 1811, the Barrs addressed a letter to Lapsley, in which they offer to pay him in cotton bagging, at thirty-three cents per yard, by instalments, at certain periods. On the 17th of December, in the same year, Lapsley answered their communication, and the following words, contained in that letter, are all that the court deem material to the point on which they propose to found their decision: "We are willing to take cotton bagging in liquidation of the three last notes, delivered at the period you propose, but not at the price you offer it." "We expect that you give us satisfactory accounts for the punctual performance of your engagements, and to this effect we shall direct Mr. M'Coun, to whom we propose to write by the next mail." On another passage of this letter, and a letter written by West, on the 18th of December, it has been contended that certain conditions were imposed [153*] upon the Barrs, which it was "incumbent upon them to comply with before they could claim the benefit of the offer contained in Lapsley's letter. But, as the opinion of this court is made up on a ground wholly unaffected by this question, we deem it unnecessary to notice this point. It appears that Lapsley never, in fact, instructed M'Coun on the subject of this letter of the 17th of December. But Warfield, the agent of the Barrs (who were absent from home on the receipt of that letter), supposing his principals to be referred to M'Coun as the authorized agent of Lapsley, notified to him the acceptance of Lapsley's offer, and remained under the impression that the agreement had become final, notwithstanding M'Coun's declining, altogether, to act, for want of instructions. Lapsley, on the other hand, alleges that the notification of acceptance ought to have been made to himself, and assigns the want of an answer from the Barrs as his reason for never having given instructions to M'Coun.

This state of facts presents an alternative of extreme difficulty. On the one hand, Lapsley, by writing that he shall direct M'Coun by the next mail, plainly pointed to a mode of expediting the conclusion of the agreement, through the agency of a representative on the spot, and when he intimated his intention to write by the next mail, showed that it was not his intention to await Barr's answer. This was well calculated to delude Barr into the idea that Lapsley would recognize no notification but that which should be made to M'Coun. On the other hand, how far could M'Coun, [154*] unempowered, uninstructed *as he was, legally act, to bind Lapsley by his acceptance of the notification? Or, if he had received instructions from Lapsley what obligation was he under to have undertaken the agency? Under the pressure of this dilemma, there is but one principle to which the court can resort for a satisfactory decision. Something remained for Barr to do. The notification of his acceptance was necessary to fasten the agreement upon Lapsley. For this purpose, he very rationally addressed himself, in the first place, to M'Coun; and the reference to Lapsley's letter would have been a sufficient excuse for not returning an answer until a reasonable time had elapsed for M'Coun to receive the expected communication from Lapsley. But when he found M'Coun uninstructed, and unwilling to act under the letter addressed to Barr, his course was plain and unequivocal. A letter to Lapsley, transmitted by the mail, would have put an end to all doubt and difficulty. This is the method he ought to have pursued, and for not having pursued this course, we are

DANFORTH'S LESSEE v. THOMAS.

The act of assembly of North Carolina, passed between the years 1783 and 1789, avoids all entries, surveys, and grants of lands set apart for the Cherokee Indians, and no title can be thereby acquired to such lands.

The boundaries of the reservation have been altered by successive treaties with the Indians, but it seems that the mere extinguishment of their title did not subject the land to appropriations, unless expressly authorized by the legislature.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of East Tennessee. This cause, depending mainly on the same principles with the preceding case of Preston v. Brouder,² was argued by Key for the plaintiff, and by Jones for the defendant in error. The facts are fully stated in the opinion of the court.

*TODD, J., delivered the opinion of [*156 the court as follows:

This was an action of ejectment brought by the plaintiff in error against the defendant in error. On the trial of the cause in the Circuit Court, it appeared from evidence that the land in controversy was situate in the tract of country lying south of Holston and French broad river, and between the rivers Tennessee and Big Pigeon, the Indian title to which was extinguished by the treaty of Holston. The plaintiff claimed by virtue of a grant, issued by the state of North Carolina, bearing date the 26th of December, 1791. The defendant claimed under a grant from the state of Tennessee, bearing date the 2d of January, 1809. The defendant, by his counsel, objected to the grant under which the plaintiff claimed title being admitted in evidence, on the ground that it was for land which the laws of North Carolina had prohibited from being entered, surveyed, or granted. The court sustained the objection, and prohibited the grant from going in.

1.—In England the Court of Chancery will not, in general, entertain a bill for a specific performance of contracts for the sale of chattels, or which relate to merchandise, but leaves the parties to their remedy at law, where it is much more expeditious. One exception to this general rule is where the agreement is not final, but is to be made complete by subsequent acts, without which it would be deemed imperfect at law. (3 Atk., 383, Burton v. Lister et al.; 1 Pere. Will., 570; Bunb., 135; 10 Ves., Jun., 161.) The ground upon which a specific performance is refused, in these cases, is, that an adequate remedy exists at law, where damages may be recovered, and that the value of merchandise varies so much at different times, and under different circumstances, as to render it frequently unjust to compel a specific performance. But where the question was, upon what terms a party should be relieved against the penalty of a bond which had been forfeited, for not transferring stock at a given day, according to his agreement, the English Court of Chancery decreed him to transfer the stock in specie, and to account for all dividends accrued since he ought to have transferred it. evidence to the jury; whereupon a verdict and judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant. A bill of exceptions was taken to the opinion of the court, and the cause was brought up to this court by writ of error.

The correctness of the opinion of the Circuit Court depends on the sound construction of the act of the general assembly of the state of North Carolina, passed in 1783, c. 2, s. 5 and 6, whereby the lands, within certain limits therein designated (including the lands in controversy), are reserved for the Cherokee Indians, 157 and the citizens prohibited from entering and surveying lands within those limits. It is contended, on the part of the plaintiff, that this act cannot be construed, nor did the legislature mean to give the Indians a right of property in the soil, but merely the use and enjoyment of it. That the succeeding legislatures, by the acts of 1784, 1786 and 1789, have changed this reservation for the use of the Indians, and given unlimited access, for the purposes of making entries and surveys "to all lands not before specially located," and to "all vacant lands" within the limits of the state. Consequently, locations could be made, and grants issued to perfect titles of lands lying within the limits of the Indian reservation.

Whether the legislature had the power, or intended to give the Indians a right of property in the soil, or merely the use and enjoyment of it, need not be inquired into, nor decided, by this court; for it is perfectly clear that the 5th section of the act of 1783, c. 2, prohibits all persons from making entries or surveys for any lands within the bounds set apart for the Cherokee Indians, and declares all such entries and grants thereupon, if any should be made, utterly void. They had the power, and have declared, unequivocally, an intention to prohibit entries from being made within those reservations. The several acts of 1784, 1786 and 1789, although they contain general expressions, which, if taken singly, might seem to sanction entries and surveys for "all lands not before specially located," or to "all vacant lands," yet, when taken together, these general 158 expressions must be controlled by the restrictions and prohibitions as to the reservations for the Indian tribes. The reasoning used in the case of Preston v. Browder,¹ applies with equal, if not greater, propriety, to this case. And, although at different periods different sections of these reservations have been subjected to appropriation by entries and surveys, it has been in consequence of the several treaties with the Indians, by which the boundaries of the reservations have been altered, and the Indian claim extinguished; but it is believed that the mere extinguishment of the Indian title did not subject the land to appropriation, until an act of the legislature authorized or permitted it. Whatever doubts this court might entertain on this subject, were they now construing these laws upon the first impression, that doubt would be removed on a view of the case of Avery v. Strother, in the Reports in Conference, p. 481, decided by the judges of the Supreme Court of North Carolina. This is a decision directly in point, made by the Supreme Court of the state, construing the laws brought into the view of this court, and is decisive of this case. And, as this court have been uniformly disposed to pay great respect to the decisions of the state courts respecting titles to real estate, this decision has its full influence on the present question; and, therefore, the judgment of the Circuit Court is unanimously affirmed with costs.

Judgment affirmed.

THE ANTONIA JOHANNA.

A neutral ship was chartered for a voyage from London to St. Michaels, thence to Fayal, thence to St. Petersburg or any port in the Baltic, and back to London, at the freight of 1,000 guineas. On her passage to St. Michaels she was captured and brought into the port of Wilmington, N. C., for adjudication. A part of the cargo was condemned, and part restored.

The freight was held to be chargeable upon the whole cargo, as well upon that part restored as upon that condemned.

Quære. Whether more than a pro rata freight was due to the master. It seems that the property of a house of trade in the enemy's country is confiscable as prize of war, notwithstanding the neutral domicile of one or more of its partners.

A PPEAL from the Circuit Court for the District of North Carolina. This was the case of a Russian ship, captured on the 2d of June, 1814, by the privateer Herald, on a voyage from London to St. Michaels, and brought into the port of Wilmington, N. C., for adjudication. The ship was chartered by Messrs. Burnett & Co., a mercantile firm at London, for a voyage from London to St. Michaels, thence to Fayal, thence to St. Petersburg or any port in the Baltic, and thence to return to London, at the stipulated freight of one thousand guineas. The ship and cargo were libeled as prize of war, and, upon the hearing in the District Court, that part of the cargo which was not claimed was condemned. The residue of the cargo, excepting one moiety of certain *packages, claimed on behalf of Messrs. [*160] Ivens & Burnett, a mercantile firm at St. Michaels, was restored. The whole freight was decreed to be paid to the master, and charged exclusively upon the proceeds of the property condemned, and the moiety of the property restored to Messrs. Ivens & Burnett. From so much of this decree as respected the controversy between the captors and the claimants of the cargo, an appeal was interposed to the Circuit Court, where the decree was affirmed, and the cause was brought, by appeal from the latter decree, to this court.

Wheaton, for the appellants and captors. The cause may be divided into three branches:

1st. As to the claim for the three invoices of goods shipped by Messrs. Burnett & Co., of London, to Messrs. Ivens & Burnett, of St. Michaels.

2d. As to the remainder of the cargo.

3d. As to the order respecting the freight.

and that without regard to the national character of the individual. Thus, the produce of an estate in the enemy's country, belonging to a person domiciled in a neutral country, is liable to capture and condemnation.¹ This principle was adopted and confirmed by this court in the case of Mr. Bentzen, a Danish subject, resident in Denmark, whose claim to 80 hogs-161 heads of sugar, the produce of an estate belonging to him, in a West India Island possessed by the enemy, was rejected, and the property condemned.² So a vessel purchased bona fide in the enemy's country, by a neutral, continuing in her former trade, is good prize.³ And the property of a house of trade established in the enemy's country, though some of the parties may be domiciled in a neutral country, is prize of war.⁴ Apply these authorities to the present case: the share of Mr. Ivens cannot escape the same fate with that of his partner domiciled in London; the partnership is domiciled there, and his interest is so mixed up with hostile interests that it cannot be separated. These principles were recognized by a learned judge of this court, in the first circuit, in the case of the St. Jose Indiano,⁵ the decree in which was acquiesced in by the counsel. Their general spirit was adopted by that venerable tribunal, the Continental Court of Appeals in prize causes, and applied even to a treaty stipulation, that free ships should make free goods, which was held not to extend to a trade carried on by a neutral, but hostile in its nature.⁶ 2. As to the other portions of the cargo, the evidence to restore or condemn must come, in the first instance, from the documentary 162 evidence and the examinations in preparatorio. In this case, that is neither sufficient for condemnation, nor does it afford satisfactory grounds for immediate restitution; further proof ought, therefore, to be ordered. 3. The neutral master is undoubtedly entitled to his freight; but this is not to be charged, exclusively, upon the property condemned and ordered to be sold, whilst the property specifically restored escapes the burden which is imposed, solely upon the ground of an implied performance of the contract on the part of the master. The law says that capture is equivalent to delivery; it does not say that condemnation only is equivalent to delivery, and that, therefore, the portion of the cargo restored shall be charged with no part of the freight. On the contrary, in a case where the cargo had been unlivered, and the whole was restored upon the original evidence, the freight was held to be a charge upon the cargo, though it was not carried to the port of destination.⁷ But, here, a pro rata freight only ought to be allowed; but a small part of the whole voyage, for which the 1,000 guineas was stipulated to be paid, was to be performed in the service of this cargo, which was to be delivered at St. Michaels. The master was not bound to wait longer than the first adjudication; indeed, the unlivery completely dissolved the contract between him and the owners of the goods, and entitled the master to whatever freight he might have earned in their service.⁸

Gaston*, contra. 1. The captors can- [163] not now object that the freight, decreed in the court below to be paid to the master, was unreasonable in itself, or not chargeable to them. They have acquiesced in this part of the decree, and it has been definitively carried into execution. 2. The goods shipped to Messrs. Ivens & Burnett, of St. Michaels, were shipped by order, and on account and risk of that house of trade. The claim, the documentary proof, and the preparatory examinations, are perfectly consistent, and establish that a moiety of this shipment is the property of that house, the partners of which are domiciled in a neutral country; they must, therefore, be regarded as neutral by both belligerents, with reference to the trade which they carry on with the adverse belligerent, and with all the world. In the case of The St. Indiano it was insisted that the principle of condemnation applied in cases where a partner of a neutral house is domiciled in the enemy's country, and ships to such house, goods, the manufacture of that country; but the position was expressly overruled. Even if the hostile and the neutral house here consisted of the same partners, and the shipment was made from the hostile to the neutral partner, for their joint concern, it would, nevertheless, be contended that the share of the hostile partner was alone subject to condemnation. However sincere and profound a respect is felt for the learned judges, who are said to have decided that the belligerent character of one partner shall avail to condemn, and the neutral character of the other shall not avail to save, where the house has a domicile both in [164] the neutral and belligerent country; these supposed decisions cannot be reconciled with the dictates of justice, or the principles of reason, and it is, therefore, believed that they will not receive the sanction of the highest judicial tribunal of this country. 3. No specific ground has been taken by the captor's counsel to support the appeal as to the remaining portions of the cargo. The claims are verified by the documentary evidence showing the goods to have been shipped by order, and for the account and risk of persons, subjects of, or domiciled in, a neutral country.

Wheaton, in reply. 1. If the captors have im providently closed the door, in the court below, upon the question as to what amount of freight shall be paid to the master, it is still open as to whether any portion of the cargo is to be exempt from contributing to the payment of freight. That is, emphatically, a controversy between the captors and claimants; the master has nothing to do with it; he has been paid his freight, and gone away. The bringing in the vessel and cargo for adjudication, was not a wrong done by the captors to the claimants, who may ultimately prove to be neutral; it was an inconvenience to which the latter subjected themselves by lading their goods in the same vessel with enemy's property; and it is not for the captors to indemnify them by paying the freight of the neutral claimants' goods, as well as those which have become the property of the captors jure belli. 2. According to the claimant's counsel, the shipments by 165 Messrs. Burnett & Co. were *made by the hostile house, as the agents, and bona fide, exclusively on the account and risk of the neutral house. On no other ground whatever can this case be extracted from the principle of the St. Indiano; and, upon that ground, the whole of the property ought to be restored, according to the limitations of the principle stated by the learned judge in the case of The St. Indiano. It is the domicile of the house, and the nature of its trade, and not the belligerent character of one of the partners, that avails to condemn. And it is a doctrine that may be vindicated upon every principle of reason and justice. Upon what principle is the property of a neutral subject, personally domiciliated in the enemy's country, liable to condemnation? Not upon the ground that his original national character is lost, but that his property is undistinguishably incorporated with that of the enemy, and employed exclusively in carrying on his trade, and strengthening his resources. Is not the property of a house of trade, established in the enemy's country, wheresoever the partners may reside, in the same predicament? It is believed that the decisions cited to support these principles will be sanctioned by this tribunal; that they are corollaries from the rules of prize law which have already been sanctioned by it; that they are supported by all the analogies of that law, and are essential to its perfection as a system of jurisprudence impartially administered between belligerents and neutrals. The interest which a power at war has in maintaining the principles of these decisions, is obvious. What interest has a fair 166 and just neutral *in contesting it? His subjects may carry on their usual trade through its accustomed channels, untouched by the flames of war spreading on every side. Do they wish to export their commodities to the enemy's country, they may consign them to commission merchants there, or to their own supercargoes on board. Do they wish to import the productions of the enemy's country into their own, they may purchase them by the same instrumentality. Do they wish to become the carriers of both to every region of the globe, they may do it with impunity. A neutral merchant cannot, therefore, wish to be a partner in a house of trade in the enemy's country, unless for the purpose of lending his national character as a shield against the just rights of the other belligerent. It is by a more remote application of the same principle now contended for that the property of persons taken in breach of blockade, as contraband of war, or sailing under an enemy's license, is liable to be considered as enemy's property, pro hac vice. It is taken adhering to the enemy, clothed with his character, and inseparably blended with his interests. This rule is precisely settled by the positive adjudications of the British prize courts, and there is reason to believe is practiced in those of France and other countries. It is not one of those interpolations into the code of public law of which that great civilian by whom it is expounded has been accused. This is not like the rule which prohibits to neutrals, in the time of war, all trade not open in peace; nor like the rule which declares whole coasts and countries in a state of blockade, *without investing or [*167] besieging a single port; nor like that which extends the infection of contraband to a return voyage; nor that which swells the list of contraband, with every article however remotely useful in war. Nor is it a rule of recent invention; at least, there is no evidence that the cases mentioned in The Vigilantia, were decided contrary to the practice and opinions maintained by the British courts of prize, when this country was a portion of the British empire. 3. The remaining claims are said to be verified by the papers found on board. But how are these papers verified? It is well known that papers are a mere dead letter, unless supported by the testimony of living witnesses. When it is considered that the cargo was laden in the enemy's country, and the papers put on board by enemy shippers, only one of whom the master knows anything about, so as to be able to swear, even as to his belief, it is not too much to say that this part of the case requires further proof to justify restitution of the goods as claimed.

STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court, and, after stating the facts, proceeded as follows:

Upon the argument no specific objection was taken to the restitution of any of the property claimed, excepting that included in the claim of Messrs. Ivens & Burnett. This shipment was made by Messrs. Burnett & Co., of London, to Messrs. Ivens & Burnett, of St. Michaels, and the invoices declare the goods to be by order, and for account and risk, of the latter gentlemen. It is contended, in behalf of the *captors, that both houses are com- [*168] posed of the same persons, viz., William S. Burnett, who is domiciled at London, and William Ivens, who is domiciled at St. Michaels; and that the documentary evidence, and private correspondence, show that the shipment was made on account of the hostile house. If the fact of the identity of the two houses were material to a decision of the cause, it might furnish a proper ground for an order for further proof. But admitting the fact to be as the captors contend, we are satisfied that it can be of no avail to them. It is clear, from the whole documentary evidence, that this shipment was not made on the account and risk of the hostile house, but bona fide on the account and risk of the neutral house. It does not, therefore, present a case for the application of the principle, that the property of a house of trade in the enemy's country is condemnable as prize, notwithstanding the neutral domicile of one of its partners. On the contrary, it presents a case for the application of the ordinary principle which subjects to confiscation, jure belli, the share of a partner in a neutral house, where his own domicile is in a hostile country. And, on this view, the decision of the Circuit Court is entirely correct, and is consistent with the doctrines established in the cases cited at the argument.

The next inquiry is, as to the freight decreed to the master. As no appeal was interposed to the decree of the District Court, allowing the whole freight for the whole voyage, the question, whether more than a pro rata freight was due (a question which would otherwise have 169*) deserved grave consideration), *does not properly arise. The only discussion which can now be entertained, is whether the freight so decreed ought not to have been charged upon the whole cargo instead of being charged upon a portion of it. And we are all of opinion that it was properly a charge upon the whole cargo. Although capture be deemed, in the prize courts, in many cases, equivalent to delivery, yet the captors cannot be liable for more than the freight of the goods actually received by them. The capture of a neutral ship, having enemy's property on board, is a strictly justifiable exercise of the rights of war. It is no wrong done to the neutral, even though the voyage be thereby defeated. The captors are not, therefore, answerable in penam to the neutral for the losses which he may sustain by a lawful exercise of belligerent rights. It is the misfortune of the neutral, and not the fault of the belligerent. By the capture, the captors are substituted in lieu of the original owners, and they take the property cum onere. They are, therefore, responsible for the freight which then attached upon the property, of which the sentence of condemnation ascertains them to be the rightful owners succeeding to the former proprietors. So far the rule seems perfectly equitable; but to press it farther, and charge them with the freight of goods which they have never received, or with the burden of a charter-party into which they have never entered, would be unreasonable in itself, and inconsistent with the admitted principles of prize law. It might, in a case of justifiable capture, by the condemnation of a single bale of goods, 170*) *lead the captors to their ruin by loading them with the stipulated freight of a whole cargo.

On the whole, we are all of opinion that the decree of the Circuit Court ought to be affirmed, except so far as it charges the freight upon the property condemned, and the moiety claimed by Messrs. Ivens & Burnett; and as to this, it ought to be reversed, and that the freight should be decreed to be a charge upon the whole cargo, to be paid by each parcel thereof, in proportion to its value.

Decree affirmed, except as to the freight.†

1.—It has been held that the charter-party is not the measure by which the captor is, in all cases, bound, even where no fraud is imputed to the contract itself. When, by the events of war, navigation is rendered so hazardous as to raise the price of freight to an extraordinary height, captors are not, necessarily, bound to that inflated rate of freight. When no such circumstances exist, when a ship is carrying on an ordinary trade, the charter-party is undoubtedly the rule of valuation, unless impeached; the captor puts himself in the place of the owner of the cargo, and takes with that specific lien upon it. But a very different rule is to be applied, when the trade is subjected to every extraordinary risk and hazard, from its connection with the events of war, and the redoubled activity and success of the belligerent cruisers. THE NEREID. PINTO, Claimant.

Under the prize act of June 26th, 1812, and the act of the 2d of August, 1813, allowing a deduction of thirty-three and one-third per centum on "all goods captured from the enemy, and made good and lawful prize of war, &c., and brought into the United States," are not included goods captured and brought in for adjudication, sold by order of court, and ultimately restored to a neutral claimant as his property; but such goods are chargeable with the same rate of duties as goods imported in foreign bottoms.

THIS cause was originally brought into the Circuit Court by appeal from the District Court for the Southern District of New York, in which the property claimed by Mr. Pinto had been condemned as prize of war. The decree of the District Court was affirmed in the Circuit Court, September term, 1814, pro forma, for the purpose of taking the cause, by appeal, before the Supreme Court, for its final determination; which was accordingly done, and the decree of the Circuit Court reversed, February term, 1815, except as to the undivided fourth part which Mr. Pinto claimed of certain goods, part of the cargo, his claim to which was relinquished by his counsel, on the argument of the cause before the Supreme Court. All the other property claimed by Mr. Pinto, for himself and others, was ordered to be restored to him. The cause was then remanded to the Circuit Court, with directions to carry the decree *of the Supreme Court into effect; [*172 and the mandate for that purpose was filed in the Circuit Court, April term, 1815, and an order made in pursuance of the mandate. It was then stated, and made to appear to the satisfaction of the Circuit Court, that, after the Nereid and her cargo had been libeled by the captors, as prize of war, in the District Court, and after the condemnation thereof, except the parts of the cargo which were claimed by Mr. Pinto, and during the pendency of such claim, Peter H. Schenck, the prize-agent of the Governor Tompkins, entered the whole of the cargo of the Nereid at the custom-house of the city of New York, and secured the duties thereon; Mr. Pinto having consented that the goods which he claimed should be entered with the others, and be subject to the payment of such duties as they were by law liable to, without prejudice to his rights under his claim; that the prize-agent did enter the goods, so condemned (as also the said goods of which Mr. Pinto claimed the one-fourth), as prize goods, and bonded therefor for prize duties; but was required by the collector of the customs, and did enter all the residue of the goods claimed by Mr. Pinto, as neutral property, subject to the full duties payable on goods regularly imported in foreign bottoms, and bonded for the same accordingly. The goods claimed by Mr. Pinto were afterwards, and before condemnation, sold by the marshal of the district, together with the goods condemned, in pursuance of an order of the District Court, to which Mr. Pinto also consented, subject to the same reservation of his rights; and the proceeds *of the sales of the [*173 goods claimed by Mr. Pinto, after deducting the duties, were paid into court; the amount of the said duties having been paid by the marshal to the prize-agent, with the consent of Mr. Pinto, for the prize-agent's indemnity. The difference between the duties thus secured to be paid by the prize-agent on the goods finally restored to Mr. Pinto, according to the decision of the Supreme Court, and those which would have been payable on them, as prize goods, under the act of the 2d of August, 1813, entitled, "An act for reducing the duties payable on prize goods captured by the private armed vessels of the United States," amounted to $11,079.59. After the mandate and decree of the Supreme Court, respecting the restitution of the goods claimed by Mr. Pinto, was carried into effect by the Circuit Court, there remained in the District Court the sum of $18,771.63, being the amount of the net proceeds of the fourth part of the goods, Mr. Pinto's claim to which had been relinquished.

A motion was made in the Circuit Court on behalf of Mr. Pinto, that the prize-agent should be ordered to pay to him, out of any of the proceeds of the sales of the condemned part of the Nereid and cargo, and which were in, or might come to, his hands, the said sum of $11,079.59, the difference between the two rates of duties on the goods finally restored to Mr. Pinto, as before mentioned.

It then appeared to this court that three bonds had been given, by the prize-agent, for the duties on those goods which were thus ordered to be restored to Mr. Pinto; that the two of those bonds which first became due had been paid by the prize-agent; but that the last, which became payable on the 9th of February, 1815, and which was for the sum of $3,782.97, the collector had suffered, as he said, to remain unpaid until it should be ascertained whether the property, on which said duties were thus secured, was condemned to the captors or restored to the claimant. That after the mandate of the Supreme Court was returned to the Circuit Court, the collector required the prize-agent to pay this bond, and he paid the same accordingly on the 7th of April, 1815.

The court were divided in opinion on the point respecting the rates of duties chargeable on the goods so restored to Mr. Pinto; whereupon it was ordered that the said sum of $11,079.59 shall remain subject to the opinion of the Supreme Court, and that the residue of the $18,771.63 be paid to Mr. Schenck, as the prize-agent; and that the point on which the disagreement of the judges of the Circuit Court took place should be certified to the Supreme Court for their final decision thereon.

Hoffman, for the appellant and claimant. The statutes on this subject are: 1st. The Prize Act of the 26th of June, 1812, s. 14, which repeals the non-importation act, so far as respects goods "captured from the enemy, and made good and lawful prize of war;" and declares that such goods, "when imported and brought into the United States, shall pay the same duties as goods imported in American vessels in the ordinary course of trade," &c. 2d. The act of the 2d of August, 1813, which provides "that all goods captured from the enemy, and made good and lawful prize of war, &c., and brought into the United States, shall be allowed a deduction of thirty-three and one-third per centum." 3d.

The acts of non-importation, prohibiting the importation of British goods. 1. The goods in question being of British manufacture, could only be imported under the prize act, and the act of the 2d of August, 1813. They were captured from the enemy, for they were on board an enemy's vessel; they were taken as enemy's property; they were captured and brought in as good and lawful prize of war. 2. The character of the goods is determined at the time they were brought in; it is not to be determined by subsequent events: duties are payable on goods on their being first imported or brought in; and the prize act puts these goods on the same footing with other importations, and, of course, makes the duties on them payable at the same time. 3. The words "good and lawful prize of war" refer to the time of capture, and not of condemnation. By the very act of capture, the goods became prize; and being captured by a lawfully-commissioned vessel, were good and lawful prize. The expression "such goods" refers to goods so captured. They are to pay when brought in, and not subsequently, upon condemnation. 4. The condemnation does not make the goods prize of war; it merely puts an end to the jus recuperandi of the former owner, and gives a new title to the purchaser. The character of prize is, then, either confirmed by condemnation or lost by restitution. If the property is restored, it is released from the character it had before borne from the time of capture, and ceases to be prize of war, but being captured and brought in as such, is to pay the prize duties.

Pinkney, for the respondents and captors. The question now raised seemed to be settled by the decision in the case of The Concord, at the last term. But, independently of authority, the question is manifestly against the claimant. 1. The goods were not entered under the prize act, and the act of the 2d of August, 1813; but as neutral property imported in a foreign bottom, and having been sold, are evidently liable to the full duties on such goods, unless these acts authorize a diminution of them. 2. These acts do not authorize such diminution; the goods were not captured from the enemy, and have never been made good and lawful prize. They were taken from Mr. Pinto, who was no enemy, either in fact or constructively, according to the judgment of the court. If anything, then, has made them lawful prize, how has it happened that they have been restored? The claimant's counsel, to avoid the appearance of too bold a paradox, mitigates his conclusion on this head in such a way as proves nothing for the purpose of his argument. He ends with saying that these goods were captured and brought into the United States as good and lawful prize. He can scarcely, however, have intended to stop here; for if his conclusion goes no farther, it surrenders the whole argument, unless it can be shown that to seize and bring in as prize that which is not good and lawful prize, and never can become so, makes good and lawful prize of the thing so seized and brought in; or, in other words, that a seizure and bringing in, as prize, of neutral property, makes it, ipso jure, good prize, although the owner is, nevertheless, entitled to have it again, as not being good prize, and has, in fact, got it again accordingly. 3. The character of these goods, with reference to their liability to duty, was not determined at the time they were brought in. If they had been specifically restored, and withdrawn from the United States by the claimant, they would have been liable to no duty. 4. The words "made good and lawful prize" do not refer to the capture merely: the act speaks of the capture first, and then adds, "and made good and lawful prize." The capture, too, must be of enemy's goods, either in fact or in contemplation of law. To say that the goods are, by the act of capture, made good and lawful prize, because the capture is made by a lawfully-commissioned cruiser, is to drop more than a moiety of the definition of good and lawful prize, or, rather, to insist on that which is not an essential part of its definition. Prize may be made (as a droit) by a non-commissioned captor; but good and lawful prize cannot be made by any captor, unless the goods be liable to condemnation. It is the formula of a sentence of condemnation, to condemn the thing taken as "good and lawful prize" to the captors; and this not because it was taken by a lawfully-commissioned cruiser, [178*] but because, being so taken, it *was under all the circumstances subject to confiscation. 5. Capture gives possession; but it is the condemnation which ascertains that the things taken are good prize of war: until condemnation, it cannot be known whether they are good prize or not. But, certainly, it is self-evident, that after restitution it must be held that they were not good prize. The condemnation does more than destroy the jus recuperandi. It establishes what nothing else can establish—that the goods were lawful prize. Restitution, on the other hand, establishes, conclusively, that they never were lawful prize, although they might be justifiably seized, upon probable cause, as such.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court, that the goods were chargeable with the same rate of duties as goods imported in foreign bottoms, according to the decision in the case of The Concord, at the last term.

HEPBURN & DUNDAS'S HEIRS AND EXECUTORS.

A court of equity will decree a specific performance of a contract for the sale of land, if the vendor is able to make a good title at any time before the decree is pronounced; but the dismissal of a bill to enforce a specific performance in such a case, is a bar to a new bill for the same object.

The inability of the vendor to make a good title at the time the decree is pronounced, though it forms a sufficient ground for refusing a specific performance, will not authorize a court of equity to rescind the agreement in a case where the parties have an adequate remedy at law for its breach.

The alienage of the vendee is an insufficient ground to entitle the vendor to a decree for rescinding a contract for the sale of lands, though it may afford a reason for refusing a specific performance as against the vendee.

But if the parties have not an adequate remedy at law, the vendor may be considered as a trustee for whoever may become purchasers under a sale by order of the court for the benefit of the vendee.

Where the vendor is indebted to the vendee, and the sale is made in order to pay the debt, the vendor must pay interest from the time the debt is liquidated until he makes a good title, and the vendee is accountable for the rents and profits from the time the title is perfected until the contract is specifically performed.

THESE causes were appeals from the chancery side of the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia for the county of Alexandria. The causes were argued by Taylor and Swann for Hephburn & Dundas, and by Jones and Lee for Dunlop & Company.

It is only necessary that the plaintiff should be able to make a good title, at the time of the decree. Not necessary that his title should be perfect when bill was filed.

Such fact is immaterial except upon the question

The material facts upon which the questions now to be decided arise, are as follows:

Hepburn & Dundas being indebted to John Dunlop & Co., of Great Britain, on account of certain mercantile dealings which had taken place between those parties, the precise amount whereof was disputed, an agreement in writing was entered into on the 27th of September, 1799, between the said Hepburn & Dundas and Colin Auld, the attorney in fact of John Dunlop & Co., whereby it was stipulated that the parties mutually agreed to submit all matters in dispute, respecting the demand of Dunlop & Co., to certain arbitrators named in the agreement, whose award should be made on or before the 1st day of January following. That Auld, as the agent of Dunlop & Co., would, on the next day, to wit, the 2d day of January, 1800, accept, from Hepburn & Dundas, the sum which should be awarded to Dunlop & Co., in bills of exchange, or in Virginia currency, at the par of exchange; and upon such payment being made in either way, that Auld would give to Hepburn & Dundas a full receipt and [181*] discharge of all the claims and demands of Dunlop & Co., against them; that, in case Hepburn & Dundas should not, on the said 2d day of January, pay the amount of the said award, either in bills of exchange or money, they should, on that day, assign to Auld, as attorney of Dunlop & Co., in the fullest manner, a contract entered into in the year 1796, by Hepburn & Dundas, with a certain William Graham, for the sale of 6,000 acres of land lying on the river Ohio, for the recovery of which, on account of the non-payment of the purchase money by Graham, Hepburn & Dundas had brought an ejectment, which was then depending; that this assignment should be accompanied by a power of attorney irrevocable, to enable the said Auld to pursue all legal means to recover the possession of the land, or to enforce the payment of $18,000, the amount of the purchase money, whichever of these measures Auld might prefer. Hepburn & Dundas further stipulated not to interfere with the measures which Auld might choose to pursue for the recovery of the land or the purchase money, and, further, that whenever any suit brought, or to be brought, for the land, should be judicially determined, or otherwise settled, by an amicable compromise, Hepburn & Dundas would convey the same to the person who, by such determination or compromise, should be acknowledged to be entitled to it in the manner expressed in the contract with Graham. It was also stipulated that if the purchase money for the said land, with interest thereon to the 2d of January, 1800, should be insufficient to discharge the sum which might be awarded to Dunlop & Co., Hep- [182 burn & Dundas should, on that day, pay to Auld as much money as should make up the deficiency; and if, on the other hand, the said purchase money and interest should fall short of the sum awarded, that Auld would, on the same day, pay to Hepburn & Dundas the excess over and above the sum awarded. Lastly, it was stipulated, that if Auld should recover the land, and be enabled to sell the same for more than was allowed to Hepburn & Dundas, by the said agreement, together with the costs and expenses attending the recovery, Auld should pay to Hepburn & Dundas the expenses incurred in prosecuting the suit commenced by them for the recovery of this land. In pursuance of these articles, an award was made by the day mentioned in the submission, which award stated that the sum of £4,379 9 0½ sterling, including interest, would be due to Dunlop & Co. on the 1st day of January, 1800. This sum fell short of the purchase money and interest, due by Graham to the same period, the sum of £494 6 8, Virginia currency. Hepburn & Dundas having prepared a deed of assignment of Graham's contract, and a power of attorney, as stipulated in the above-mentioned agreement, offered to deliver the same to Auld on the 2d of January, 1800, which he refused to accept, because the deed recited, as a part of the consideration, that a release had been executed by Auld, of all the claims and demands whatsoever of Dunlop & Co. against Hepburn & Dundas, and because, as is asserted by Auld, of the interest to be allowed the opposite party for the delay of the performance. Jenkins v. Fahey, 73 N. Y. 355; McCotter v. Lawrence, 4 Hun. 107; S. C. 6 N. Y. 8. C. R. Hepburn & Dundas required Auld to execute [183] such a release prior to the *delivery of the deed of assignment. The suit of Hepburn & Dundas against Graham, for the recovery of the 6,000 acres of land, was prosecuted against his heirs; and in May, 1801, by a compromise between Hepburn & Dundas, and the defendants in the ejectment, judgment was rendered in favor of Hepburn & Dundas.

Without noticing, particularly, the conduct of those parties subsequent to the transactions of the 2d of January, 1800, as well as on that day, it may be sufficient to say, that if the tender made by Hepburn & Dundas was, upon the condition asserted by Auld, to have been annexed to it, and if, in consequence thereof, any legal advantage accrued to him, it was waived by his subsequent conduct. As late as February, 1807, Auld made a tender of the difference between the sum awarded to Dunlop & Co. and the purchase money and interest due upon Graham's contract, and demanded a deed; but this demand was made in a manner, and under circumstances, which this court, upon a former occasion, deemed unreasonable.

Things remained in this situation, until some time about April, 1801, when Hepburn & Dundas instituted a suit at law against Auld, for the difference between the sum awarded to Dunlop & Co. and the amount of the purchase money and interest due by Graham's contract on the 2d of January, 1800. About the same time a suit at law was commenced by Auld, against Hepburn & Dundas, upon the agreement of the 27th of September, 1799, to recover the whole sum awarded. In the first case, [184*] *this court, upon a writ of error, decided upon the pleadings (which were so drawn as to present the point), that Hepburn & Dundas had no right to demand of Auld a release of all claims and demands against Dunlop & Co., to be executed as a precedent act to the assignment of Graham's contract, and the delivery of the power of attorney; and, on that ground, judgment was rendered against Hepburn & Dundas.¹

In the other case, the pleadings presented the question, whether the recital of such a release in the deed of assignment offered to be delivered by Hepburn & Dundas, invalidated the tender. Upon a writ of error, it was decided, by this court, that the recital of the release could not impair the rights of Dunlop & Co., under the agreement of September, 1799, and that it formed no objection to the assignment; consequently, that the tender and refusal amounted to a performance, in like manner as if Auld had accepted the assignment; but that Hepburn & Dundas would still be obliged to execute a proper deed of assignment, and a conveyance of the land, whenever they should be required to do so. Judgment was, accordingly, rendered in this suit against Auld.²

Hepburn & Dundas having been thus defeated in their attempt at law, to enforce a performance of the agreement, filed a bill in equity, praying for a specific performance. The answer of Auld contained, among other objections to a specific performance, an allegation that the title of Hepburn & Dundas *to the land was defective. Hepburn [*185] & Dundas then set forth their title in a supplemental bill. This suit came on to be heard, upon an appeal to this court, at the same time that Auld's suit at law against Hepburn & Dundas, above mentioned, was decided. This court determined: 1st. That since Auld had, by his conduct subsequent to the 2d of January, 1800, waived all objections to the tender of the assignment of Graham's contract on that day, and did not refuse to receive a conveyance which was offered to be made by Hepburn & Dundas, in June, 1801, on account of any defect in the title, but for other reasons which would equally have operated with him had there been no such defect, Hepburn & Dundas would still be entitled to a specific performance if they could then make a good title. 2d. That the title appeared by the bills to be defective as to 208 acres, being Thomas West's part of Mrs. Bronaugh's 1,000 acres, and also his part of Francina Turner's interest in the same tract, and also on account of the failure to record Thomas West's deed to Hepburn & Dundas for 1,000 acres. For these defects in the title, the bill was dismissed.³

Presuming that this decree, which seemed to close forever the doors of a court of equity against Hepburn & Dundas, opened them to Dunlop & Co., to get rid of the contract altogether, Auld filed the bill which is now under consideration, stating, among other things, the previous and present inability of Hepburn & Dundas, to make a good title to this *land; and praying that the agreement [*186] may be set aside, and the debt awarded to Dunlop & Co., with the interest thereon, to be decreed; or that, if the court should consider Dunlop & Co. under an obligation to accept of the land, that only the reasonable value of the land at the time when Hepburn & Dundas's title to it was perfected, should be allowed. The bill also contains the general prayer for such relief as is consistent with equity.

Hepburn & Dundas seem to have given a very different construction to the above decree, and supposing that if, within a reasonable time after it was pronounced, they could remove the objections to their title which were pointed out in the decree, they might still call for a specific performance, they soon obtained a conveyance from the heirs of Thomas West, of all their right, title, and interest in and to this land, and on the 27th of March, 1809, less than a month after the decree of dismissal by this court, they offered to convey to Auld a good and sufficient title. This offer being refused, Hepburn & Dundas filed a bill against Colin Auld, as attorney of Dunlop & Co., setting forth their ability and readiness to convey an unexceptionable title to this land, and praying that Auld, or Dunlop & Co., might be compelled to accept of a conveyance, and to pay the difference between the agreed value of the land and the sum awarded.

These suits came on to be heard at the same time. In the suit brought by Dunlop & Co., against Hepburn & Dundas, it was decreed by the court below that Hepburn and the heirs of Dundas should pay to Dunlop & Co., or their agent, the sum of $33,060.37, being the amount

1.—1 Cranch, 321.

2.—5 Cranch, 262.

187*] of the sum awarded, *with interest thereon, at five per cent., from the 1st January, 1800, till the time of rendering the decree; but that the sum of $21,112, part thereof, might be discharged by a conveyance, within a certain time, of the above land to Auld in trust for Dunlop & Co. From this decree an appeal was prayed by both parties.

In the other suit, brought by Hepburn & Dundas against Auld, a decree was made, that upon the complainant's paying to Auld, as attorney of Dunlop & Co., the sum of $11,966.-37, and conveying to the said Auld, in trust for Dunlop & Co., on or before a certain day, the above-mentioned land, the said Auld, as attorney of said Dunlop & Co., should execute and deliver to Hepburn & Dundas such a receipt and discharge of all the claims and demands of Dunlop & Co. against them as the court might approve. From this decree both sides again appealed.

Against so much of these decrees as compel Auld to accept of a conveyance in trust for Dunlop & Co., in part discharge of the debt decreed to be paid by Hepburn & Dundas to Dunlop & Co., the following objections have been made, and are now to be considered:

1st. That Hepburn & Dundas were guilty of a fraudulent misrepresentation of the value of this land; and, also, of a wilful concealment of the defects in the title, whereby Auld was induced to enter into the agreement of September, 1799.

2d. A want of authority in Colin Auld to enter into an agreement for taking a conveyance of land in discharge of the debt due to Dunlop & Co.

188*] *3d. The refusal of Hepburn & Dundas to assign Graham's contract, on the 2d of January, 1800, except upon a condition which they had no right to exact, and their interference in the suit with Graham's heirs, and the compromise made with them, whereby (it is contended) they disabled themselves from executing the agreement of September, 1799.

4th. That the title to the land is yet defective.

5th. That the former decree, dismissing Hepburn & Dundas's bill for a specific performance, is a perpetual bar to the relief sought by their present bill.

6th. That Dunlop & Co. being aliens, and incapable of holding lands in Virginia, a court of equity will not compel them to execute their agreement, even if Hepburn & Dundas had been always in a condition to perform it on their part.

1. The first objection appears to be unsupported by the evidence. In respect to the value of the land, the representations made of it in the letters of Hepburn & Dundas to Dunlop & Co., and to Colin Auld, affirm no fact which is proved to be untrue. Those letters contain expressions of the opinion of Hepburn & Dundas, that the land was an ample security for the debt due to Dunlop & Co.; and it must be admitted, that in their letter to Colin Auld of the 6th of September, 1799, they seem to have indulged themselves in very extravagant notions of its value. But it is to be remarked that the grounds of this calculation are fairly stated in the letter, and an opportunity is afforded to Auld to inquire into them and to judge for himself; besides which, it should be recollected that Auld having agreed, in his letter *of the 4th [189 of September, two days before the date of this letter, to submit to the award of arbitrators, and to receive an assignment of Graham's contract at the stipulated sum to be paid by Graham, Hepburn & Dundas could have had no motive, at that time, to make an untrue representation of the value of the land. At no antecedent period does it appear that they had made an uncandid statement, upon this subject, to Dunlop & Co., or to Auld. Their opinion of the real value of the property might be incorrect; but a mistaken opinion of the value of the property, if honestly entertained, and stated as opinion merely, unaccompanied by an assertion, or statement, untrue in fact, can never be considered as a fraudulent misrepresentation. That Hepburn & Dundas intended no deception, is evident from the following considerations: 1. That the offer made by them, to Colin Auld, of this land, was that of a security only, for the debt due to Dunlop & Co., which was declined by Auld, upon the ground that if payment of the debt to Dunlop & Co. was to be postponed until the suit with Graham should be concluded, Dunlop & Co. ought to be entitled to all the benefit of the contract with Graham, and for this reason a proposition was made by him to accept an assignment of that contract, and to pay the difference between the purchase money and interest thereon, and the sum which might be awarded, in case the latter should fall short of the former. 2. That Hepburn & Dundas had, in the year of 1796, sold this land to Graham for the sum at which Auld agreed to take it, and as evidence of their opinion, that the *land had, since that sale, [190 risen in value, they had instituted a suit at law against Graham in order to avoid the sale, and to recover back the land. If any further answer to this objection be necessary, it may be sufficient to add, that the fraud now charged against Hepburn & Dundas was not thought of, and certainly not imputed to them, when the former suit of Hepburn & Dundas, for a specific performance, was depending.

As to the alleged concealment by Hepburn & Dundas of defects in their title, there is every reason to believe that they were unknown to them until some time in the year 1805, when they endeavored to remove them, and supposed they had done so. The only objection suggested by the special verdict in the ejectment was the want of a partition deed between the original grantees of this land, which objection this court has declared to be insufficient to bar Hepburn & Dundas from asking for a specific performance of the agreement.

2. The next objection to the decree below is, that Auld had no authority, in virtue of the power of attorney from Dunlop & Co., to enter into an agreement to receive land in discharge of the debt due by Hepburn & Dundas.

This, like the former, is a new objection, not thought of, or argued, as a reason against a specific performance in the former suit. It is unnecessary to examine, with critical nicety, the import of the expressions used in the power of attorney to Auld. He was empowered to sue for, and to compound and agree, for all debts due to Dunlop & Co., and, in *gen- [191 eral, to do all other lawful acts needful for those purposes, as fully as Dunlop & Co. could do. Under this authority he entered into the agreement with Hepburn & Dundas, which, there is no reason to doubt, he communicated in due time to his constituents, and it is perfectly fair to consider their acquiescence in that agreement as amounting to a ratification of it. It would be most inequitable to permit Dunlop & Co., at the distance of many years after this agreement was made, to controvert the authority of their agent, and to say they are not bound to perform it, although it must be admitted that, during all that time, it was in their power to enforce it against Hepburn & Dundas, had it been their wish or interest to do so.

3. The third objection to the decrees below, is the refusal of Hepburn & Dundas to assign Graham's contract on the 2d January, 1800, except upon a condition which he had no right to exact, and their interference in the suit with Graham's heirs, and the compromise made with them. In answer to the different parts of this objection, it might be sufficient to remark, that they were urged by Colin Auld in his answer to Hepburn & Dundas's former bill; that they were considered by this court, and decided to be insufficient to deprive Hepburn & Dundas of the relief prayed for. However true the allegation may be, that Hepburn & Dundas refused to assign Graham's contract, and to deliver the power of attorney to Auld on the 2d of January, 1800, unless Auld would first execute a release of all claims and demands of Dunlop & Co. against Hepburn & Dundas, yet [192*] the subsequent *conduct of Auld amounted to a waiver of all objections on that account: his, and his counsel's, letters to Edward Graham, in which he was asserted to be the assignee of the contract with Graham; his instructions to Cook to attend to the ejectment, and to get it brought to a speedy decision; his engaging counsel in that suit; and, in short, his whole conduct throughout the year 1800, all tend to prove that the transaction of the 2d of January, 1800, had not, in any manner, impaired the rights of the parties under the agreement now alleged to have been violated by Hepburn & Dundas.

As to the compromise said to have been made by Hepburn & Dundas with the claimants under Graham, their conduct, upon that occasion, appears to have been unexceptionable. That a judgment against those claimants, at an early day, was anxiously desired by Auld, and the assistance of Hepburn & Dundas to effect that object, was expected and required by him, is apparent from the above letters from him to Edward Graham, and from many other facts proved in the former suit. The endeavors of Auld to hasten the decision of the ejectment, and to obtain a judgment for the land, seem to have been unremitting, until some time in December, 1800, when he declined interfering any further in the business; but, neither then nor at any subsequent period did he express to Hepburn & Dundas a disinclination to obtain a judgment, nor did he forbid them from proceeding to effect it. It is objected, under this head, that Hepburn & Dundas, contrary to an express stipulation in the agreement with Auld, [193*] released *to the defendants in the ejectment the right which, as trustee for Auld, they had to demand mesne profits during the time that Hepburn & Dundas had been out of possession of the land; and, further, that they consented to permit those defendants to retain possession of the premises for a year after the judgment was rendered. Neither of these allegations are supported by the evidence in the cause. The agreement made by Hepburn & Dundas with the heirs of Graham, in relation to the costs of the suit and the mesne profits, disavows, in the most explicit terms, all power in them, and all intention to release either of those claims, but stipulates to indemnify those defendants against these claims, in case they should be made and enforced by Auld, who is declared to be alone entitled to make them. This contract of indemnity, therefore, did not amount to a release, nor did it impair the rights of Dunlop & Co. under their agreement with Hepburn & Dundas. As to the remainder of this objection, it is founded altogether upon the deposition of Mr. Sheffey, the counsel for Graham's heirs, which, as it is explained by the same witness in a subsequent deposition, proves no more than that such a proposition had been made by Edward Graham to Mr. Hepburn. That it was not accepted by him, is manifest by the judgment itself, which is unconditional, as well as by an agreement made between Hepburn & Dundas and Edward Graham, the day after the judgment was entered.

4. The next objection is, that the title of Hepburn & Dundas to this land, or to some [*194 part thereof, is still defective.

In the opinion given by this court, at February term, 1800, in the suit brought by Hepburn & Dundas, for a specific performance, the title was declared to be unexceptionable, except, 1st. As to 208 acres, being the part of Sarah Bronaugh's 1,000 acres, to which Thomas West was entitled as one of the heirs of Mrs. Bronaugh, and of Francina Turner, and, 2d. As to 1,000 acres, the original share of Thomas West, which had been conveyed by him to Hepburn & Dundas by a deed which had not been recorded. These defects have since been cured by a conveyance to Hepburn & Dundas by the heirs of Thomas West, bearing date the 20th of March, 1809, of all their title to the aforesaid parcels of land.

It is, nevertheless, contended that this conveyance is insufficient to pass a clear and undisputed title; inasmuch as the land may be bound by the claims of creditors, or of purchasers subsequent to the deed from Thomas West to Hepburn & Dundas. The answer given at the bar to these suggestions is entirely satisfactory to the court. If the land be exposed to the claims of subsequent purchasers or mortgagees under West, to be effectual against Hepburn & Dundas, the deeds must have been recorded within eight months after the death of West, at the latest period, either in the general court or in the district or county court where the land lies. Had any such deeds been so recorded, it was in the power of Auld to have proved the fact by the records *of some one of those [*195 courts, and the want of such proof destroys all presumption that any such conveyances were made.

As to judgments against West, they, too, must be of record; and, after a lapse of 10 years since his death, the court cannot presume the existence of such judgments. As to specialties in which the heirs of West are bound, if there be such, which is not proved, they cannot affect this land in the hands of a bona fide purchaser under those heirs.

5. The next objection made to the decrees below is, that the dismissal of the former bill of Hepburn & Dundas, for a specific performance, is a bar to their present bill for the same object. This objection is well founded. If a bill, by the vendor of land, seeking a specific performance of the contract, be dismissed on account of a defect in the title, the doors of a court of equity are and ought to be, forever closed against him, notwithstanding he should, afterwards, have it in his power to make a good title; unless, perhaps, in a case where an original bill, in the nature of a bill of review, might be entertained. But the present bill is not founded upon new matter, discovered since the hearing of the former cause, and which it was not in the power of Hepburn & Dundas to produce at that time. It is not pretended that he was ignorant who were the heirs of Thomas West, or that he could not as well have procured a deed from them before as after the former decree. His ignorance was not of a matter of fact, but of law. He erroneously supposed that his title was good, and on account 196 of the defects existing in it at the time of the decree, his bill was dismissed. The rule of the court of equity to decree a specific performance, if the vendor is able to make a good title before the decree is pronounced, is an indulgence which he is not entitled to by the terms of his contract. A majority of this court approves of the rule as a general one, but is not disposed to extend it as such. If, in a case peculiarly circumstanced, an extension of the time for completing the title would be proposed, and should be intended to be granted, the court would either continue the cause, in order to give the vendor time to perfect his title, or would dismiss the bill without prejudice.

The questions, then, which remain to be decided, are: 1st. Whether Dunlop & Co. are entitled to the relief for which they specifically prayed? and if not, then, 2d. Are they entitled to any other, and what relief, under the general prayer in their bill?

1. The relief specifically prayed for consists of two parts: 1st. That the agreement of September, 1799, may be rescinded, and the sum awarded with interest, decreed to be paid. If this should be denied, and Dunlop & Co. be compelled to receive a conveyance of the land, then, 2d. That the reasonable value only of the land at the time when the title was perfected should be allowed.

As to the first. Most of the objections which have been urged against the decree of the court below, for a specific performance, were relied upon by the counsel for Dunlop & Co., as sufficient to set aside the contract. These have already been considered, and the result has been 197 shown to be, that if the bill of Hepburn & Dundas, for a specific performance, were unaffected by the dismissal of their former bill, none of these objections would be sufficient to preclude them from the relief sought by their present bill. If so, they are insufficient to enable Dunlop & Co. to obtain a decree to rescind the contract. There are many cases in which a court of equity, although it would not decree a specific performance, will yet refuse to order a contract to be cancelled. The inability of the vendor to make a good title at the time the decree is to be pronounced, furnishes a very good reason for excluding him from relief in a court of equity; and yet it does not follow that the court will, for this reason merely, set aside the contract. Generally speaking, a court of law is competent to afford an adequate remedy to either party, for a breach of the contract by the other, from whatever cause it may have proceeded; and whenever this is the case, a resort to a court of equity is improper.

But if the contract ought not, in conscience, to bind one of the parties, as if he had acted under a mistake, or was imposed upon by the other party, or the like, a court of equity will interpose and afford a relief, which a court of common law cannot, by setting aside the contract; and having thus obtained jurisdiction of the principal question, that court will proceed to make such other decree as the justice and equity of the case may require. Whether inability in the vendor to make a title, is, of itself, unattended by some peculiar circumstances of hardship, sufficient to justify the court in setting aside the contract, need not now be 198 decided. This is certainly not a case where the exercise of this branch of equity jurisdiction can be fairly demanded by Dunlop & Co. Within a month after the recovery of the judgment against the heirs of Graham, Hepburn & Dundas tendered to Colin Auld a conveyance of the land, which was refused, not on account of any defect in the title, but for reasons which would equally have operated with him had there been no such defect. Immediately after the defects in the title were pointed out by this court, they were removed, and the conveyance of an unexceptionable title was tendered and refused. Had Hepburn & Dundas been in a condition to make such a title a month sooner, this court, instead of dismissing their bill, would have decreed a specific performance. Under such circumstances it would be inequitable to set aside the contract. The alienage of the complainants is urged as an additional reason for setting aside this contract. Although the incapacity of the purchaser to hold land might afford a reason for denying a specific performance upon the prayer of Hepburn & Dundas (a point, however, not intended to be decided), it is certainly insufficient to entitle the vendor, under the circumstances of this case, to a decree to rescind the contract. But the court does not mean to intimate an opinion that the terms of this contract did expose this land to the danger which is apprehended.

It appears by the contract, and the previous correspondence between these parties, that they contemplated a sale of this land, in the event of the contract with Graham being 199 rescinded, and that the proceeds thereof should be paid over to Auld, in discharge of so much of the debt due by Hepburn & Dundas to Dunlop & Co. as the purchase money due by Graham, with interest thereon to the 1st of January, 1800, would amount to; and this whether the land should sell for more or less than that sum. In this view of the case, the land was considered as a security for a stipulated sum, and Hepburn & Dundas were constituted trustees for whoever might become the purchasers of it. A conveyance to Auld or to Dunlop & Co. does not appear to have been contemplated. But if, in point of law, it should be true that Auld, by neglecting to proceed against Graham's representatives for the recovery of the land, in the name of Hepburn & Dundas, separated the interests of his constituents, this can surely afford no sound reason for setting aside the contract. It is sufficient if Hepburn & Dundas are able and ready to make a conveyance when they shall be required to do so.

2d. The other specific relief prayed for, is that Hepburn & Dundas may be credited on account of the land for no more than its real value in March, 1809, when a conveyance was tendered and refused. A decree of this sort would be an anomaly in the jurisprudence of a court of equity. It would be an affectation of decreeing a specific performance contrary to the terms of the contract upon which the decree is to operate. It would be, in fact, to make a contract for the parties altogether different from what they had made for themselves, and then to 200 decree "an execution of it. There is no precedent, and certainly no principle of equity to sanction such a decree. Either the contract of the parties must be executed according to the terms of it, or it cannot be executed at all.

The only remaining question, then, is whether, under the general prayer, the court can grant any and what relief.

There can be no question but that it is competent to Dunlop & Co. to ask for a specific performance of the agreement, so far as it can now be performed, although the court cannot now listen to a similar prayer from Hepburn & Dundas. But this is not the relief specifically stated in this bill; and it is supposed to be unreasonable to compel a specific performance under the general prayer for relief, in opposition to the specific prayer that the contract may be set aside. To this objection it may well be answered, that if it be improper to rescind, or to modify, the contract, nothing remains to be done, under the general prayer, but to dismiss the bill, or to decree an execution of the contract. But as the former cannot be presumed to be the object of the general prayer, it would seem to follow that an execution of the contract was intended to be asked for, in case the specific relief should be denied.

For these reasons the court will decree a specific performance, so far as it is practicable, and considering Hepburn & Dundas as trustees for the person or persons to whom this land may be sold, the conveyance will be decreed to 201 be made to such persons "as may become the purchasers of the land under the decree of this court.

The residue of the decree below, which allows to the complainants, Dunlop & Co., interest upon the sum awarded from the 1st of January, 1800, to the time of the decree, is objected to by Hepburn & Dundas, upon the ground that the purchaser of land, to whom neither a conveyance has been made or possession delivered, is to be considered in equity as the owner, and, of course, entitled to the rents and profits; and that the right of the vendor to the purchase money draws after it a correspondent right to demand interest upon the same until it is paid. Wheat. 1.

This, it must be acknowledged, is the general principle which prevails in the courts of equity.

But it would seem to be inequitable to apply it to a case like the present. Here the purchase money was in the hands of the vendor at the time the contract was made. It consisted of a debt due by the vendor to the purchaser, which the former bound himself by his agreement to discharge by bills of exchange or cash, or by an assignment of a contract for land, and a conveyance of a good title to it, and with money to make up any deficiency which might arise by the agreed price of the land falling short of the debt. Neither bills nor cash were paid, nor was the contract assigned or a conveyance made, for it turned out that the vendor could not make a good title to the whole of the land until March, 1809. They have always retained possession, and the land is, in reality, unproductive of profits in any measure equal to the interest on the *debt. This debt [202 unquestionably bore interest from the moment it was ascertained and agreed to be paid; and not having been paid, nor a tender of a good title to the land made until March, 1809, it would be highly unjust to stop interest on the debt until that period.

The written arguments of the counsel, which have been sent to the court, present two questions in relation to interest, which remain to be noticed. It is contended, by the counsel for Dunlop & Co., that interest ought to be calculated upon the sum composed of principal and interest, stated, by the arbitrators, to be due on the 1st of January, 1800, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, from that day. On the other side it is insisted that no more than 5 per cent. per annum should be allowed, and this not on the sum found by the arbitrators to be due, but upon the principal sum only.

The court is of opinion that, although the award does not direct the sum which is found to be due by Hepburn & Dundas to be paid to Dunlop & Co., yet it ascertains the sum which was due on the 1st of January, 1800, and the agreement upon which the submission was made, bound Hepburn & Dundas to pay that sum when it should be so ascertained. The two instruments, taken together, amount to a contract to pay a specific sum, and are clearly within the words, as well as the fair interpretation of the law of Virginia, passed in the year 1796, which fixed the rate of interest at 6 per cent. per annum. This principle being settled, it follows that the interest must be calculated upon the sum *ascertained by the [203 award to be due on the 1st of January, 1810. To separate the principal from the interest, even if the award furnished materials for such an operation, would be, in effect, to set aside the award, and to vary the agreement with which it is intimately connected.

It is therefore the opinion of the court that Hepburn & Dundas ought to pay interest upon the sum awarded by the arbitrators, after the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, from the 1st of January, 1800, to the 27th of March, 1809, when they were able to make, and did in fact tender, a good and sufficient conveyance to the agent of Dunlop & Co. From the 27th of March, 1809, interest ought to stop; but Hepburn & Dundas ought to account with Dunlop & Co. for the rents and profits of the 6,000

204*] DECREE.—These causes came on to be heard this 8th day of February, 1816, on the 205] transcript of the *records, and were argued by counsel, whereupon, it is decreed and ordered, that the decree of the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia for the county of Alexandria, in the suit of William Hepburn and the heirs and executors of John Dundas against Colin Auld, agent and attorney in fact for John Dunlop & Co., be reversed and annulled, and this court, proceeding to give such decree as the said Circuit Court ought to have given, it is further ordered and decreed that the said bill be dismissed.

And it is further decreed and ordered that the decree in the suit of John Dunlop & Co. against William Hepburn and the heirs and executors of John Dundas be reversed, each party paying his own costs in this court. And this court, proceeding to give such decree in the said suit as the said Circuit Court ought to have given, it is decreed and ordered that the defendants, William Hepburn and the executors and executrix of John Dundas, do, on or before the first day of April next, pay to the complainants, John Dunlop & Co., or to their agent or attorney, duly authorized to receive 206*] the *same, the sum of nine thousand one hundred and forty-three dollars and seventy-two cents, being the difference between the sum of nineteen thousand four hundred and sixty-four dollars and twenty-four cents, the value in current money at the par of exchange of the sterling debt stated in the award of William Hartshorne, William Herbert, and William Hodgson, to be due by Hepburn & Dundas to John Dunlop, with interest thereon after the rate of 6 per centum per annum from the first day of January, 1800, to the 27th of March, 1809, and twenty-one thousand one hundred and twelve dollars, the sum due upon William Graham's contract, on the first day of January, in the year 1800.

It is further decreed and ordered that the 6,000 acres of land in the proceedings mentioned, be sold at public auction to the highest bidder, at such times, in such proportions, and upon such terms as John Dunlop & Co., or their agent or attorney in fact, may direct, and that the proceeds of such sales be paid over to the said John Dunlop & Co., or their agent or attorney as aforesaid; and upon such sale or sales being made, it is decreed and ordered, that the said William Hepburn, or his legal representatives, and the legal representatives of John Dundas, deceased, do, by good and sufficient deed, or deeds, in law, to be prepared at the expense of John Dunlop & Co., convey the aforesaid land to the purchaser or purchasers thereof, in fee-simple, with a general warranty, and free from all incumbrances. And it is further ordered and decreed that the sales of the aforesaid land be made under the superintendence *of Colin Auld, the attorney in [207 fact of John Dunlop & Co., or of such other person or persons as the said Circuit Court may appoint, in case the said Colin Auld should decline to serve, or the said Circuit Court should see good cause to make such other appointment.

And it is further ordered and decreed that the defendants, William Hepburn and the executors and executrix of John Dundas, deceased,

1.—In the progress of society the defects of the common law to answer the exigencies of a civilized and commercial age became manifest. It was particularly in not furnishing an adequate remedy for the breach of contracts, where the spirit of the agreement required a specific performance, that these defects were disclosed. For, except in real actions and ejectment, where the proceedings are in rem, and the actions of detinue and replevin, where the thing sued for is specifically recovered, a court of common law uniformly gives a compensation in money for civil injuries, whether arising ex contractu or ex delicto. This remedy is frequently insufficient to repair the injury sustained by the parties, and to place them in the same situation they were in before the breach of the contract. Hence the origin of that jurisdiction, which, although it was long contested by the courts of common law, has at length been firmly established, and matured into a regular system. This system is, however, remarkably subject to the exercise of discretion according to the peculiar circumstances of each particular case. But few inflexible rules can therefore be laid down concerning it. Among those admitting of the fewest exceptions are the following: 1st. This equitable jurisdiction extends to all cases where either the res in dispute, or the party, is within the jurisdiction of the court; for it proceeds in personam as well as in rem, and wherever the land or other thing in controversy is not within its reach, it will compel the specific performance of an agreement by means of its appropriate process acting on the parties. 1 Ves. 447, 454. 2d. A specific performance will not be decreed of an agreement whereupon damages could not be recovered at law. But if an action at law cannot be maintained on account of a mere formal defect of the instrument, the agreement will be enforced in equity. 1 Ves. 256; 1 P. Will., 243. And there are also several other cases of exceptions to this general rule, where, although the agreement was void at law, a specific performance has been decreed, there being a clear ground for the interference of equity, according to the general rules of the court. 2 Eq.

Cas. Abr. 32 pl. 43; 2 Vern. 490; 2 P. Will. 243; 2 Vern. 24; 3 P. Will. 187. 3d. A specific performance will not be decreed where the parties have an adequate remedy at law. 8 Ves., Jun., 163; 2 Schoals & Lefroy, 553. And the court will exercise its discretion, and leave the contract at law, rather than compel a purchaser to take a doubtful title. 1 Ves., Jun., 555; 2 P. Will. 198; 2 Ves. 579; 1 Bro. C. C. 74; 4 Bro. C. C. 80; 4 Ves., Jun., 97; 5 Ves., Jun., 186. 4th. If the vendor can make a good title at the time the conveyance is to be made under the decree of the court, a specific performance will be decreed. 2 P. Will. 630; 1 Atk. 12; 10 Ves., Jun., 315; 5 Cranch, 202; 8 Ves., Jun., 555; 7 Ves., Jun., 202. 5th. In the construction of a contract, it is considered as executed from the time of its being entered into, unless some other time be stipulated for its execution. And so powerful is this rule, that by an equitable fiction, it is held to alter the very nature of things, to make land money, and, on the contrary, to make money land. Upon this principle, land which is sold is considered in equity as the property of the vendee from the making of the contract, and descendible and devisable as such. 2 Vern. 536; 1 P. Will. 872; 3 P. Will. 215; 7 Ves., Jun., 294. 6th. In decreeing the specific performance of an agreement, time may be dispensed with if it be not of the essence of the contract. 1 Atk. 12; 2 P. Will. 630; 5 Cranch, 202; 7 Ves., Jun., 273; 12 Ves., Jun., 326; 4 Bro. C. C. 329; 1 Ves. 450. But where there has been gross laches on the part of the plaintiff, a bill for specific performance will be dismissed. 5 Ves., Jun., 145, 738, 818; 4 Ves., Jun., 667, 686; 1 Bro. P. C. 27; 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 686, pl. 5. 7th. Fraud will vitiate a contract in equity as well as at law, and consequently a fraudulent agreement will not be specifically enforced. And the morality of a court of equity, if the expression may be allowed, is even more strict than that of a court of law in this particular, for suppresso veri, as well as suggestio falsi, is a ground for refusing to carry an agreement into effect. 3 Atk. 383; 2 Atk. 271; 1 Bro. C. C. 440; Ambli. 495; 10 Ves., Jun., 492.

THE ST. JOZE INDIANO.

LIZAUR, Claimant.

Goods were shipped by D. B. & Co., of Liverpool, on board a neutral ship bound to Rio de Janeiro, which was captured and brought into the United States for adjudication. The invoice was headed: "Consigned to Messrs. D. B. & F., by order and for account of J. L." In a letter accompanying the invoice from the shippers to the consignees, they say: "For Mr. J. L. we open an account in our books here, and debit him, &c. We cannot yet ascertain the proceeds of his hides, &c., but find his order for goods will far exceed the amount of these shipments; therefore we consign the whole to you, that you may come to a proper understanding with him." It was held that the goods were, during their transit, the property, and at the risk of the enemy shippers, and, therefore, subject to condemnation.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts. The ship St. Joze Indiano, bound from Liverpool to Rio de Janeiro, was captured and sent into the United States, as prize of war, in the summer of 1814. The ship and most of the cargo were condemned as British property in the Circuit Court, and there was no appeal by any of the claimants except in behalf of Mr. J. Lizaur, of Rio de Janeiro. The right of Mr. J. Lizaur, to have restitution of property belonging to him, at the time of capture, was not contested by the captors; but it was contended that the property in question, when captured, was at the risk of the shippers, Messrs. Dyson, Brothers & Co., of 209*] Liverpool. The bill of lading did not specify any order, or account and risk. The invoice was headed: "Consigned to Messrs. Dyson, Brothers & Finnie, by order, and for account of J. Lizaur." In a letter accompanying the bill of lading and invoice, of the 4th of May, 1814, from Dyson, Brothers & Co. to Dyson, Brothers & Finnie, they say: "For Mr. Lizaur we open an account in our books here, and debit him, &c. We cannot yet ascertain the proceeds of his hides, &c., but find his order for goods will far exceed the amount of these shipments, therefore we consign the whole to you, that you may come to a proper understanding with him." The house of Dyson, Brothers & Co., of Liverpool, and of Dyson, Brothers & Finnie, of Rio, consist of the same persons; goods claimed in behalf of the latter house were condemned on the ground that both firms represented the same parties in interest, and from this decision there was no appeal.

Harper, for the appellant and claimant. This case may be contrasted with those said to be similar. In the case of Kimmel and Alters,¹ on the authority of which this portion of the cargo was condemned in the court below, the claimants had ordered the goods shipped, but there was no evidence that they had paid for any part of the goods, or that they were charged to them by the shippers. In that case the breaking out of the war produced a change in the destination of the goods, and a complete control over them was retained by the vendor, which control was exercised by his directing his agent not to deliver them without payment in cash, in case war should have been declared before their arrival. The doctrine in the case of the Messrs. Wilkins,² fully bears out the present claim. In that case the mere right of stoppage in transitu was held to be vested by the shipper in his agent, to be exercised only in the event of insolvency. But in the case now before the court, the power of Dyson & Co. was limited to an arrangement for the payment of a certain part of the price only which remained unpaid. In the case of the Messrs. Wilkins no part was paid in advance, and the goods were not charged to the claimants, another circumstance which distinguishes it from the present. The case of Magee and Jones,³ and that of Dunham and Randolph,⁴ was a mere offer to sell, not a sale agreed to by the vendee, like that in the present case.

Dexter, for the respondents and captors. The case is clearly within the principles adjudged. Thus, it has been determined, incidentally, at the present term, in the case of Vun Wagenan,⁵ that property is not immediately vested in the correspondent by a purchase by his agent, by order, whether it be with the money of the former or latter. The case of Messrs. Wilkins was not a unanimous decision of the court, but is clearly distinguishable from the present. *Here there was no change of possession from the shippers; the goods were in their possession during the voyage, by their agent, the master; had the goods arrived, they would still have been in their possession, by their agents, the consignees. If the goods remained the property of the shippers at the time of shipment, and during the voyage, then they became the property of the captors, jure belli. They remained the property of the shippers, because they were consigned to their agents, to be delivered, contingently, to the claimant. Therefore the goods are confiscable as prize of war. The cases of Magee and Jones, and of Dunham and Randolph, are in point.

STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court, and, after stating the facts, proceeded as follows:

The single question presented on these facts is, in whom the property was vested at the time of its transit, if in Mr. Lizaar, then it is to be restored; if in the shippers, then it is to be condemned. It is contended, in behalf of the claimant, that the goods having been purchased by the order, and partly with the funds, of Mr. Lizaar, the property vested in him immediately by the purchase, and the contract being executed by the sale, no delivery was necessary to perfect the legal title; that nothing was reserved to the shippers but a mere right of stoppage in transitu and that if they had been burnt before the shipment, or lost during the voyage, the loss must have fallen on Mr. Lizaar.

212*] *The doctrine as to the right of stoppage in transitu, cannot apply to this case. That right exists in the single case of insolvency, and presupposes, not only that the property has passed to the consignee, but that the possession is in a third person in the transit to the consignee. It cannot, therefore, touch a case where the actual or constructive possession still remains in the shipper or his exclusive agents. In general, the rules of the prize court, as to the vesting of property, are the same with those of the common law, by which the thing sold, after the completion of the contract, is properly at the risk of the purchaser.¹ But the question still recurs, when is the contract executed? It is certainly competent for an agent abroad, who purchases in pursuance of orders, to vest the property in his principal immediately on the purchase. This is the case when he purchases exclusively on the credit of his principal, or makes 213*] an absolute appropriation and *designation of the property for his principal. But where a merchant abroad, in pursuance of orders, either sells his own goods or purchases goods on his own credit (and thereby, in reality becomes the owner), no property in the goods vests in his correspondent until he has done some notorious act to divest himself of his title, or has parted with the possession by an actual and unconditional delivery for the use of such correspondent. Until that time he has in legal contemplation the exclusive property, as well as possession; and it is not a wrongful act in him to convert them to any use which he pleases. He is at liberty to contract upon any new engagements, or substitute any new conditions in relation to the shipment. These principles have been frequently recognized in prize causes heretofore decided in this court.² In the present case, the delivery to the master was not for the use of Mr. Lizaar, but for the

1.—By the common law, the right of property in the thing sold is completely vested in the purchaser by the execution of the contract, subject to the equitable right of stoppage in transitu in case of insolvency, and where the bill of lading has not been, in the meantime, indorsed to a third person. But by the civil law, the right of property was not vested in the purchaser, unless the goods were paid for, or sold on a credit. Just., l. 2, tit. 1, s. 41. Pothier Traite de Vente, No. 322. But this rule is not copied by the Napoleon Code, which, on the contrary, adopts a principle similar to that of the common law. Elle (la vente) est parfaite entre les parties, et la propriété est acquise de droit à l'égard du vendeur, dès qu'on est convenu de la chose et du prix, quoique la chose n'ait pas encore été livrée ni le prix payé. Code Napoleon, l. 3, tit. 6, c. 1, No. 1583. The French Commercial Code also subjects the goods sold to the right of stoppage in transitu, by the vendor, upon the same condition, with our own law. Code de Commerce, l. 3, tit. 3. De la Revendication.

2.—In The Venus, at February term, 1814, on the consignees, a house composed of the same persons *as the shippers, and acting as their [214 agents. They, therefore, retained the constructive possession, as well as right of property, in the shippers; and it is apparent from the letter that the shippers meant to reserve to themselves and to their agents, in relation to the shipment, all those powers which ownership gives over property. It is material, also, in this view, that all the papers respecting the shipment were addressed to their own house, or to a house acting as their agents, and the claimants could have no knowledge or control of the shipment, unless by the consent of the consignees, under future arrangements to be dictated by them. In this view this case cannot be distinguished from that of Messrs. Kimmell and Alvers; and it steers wide of the distinction upon which Messrs. Wilkins' claim was sustained.³ The authorities also cited at the argument by the captors are exceedingly strong to the same effect. *The Aurora*⁴ approaches very near to the present case. There the shipment, by the express agreement of the parties, was, in reality, going for the use, and by the order, of the purchaser, but consigned to other persons, who were to deliver them if they were satisfied for the payment. And Sir William Scott there quotes a case as having been lately decided, where goods sent by a merchant in Holland to A, a person in America, by order, and for account of B, with directions not to deliver them unless satisfaction should be given for the payment, were condemned as the property of the Dutch shippers.

claim of Messrs. Magee & Jones, Washington, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, observed: "To effect a change of property, as between seller and buyer, it is essential that there should be a contract of sale agreed to by both parties, and if the thing agreed to be purchased is to be sent by the vendor to the vendee, it is necessary, to the perfection of the contract, that it should be delivered to the purchaser, or to his agent, which the master of a ship to many purposes is considered to be." And adverting to the facts of that claim, he further says: "The delivery of the goods to the master of the vessel was not for the use of Magee & Jones, any more than it was for the shipper solely, and consequently it amounted to nothing so as to divest the property out of the shipper until Magee should elect to take them on joint account, or to act as the agent of Jones."

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia for Washington county. The defendant in error, at June term, 1813, declared against the plaintiffs in error in assumpsit, upon an inland bill of exchange drawn by one Rootes on Renner & Bussard, and accepted by them; to which declaration they pleaded non-assumpsit, and issue was thereupon joined, and the cause was continued to December term, 1813. At that term the plaintiffs in error appeared 216] and *pleaded "that, after the last continuance of the plea aforesaid, to wit, the first Monday of June, in the year one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, from which day the plea aforesaid was farther continued here until this day, to wit, the fourth Monday of December, in the year last aforesaid, and before this day, to wit, on the nineteenth day of October, in the year last aforesaid, before the Superior Court of Chancery of the commonwealth of Virginia, &c., the plaintiff exhibited his certain bill of complaint against the defendants, &c.; and also against one Anthony Buck and one Miles Dowson, complaining and alleging in his said bill, that on the twelfth day of October, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve, Thomas R. Rootes drew his bill of exchange upon the defendants, &c. And the said defendants further say, that the plea aforesaid, for which the said defendants, by the said plaintiff in the said bill of complaint mentioned, are impleaded in the said Superior Court of Chancery as aforesaid, is for the same identical matter and cause of action, of, and for which the said plaintiff hath now impleaded the said defendants, Renner & Bussard," &c. To which the plaintiff replied the prior pendency of the suit in the Circuit Court; and the defendants rejoined in substance the same matters as contained in their plea, whereupon the plaintiff demurred specially. Upon which the court rendered judgment "that the plea of the said Daniel Renner and Daniel Bussard by them above pleaded, to the writ and declaration of the said Horace Marshall, and the plea of the said Daniel Renner and Daniel Bussard, by 217] way *of rejoinder to the said replication of the said Horace Marshall, and the matters therein contained, are not sufficient in law to preclude him, the said Horace Marshall, from maintaining his action aforesaid; therefore it is considered by the court here that the aforesaid Horace Marshall recover against the said Daniel Renner and Daniel Bussard, as well the sum of, &c., his damages," &c.

The cause was argued by Jones and Key for the plaintiff in error, and by Lee for the defendant in error.

STORY, J. delivered the opinion of the court:

The first question in this case is, whether the commencement of another suit for the same cause of action in the court of another state, since the last continuance, can be pleaded in abatement of the original suit. It is very clear that it cannot. A subsequent suit may be abated by an allegation of the pendency of a prior suit; but the converse of the proposition is, in Wheat. 1.

personal actions, never true. The decision of the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia overruling the plea was therefore correct.¹

*The next question is, whether the [*218] judgment rendered on the overruling of the plea ought to have been peremptory, or an award of respondeas ouster. This point is completely settled by authority. If matter in abatement be pleaded puis darrein continuance, the judgment, if against the defendant, is peremptory as well on demurrer as on trial.²

The last question is, whether judgment could be entered up for the plaintiff for the amount of his damages by the court, without a writ of inquiry. This, also, is completely settled by authority in all cases whether the action is brought for a sum certain, or which may be made certain by computation.³

v.

THE UNITED STATES INSURANCE COMPANY.

The insurer on memorandum articles is only liable for a total loss, which can never happen where the cargo, or a part of it, has been sent on by the insured, and reaches the original port of its destination.

Where the ship being cast on shore near the port of destination, the agent of the insured employed persons to unlade as much of the cargo (of corn) as could be saved, and nearly one-half was landed, dried, and sent on to the port of destination, and sold by the consignees at about one quarter the price of sound corn, this was held not to be a total loss, and the insurer not to be liable.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Pennsylvania. This was an action commenced by the plaintiff in error, upon a policy

NOTE.—The rule as now established by jurisprudence and practice, is that the criterion of damage over fifty per cent. is not applicable to articles insured free from average; and "where the case embraces some articles within and some without the memorandum, no abandonment for mere deterioration in value can be valid, unless the damage to the non-memorandum articles exceeds a moiety of the value of the whole goods insured, including the of insurance dated the 14th of December, 1812, on goods on board the brig Betsey, at and from Cape Henry to Lisbon, at a premium of six per cent., on which $5,000 were underwritten by the defendants, and valued at that sum, declared to be against all risks, except British capture, warranted American property. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court upon the following facts agreed by the parties: The cargo consisted of 4,406 bushels of Indian corn, 100 barrels of navy bread, and 20 barrels of corn meal. The brig sailed from Baltimore on the 11th of November, 1812, and from Cape Henry on the 13th of the same month. She experienced, on the voyage, many and severe gales of wind. On 220*] the 18th of December she passed the rock of Lisbon, and came to anchor about four miles below Belem Castle. She leaked considerably in consequence of the injury she had sustained from the severe gales to which she had been exposed. After passing the rock the wind died away, and the current being adverse, she came to anchor. The master and supercargo landed, went through the customary forms at Belem to obtain a permit to pass the castle, and then proceeded to Lisbon. The health boat visited the brig, and ordered her to get above the castle as soon as possible. On the 19th she was again exposed to a heavy and fatal gale, and drove ashore near to Belem Castle, the sea breaking over her, and the crew hanging by the rigging to preserve their lives. The supercargo considered both vessel and cargo as totally lost. By directions of the custom-house, as much of the cargo as could be got out was unladen by a number of French prisoners, who were employed for that purpose. The cargo was all wet, and the part of it which was then taken out was carried to the fort, where it was spread and dried. From thence it was carried to Lisbon in lighters, and was sold in the corn market by the consignee of the cargo. The quantity so saved and sold amounted to about 1,988 bushels, which was sold at 50 cents a bushel, whereas the price of sound corn was $2.25 a bushel. The supercargo petitioned for liberty to sell the corn at the place where it was first deposited and dried, which could not be granted, and he was obliged to submit to the custom of the place, and allow it to be sold at the corn market. *The brig was so [*221 completely wrecked that she was sold, with her materials, where she lay, in lots. Had the supercargo been left to the free exercise of his own judgment, he would not have attempted to save any part of the cargo, in consequence of the total damage, and the great expense of saving it. The net proceeds of the cargo were not much more than the expenses of saving it, including those of the supercargo. The port of Lisbon commences above Belem Castle, and the custom of the place is to discharge cargoes of corn between that castle and Cantara, which latter place is from one to two miles below Lisbon. The vessel never arrived at her port of discharge. On the 22d of December she was entered at the custom-house by the American vice-consul, which he said was necessary; but port dues do not attach to vessels till they pass the castle. Still, as part of the cargo was carried to Lisbon, the entry was made by the consul, and the dues were paid. On the 11th of March, 1813, the plaintiff, having received notice of the shipwreck, offered to abandon, which was refused. Upon these facts the Circuit Court gave judgment for the defendants, and the cause was brought by writ of error into this court.

Pinkney, for the plaintiff. By the shipwreck, and breaking up of the voyage, the plaintiff was entitled to abandon; and there is no distinction in law in this respect between memorandum articles and general articles. The wreck disabled the ship from transporting the commodity, and the insured was not obliged to *find another vehicle to carry it on. [*222 Here more than a moiety of the thing insured was annihilated, to say nothing of the deterioration of the rest. By the contract, it became the duty of the agent of the insured to labor about the thing; and, if the wreck and consequent damage justified the right of abandonment, what effect can the conduct of the supercargo have? The subsequent transportation can have no effect on the right of abandonment; the supercargo was compelled to carry it on by the Portuguese government for the supply of the capital. The law holds that the insured shall not abandon in the case of memorandum articles upon deterioration merely. This is not a mere technical total loss; it is the memorandum articles." Marcardier v. Ches. Ins. Co., 8 Cranch, 39 per Story, J.; 2 Phill. on Ins., sec. 1615; Aranzemendi v. Louis. Ins. Co., 2 Louis. R. 432.

About 1749 a stipulation was introduced in policies, that upon certain enumerated articles of a quality peculiarly perishable, the insurer shall not be answerable for any partial loss whatever. This stipulation is made by a memorandum at the bottom of the policy. Marsh. on Ins. 138, 139.

"From the first introduction of this clause in 1749 to the present time, the underwriter has never been held answerable, but where there has been a total loss of the articles mentioned in it." Per Justice Buller, cited Marsh. on Ins. 145; Idem. 149, 150.

An insurance against total loss, or with the exception of particular average, the two forms being equivalent, excludes a total constructive loss on account of damage to the article, so long as it remains in specie, and can be transported in the same ship, or another can be had to transport it, to the port of destination, so as to be there of value, as being the sort of article which it was at the time of being shipped. 2 Phill. on Ins., sec. 1767; *Brooks v. same thing as if the waves of the sea had washed this portion of the cargo up to Lisbon. The usage of the government, in compelling a sale in such cases, must have been equally known to both parties, and ought to operate equally on both.

Harper, contra. 1. A distinction is here attempted to be taken, on account of the nature of the peril by which the loss was occasioned. But the law prescribes that the insured must carry on memorandum articles, if possible, in another vehicle. No degree of injury, short of total destruction, will justify the insured in abandoning without making an effort to carry on the articles; and their actual arrival at the port of destination, no matter how, prevents abandonment.¹ Our policies contain no stipulation similar to those in the English, as to "standing of the ship," in the case of memorandum articles. Wreck cannot help the insured, where the consequence is the destruction of the voyage only, without the actual destruction of the thing. The right of abandonment exists while the peril of total loss exists; but when the article is saved from that peril the right no longer exists.² 2. The right of abandonment was not exercised in due time; not until after the peril had ceased. Memorandum articles may be abandoned while they are submerged, or the hand of the enemy is upon them; but here the loss of the voyage was repaired by other means found to carry on the goods before the abandonment is made.³ They were transported, not by violence, but according to the usage of the country; and the parties must be considered in law as having assented to this usage.

Pinkney, in reply. If the insured was not obliged to carry on the commodities, and he would have had a right to abandon at the time, nothing subsequent has divested it. The sole object of the memorandum clause is to exempt the insurer from liability for deterioration only, and the reason was the inherent tendency of these articles to decay. The destruction of the vehicle, and the destruction of the greater part [224*] of the things transported, justified the abandonment. None of the cases cited apply to this case; and the insurer knew of the usage as well as the insured. If this case be determined not to be a case justifying abandonment, on account of the saving of so small a part, what case of abandonment of memorandum articles can exist? The abandonment was in time, because made in good faith, and as soon as the insured knew of the peril.

WASHINGTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court, and, after stating the facts, proceeded as follows:

All considerations connected with the loss of the cargo, in respect to quantity or value, may at once be dismissed from the case. As to memorandum articles, the insurer agrees to pay for a total loss only, the insured taking upon himself all partial losses without exception.

If the property arrive at the port of discharge, reduced in quantity or value to any amount, the loss cannot be said to be total in reality, and the insured cannot treat it as a total, and demand an indemnity for a partial loss. There is no instance where the insured can demand as for a total loss that he might not have declined an abandonment, and demand a partial loss. But if the property insured be included within the memorandum, he cannot, under any circumstances, call upon the insurer for a partial loss, and, consequently, he cannot elect to turn it into a total loss. These principles are clearly established by the cases of Mason v. Skurray,⁴ Neilson v. The Columbian Insurance Company,⁵ Cocking v. Frazer,⁶ M'Andrews v. Vaughan,⁷ Dyson v. Rowcroft,⁸ and Magrath and Huggins v. Church.⁹ The only question that can possibly arise, in relation to memorandum articles, is whether the loss was total or not; and this can never happen where the cargo, or a part of it, has been sent on by the insured, and reaches the original port of its destination. Being there specifically, the insurer has complied with his engagements; everything like a promise of indemnity against loss or damage to the cargo being excluded from the policy. If the question turn upon the totality of the loss, unconnected with the subject of loss by deterioration of the cargo in value, or reduction in quantity, there is no difference between memorandum and other articles. If the loss be total in reality, or is such as the insured is permitted to treat as such, he is entitled to abandon and recover as for a total loss in the case of memorandum articles, but always with this exception, that he is not permitted to turn a partial into a total loss. Keeping this distinction in view, the loss of the voyage by capture, shipwreck, or otherwise, may be treated as a total loss. This is the doctrine in the case of Dyson v. Rowcroft, in which the right to abandon was placed, not upon the ground of deterioration of the cargo, but upon the justifiable necessity which resulted from it of throwing the cargo overboard; this was, in effect, the same thing as if it had, in a storm, been swept from the deck. Such, too, was the case of Manning v. Newnham.¹⁰ In Cocking v. Frazer no such necessity existed, and the breaking up of the voyage was attempted to be justified by the damaged state of the cargo, which, per se, did not justify the insured in putting an end to the voyage, and thus to turn a partial loss, for which the insurer was not liable, into a total loss. Magrath and Huggins v. Church establishes the same doctrine. Now, what is the present case? The ship being thrown on shore, within a mile or two from her port of destination, the agent of the insured employs persons to unlade as much of the cargo as could be saved, and nearly one-half was, by his exertions, landed, dried, and sent to the market at Lisbon, and sold by the consignees at about one-quarter the price of sound corn, leaving a very inconsiderable sum for the owner, after paying the expenses. Is not this precisely the case of Neilson v. The Columbian Insurance Company, and Anderson v. the same,¹ with this difference only, that in the first case the insured declined sending on the corn, when he might have done so, and, consequently, he was not permitted to turn a partial into a total loss by his own neglect; and, in the latter case, part of the cargo having been rescued from the wreck, before the offer to abandon was made, the insured could not claim as for a total loss, either on account of the injury which 227 the corn had sustained or of his own act in not sending it forward to its port of destination. In the case now before the court, the cargo which was saved was sent forward and sold at the port of its destination.

In addition to the cases above referred to, the cases of Biays v. The Chesapeake Insurance Company,² 228 and Marcadier v. The Ches- apeake Insurance Company,³ in this court, are strongly applicable to the present, and seem, in a *great measure, to settle it. But it is [*229] contended, by the counsel for the plaintiff, that if the loss be such *as that the insured [*230] might at one time have treated it as total, it continues to be so, unless at the time when the *offer to abandon is made clear of the [*231] effects of the peril, and in a condition to prosecute the voyage, it is restored to his possession. Now, this is certainly not the condition of property, which, at the time of the offer to abandon, is in the possession of a recaptor, who has a right to retain it until he is paid his salvage. But, in the present case, the corn never was out of the possession of the agents of the insured, who exercised every act of ownership over it, subject, nevertheless, to the laws and customs of the country to which it was sent, with which the insurer and insured are supposed to have been acquainted at the time they entered into this contract, and to which they impliedly agreed to submit. The cargo, which was landed, not only continued in the possession and under the direction of the agents of the 2.—February term, 1813. This was an insurance on hides, "warranted by the assured free from average, unless general." The declaration was for a total loss by perils of the seas; but it appeared in evidence that 3,288 hides (the whole number insured being 14,565) were put on board of a lighter, to be transported from the vessel to their place of destination; that the lighter, on the passage to the shore, was sunk, by which accident 789 of the hides, of the value of $4,000, were totally lost, and the residue, to the number of 2,491, were fished up and saved at the expense of $6,000, which were paid by the insured. The hides thus saved were delivered to his agent, and sold on his account. The whole sum insured on the cargo was $25,000. In delivering the opinion of the court, it was remarked by Livingston, J., that whatever might have been the motive to the introduction of this clause in policies of insurance, which was done as early as the year 1749, and, most probably, with the intention of protecting insurers against losses arising solely from a deterioration of the article by its own perishable quality, or whatever ambiguity might once have existed, from the term average being used in different senses, that is, as signifying a contribution to a general loss, and also a particular or partial injury falling on the subject insured, it was well understood at the present day, with respect to such articles, that underwriters are free from all partial losses, of every kind, which do not arise from a contribution towards a general average. It only remained, then, to examine (and so the question had been properly treated at the bar) whether the hides which were sunk, and not reclaimed, constituted a total or partial loss, within the meaning of this policy. It had been considered as total by the counsel for the insured, but the court could not perceive any ground for treating it in that way, inasmuch as out of many thousand hides which were on board not quite 800 were lost, making in point of value somewhat less than one-sixth part of the sum insured. If there were no memorandum in the way, and the plaintiff had gone on to recover, as in that case he might have done, it was perceived at once that he must have had judgment only for a partial loss, which would have been equivalent to the injury actually sustained. But, without having recourse to any reasoning on the subject, the proposition appeared too self-evident not to command universal assent, that when only a part of a cargo, consisting all of the same kind of articles, is lost in any way whatever, and the residue (which in this case amounted to much the greatest part) arrives in safety at its port of destination, the loss cannot but be partial, and that it must forever be so as long as a part continues to be less than the whole. This, then, being a particular loss only, and not resulting from a general average, the court was of opinion that the defendants were not liable for it.

3.—February term, 1814. This was an action on a policy of insurance for $31,000, upon any kind of lawful goods on board the brig Betsey, on a voyage from New York to Nantes. The cargo was of the invoice value of $29,800, of which $7,459 were in memorandum articles. The brig sailed on the voyage, but was compelled, by stress of weather and other accidents, to bear away for the West Indies, and arrived at Antigua, where the master applied to the Court of Vice-Admiralty for a survey; upon which the cargo was landed, and ordered by the court to be sold for the benefit of the concerned. Under this sale the net proceeds of the cargo amounted to $13,767, and of the memorandum articles to $6,863. The vessel was repaired within a reasonable time, and capable of performing the voyage with the original cargo, but the master abandoned the voyage at Antigua. Of the cargo 99 bags of coffee were spoiled and thrown overboard, and the residue greatly damaged by the perils of the seas; and the whole cargo, including the memorandum articles, sustained a damage during the voyage, exceeding a moiety of its original value. Within a reasonable time after receiving information of the loss, the plaintiff abandoned the whole cargo to the underwriters. The plaintiff contended that he was entitled to recover as for a total loss of the cargo insured, including the memorandum articles. Story, J., who delivered the opinion of the court, stated that a technical total loss might arise from the mere deterioration of the cargo, by any of the perils insured against, if the deterioration be ascertained at an intermediate port of necessity short of the port of destination. In such case, although the ship be in a capacity to perform the voyage, yet, if the voyage be not worth pursuing, or the thing insured be so damaged and spoiled as to be of little or no value, the insured has a right to abandon the projected adventure, and throw upon the underwriter the unprofitable and disastrous subject of insurance. It had, therefore, been held that if a cargo be damaged in the course of the voyage, and it appear that what has been saved is less in value than the amount of the freight, it is a clear case of a total loss. It did not, however, appear that the exact quantum of damage which shall authorize an abandonment as for a total loss had ever become the direct subject of adjudication in the English courts. The celebrated Le Guidon, c. 7, art. 1, considers that a damage exceeding the moiety of the value of the thing insured is sufficient to authorize an abandonment. This rule had received some countenance from more recent elementary writers; and from its public convenience and certainty, had been adopted as a governing principle in some of the most respectable commercial states in the Union, and was now so generally established as not easily to be shaken. 1 Johns. Cas., 141; 1 Johns. Rep., 335, 406; Marshall on Insurance, 562, note 92, Condry's edit.; Park, 194, 6th edit. But this rule has been deemed not to ex-insured, but it was relieved from the effects of the peril, as between the insurer and insured, and it was not only in a condition to prosecute the voyage, but it did in reality complete it. Upon the whole, it is the opinion of the court that this is not such a loss as the defendants engaged to indemnify against, and that judgment should be given in their favor.

WELCH v. MANDEVILLE.

A nominal plaintiff, suing for the benefit of his assignee, cannot, by a dismissal of the suit under a collusive agreement with the defendant, create a valid bar against any subsequent suit for the same cause of action.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia for Alexandria county. This tend to a cargo consisting wholly of memorandum articles. The legal effect of the memorandum is to protect the underwriters from all partial losses; and, if a loss by deterioration, exceeding a moiety in value, would authorize an abandonment, the great object of the stipulation would be completely evaded. It seems, therefore, to be the settled doctrine that nothing short of a total extinction, either physical or in value, of memorandum articles, at an intermediate port, would entitle the insured to turn the case into a total loss, where the voyage is capable of being performed. And, perhaps, even as to an extinction in value, where the commodity specifically remains, it might yet be deemed not quite settled whether, under the like circumstances, it would authorize an abandonment for a total loss. The case before the court was of a mixed character. It embraced articles of both descriptions; some within, and some without, the purview of the memorandum. If, in such a case, a deterioration exceeding a moiety in value be a proper case of technical total loss, it will follow that, in many cases, the underwriter will indirectly be rendered responsible for partial losses on the memorandum articles. Suppose, in such a case, the damage to the memorandum articles were 40 per cent., and to the other articles 10 per cent., in the whole amounting to half the value of the cargo, the underwriter would be responsible for a technical total loss, and thereby made to bear the whole damage, from which the memorandum meant to exempt him. Indeed, cases might arise in which the damage might exclusively fall on memorandum articles; and, if it exceeded the moiety in value of the whole cargo, might load him with the burden of a partial loss, in manifest contravention of the intention of the parties. A construction leading to such a consequence could not be admitted unless it be unavoidable, and the court were entirely satisfied that such a construction ought not to prevail. The underwriter is, in all cases of deterioration, entitled to an exemption from partial losses on the memorandum articles; and, in order to effectuate this right, it was necessary, where a technical total loss is sought to be maintained, upon the mere ground of deterioration of the cargo, at an intermediate port, to a moiety of its value, to exclude from that estimate all deterioration of the memorandum articles. Upon this principle, in a cargo of a mixed character, no abandonment for mere deterioration in value, during the voyage, could be valid, unless the damage on the non-memorandum articles exceeded a moiety of the whole cargo, including the memorandum articles. The case was considered, as to the underwriter, the same as though the memorandum articles should exist in their original sound state. In this way, full effect was given to the contract of the parties. The underwriter would never be made responsible for partial losses on memorandum articles, however was an action of covenant brought in the name of Welch (for the use of Prior) against Mandeville & Jamesson. The suit abated as to Jamesson by a return of no inhabitant. The defendant, Mandeville, filed two pleas. The second plea, upon which the question in this court arises, states, that on the 5th of July, 1806, James Welch impleaded Mandeville & Jamesson, in the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, for the county of Alexandria, in an action of covenant, in which suit such proceedings were had, that, afterwards, to wit, at a session of the Circuit Court, on the 31st day of December, 1807, "the said James Welch came into court and acknowledged that he would not further prosecute his said suit, and from thence altogether withdraw himself." The plea then avers that the said James Welch, in the plea mentioned, is the same person in whose name the present suit is brought, and that the said Mandeville & Jamesson, in the former suit, are the same persons who are *defendants [*234 in this suit, and that the cause of action is the same in both suits. To this plea the plaintiff great; and the technical total losses for which alone he could be liable, were such as stood unaffected by the perishable nature of the commodity which he insures. Admitting, therefore, the rule to be correct that the party has a right to abandon when the depreciation exceeds a moiety of the value, the plaintiff had not brought himself within that rule, as applied to a cargo of a mixed nature, and there was, consequently, no total loss proved by the perils of the seas.

1.—We are informed by Targa, c. 52, n. 18, p. 230, and Casaregis, Disc., 47, that in the practice of Italy, in order to avoid the difficulty of settling averages on perishable articles, the clause excluso getto et avaria, as it was called, was introduced. The *French law requires goods, which, by their [*232 nature, are subject to particular detriment or diminution, such as grain, salt, or merchandise, subject to leakage, to be specified in the policy, otherwise the insurer is not liable for the damages or losses which may happen to these articles, unless the insured was ignorant of the nature of the cargo at the time the contract was made. Ordonnance de la Marine, l. 3, tit. 6, des Assurances, art. 31; Code de Commerce, l. 2, tit. 10, art. 355. In the different ports of France, before the revolution, various clauses were inserted in the policy, excluding responsibility for losses not exceeding a certain percentage on such articles. At Marseilles the insurers exempted themselves from average losses, on certain voyages, by a clause which was construed to extend both to general and particular average, on vessel or cargo. Under this clause franc d'avarie, the insurer was held answerable only for an entire loss of the subject insured. It was, however, determined not to extend to any case of technical total loss, which by the French law authorizes the insured to abandon, such as capture, stranding, shipwreck, &c. 1 Emerigon, Traite des Assurances, c. 12, s. 45, 46; Pothier d'Assurance, No. 166; Valin sur l'Ordonnance, l. 3, tit. 6; Des Assurances, art. 47. The origin of the English memorandum is referred by Sergeant Dunning, in the case of Wilson et al. v. Smith (3 Burr. 1551), to its "being better calculated to deliver the insurers from small averages than adapting the premium to the nature of the commodity, as it might happen to be more or less liable to perish or suffer; which method would have made the policy too complicated, and which the Dutch had at first tried but afterwards altered." The English formula is as follows: "N. B.—Corn, &c., are warranted free from average, &c., unless general, or the ship be stranded." The last words, or the ship be stranded, have been omitted for several years in the forms of policies adopted by the English insurance companies, viz., the London Royal Assurance, and the Royal Exchange Assurance. 2 Selwyn's N. P., 949. They are not inserted in the policies used in the United States.

filed a special replication, protesting that the said James Welch did not come into court and acknowledge that he would not further prosecute the said suit and from thence altogether withdraw himself; and avers that James Welch, being indebted to Prior, in more than $8,707.09, and Mandeville & Jamesson being indebted, by virtue of the covenant in the declaration mentioned, in $8,707.09, to Welch, he, Welch, on the 7th of September, 1799, by an equitable assignment, assigned to Prior, for a full and valuable consideration, the said $8,707.09, in discharge of the said debt, of which assignment the replication avers Mandeville & Jamesson had notice. The replication further avers that the suit in the plea mentioned was brought in the name of Welch, as the nominal plaintiff for the use of Prior, and that the defendant, Mandeville, knew that the said suit was brought, and was depending for the use and benefit of the said Prior; and that the said suit in the plea mentioned, without the authority, consent, or knowledge of the said Prior, or of the attorney prosecuting the said suit, and without any previous application to the court, was "dismissed, agreed." The replication further avers that the said James Welch was not authorized by the said Prior to agree or dismiss the said suit in the plea mentioned; and that the said Joseph Mandeville, with whom the supposed agreement for the dismissal of the said suit was made, knew, at the time of making the said supposed agreement, *that the said James Welch had no authority from Prior to agree or dismiss said suit. The replication further avers that the said agreement and dismissal of the said suit were made and procured by the said Joseph Mandeville, with the intent to injure and defraud the said Prior, and deprive him of the benefit of the said suit in the plea mentioned. The replication also avers that the said Prior did not know that the said suit was dismissed until after the adjournment of the court at which it was dismissed; and, further, that the supposed entry upon the record of the court in said suit, that the plaintiff voluntarily came into court and acknowledged that he would not further prosecute his said suit, and from thence altogether withdraw himself, and the judgment thereupon was made and entered by covin, collusion, and fraud; and that the said judgment was, and is, fraudulent. To this replication the defendant filed a general demurrer, and the replication was overruled. It appeared by the record of the suit referred to in the plea, that the entry is made in these words: "This suit is dismissed, agreed," and that this entry was made by the clerk without the order of the court, and that there is no judgment of dismissal rendered by the court, but only a judgment refusing to re-instate the cause.

The cause was argued by Lee for the plaintiff, and Swann for the defendant.

STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question upon these pleadings comes to this, whether a nominal plaintiff, suing for the benefit of *his assignee, can, by a dismissal of the suit under a collusive agreement with the defendant, create a valid bar against any subsequent suit for the same cause of action.

80

Courts of law, following in this respect the rules of equity, now take notice of assignments of choses in action, and exert themselves to afford them every support and protection not inconsistent with the established principles and modes of proceeding which govern tribunals acting according to the course of the common law. They will not, therefore, give effect to a release procured by the defendant under a covenous combination with the assignor in fraud of his assignee, nor permit the assignor injuriously to interfere with the conduct of any suit commenced by his assignee to enforce the rights which passed under the assignment. The dismissal of the former suit, stated in the pleadings in the present case, was certainly not a retrahit; and if it had been, it would not have availed the parties, since it was procured by fraud. Admitting a dismissal of a suit, by agreement, to be a good bar to a subsequent suit (on which we give no opinion), it can be so only when it is bona fide, and not for the purpose of defeating the rights of third persons. It would be strange, indeed, if parties could be allowed, under the protection of its forms, to defeat the whole objects and purposes of the law itself.

It is the unanimous opinion of the court that the judgment of the Circuit Court, overruling the replication to the second plea of the defendant, is erroneous, *and the same [*237 is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

THE CONSUL OF FRANCE AND HILL & M'COBB, Claimants.

During the late war between the United States and Great Britain, a French privateer, duly commissioned, was captured by a British cruiser, afterwards recaptured by an American privateer; again captured by a squadron of British frigates, and recaptured by another American privateer, and brought into a port of the United States for adjudication. Restitution, on payment of salvage, was claimed by the French consul. A claim was also interposed by citizens of the United States, who alleged that their property had been unlaw-

1.--By the common law, choses in action were not assignable, except to the crown. The civil law considers them as, strictly speaking, not assignable; but, by the invention of a fiction, the Roman jurisconsults contrived to attain this object. The creditor who wished to transfer his right of action to another person, constituted him his attorney, or procurator in rem suam, as it was called; and it was stipulated that the action should be brought in the name of the assignor, but for the benefit and at the expense of the assignee. Pothier de Vente, No. 550. After notice to the debtor, this assignment operated a complete cession of the debt, and invalidated a payment to any other person than the assignee, or a release from any other person than him. The court of chancery, imitating, in its usual spirit, the civil law in this particular, disregarded the rigid strictness of the common law, and protected the rights of the assignee of choses in action. This liberality was at last adopted by the courts of common law, who now consider an assignment of a chose in action as sub-fully taken by the French vessel before her first capture, on the high seas, and prayed an indemnification from the proceeds. Restitution to the original French owner was decreed; and it was held that the courts of this country have no jurisdiction to redress any supposed torts committed on the high seas upon the property of its citizens by a cruiser regularly commissioned by a foreign and friendly power, except where such cruiser has been fitted out in violation of our neutrality.

A PPEAL from the Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts.

The French private armed ship L'Invincible, duly commissioned as a cruiser, was, in March, 1813, captured by the British brig of war La Mutine. In the same month she was recaptured by the American privateer Alexander; was again captured, on or about the 10th of May, 1813, by a British squadron, consisting of the frigates Shannon and Tenedos; and, afterwards, in the same month, again recaptured by the 239*] American privateer Young Teazer, carried into Portland, and libeled in the District Court of Maine for adjudication, as prize of war. The proceedings, so far as material to be stated, were as follows: At a special term of the District Court, held in June, 1813, a claim was interposed by the French consul on behalf of the French owners, alleging the special facts above mentioned, and claiming restitution of the ship and cargo, on payment of salvage. A special claim was also interposed by Mark L. Hill and Thomas M'Cobb, citizens of the United States, and owners of the ship Mount Hope, alleging, among other things, that the said ship, having on board a cargo of freight, belonging to citizens of the United States, and bound on a voyage from Charleston, S. C., to Cadiz, was on the high seas, in the latter part of March, 1813, in violation of the law of nations, and of treaties, captured by L'Invincible, before her capture by La Mutine, and carried to places unknown to the claimants, whereby the said ship Mount Hope and cargo became wholly lost to the owners, and thereupon praying, among other things, that after payment of salvage, the residue of said ship L'Invincible and cargo might be condemned and sold for the payment of the damages sustained by the claimants. At the same term, by consent, an interlocutory decree of condemnation to the captors passed against said ship L'Invincible, and she was ordered to be sold, and one moiety of the proceeds, after deducting expenses, was ordered to be paid to the captors, as salvage, and the other moiety to be brought into court, to abide the final decision of the respective claims of the 240] *French consul and Messrs. Hill & M'Cobb. The cause was then continued for a further hearing unto September term, 1813, when Messrs. Maisonnarra & Devouet, of Bayonne, owners of L'Invincible, appeared under protest, and in answer to the libel and claims of Messrs. Hill & M'Cobb alleged, among other stantially valid, only preserving, in certain cases, the form of an action commenced in the name of the assignor, the beneficial interest and control of the suit being, however, considered as completely vested in the assignee as procurator in rem suam. things, that the ship Mount Hope was lawfully captured by L'Invincible, on account of having a British license on board, and of other suspicious circumstances, inducing a belief of British interests, and ordered to Bayonne for adjudication; that (as the protestants believed) on the voyage to Bayonne the Mount Hope was recaptured by a British cruiser, sent into some port of Great Britain, and there finally restored by the Court of Admiralty to the owners, after which she pursued her voyage, and safely arrived, with her cargo, at Cadiz, and the protestants thereupon prayed that the claim of Messrs. Hill & M'Cobb might be dismissed. The replication of Messrs. Hill & M'Cobb denied the legality of the capture, and the having a British license on board the Mount Hope, and alleged embezzlement and spoliation by the crew of L'Invincible, upon the capture; admitted the recapture by a British cruiser, and the restitution by the admiralty upon payment of expenses, and prayed that the protestants might be directed to appear absolutely and without protest. Upon these allegations the District Court overruled the objection to the jurisdiction of the court, and compelled the owners of L'Invincible to appear absolutely, and without protest, and thereupon the *owners ap- [241] peared absolutely, and alleged the same matters in defense which were stated in their answer under protest, and prayed the court to assign Messrs. Hill & M'Cobb to answer interrogatories touching the premises, which was ordered by the court. Accordingly, Messrs. Hill & M'Cobb made answer to the interrogatories proposed, except an interrogatory which required a disclosure of the fact whether there was a British license on board, which M'Cobb (who was master of the Mount Hope at the time of the capture) declined answering, upon the ground that he was not compelled to answer any question, the answer to which would subject him to a penalty, forfeiture, or punishment; and this refusal, the District Court, on application, allowed. Hill, in answer to the same interrogatory, denied any knowledge of the existence of a British license. The cause was thereupon heard on the allegations and evidence of the parties, and the District Court decreed that Messrs. Hill & M'Cobb should recover against the owners of L'Invincible the sum of $9,000 damages, and the costs of the suit. From this decree the owners appealed to the Circuit Court, and in that court their plea to the jurisdiction was sustained, and the claim of Messrs. Hill & M'Cobb dismissed, with costs. An appeal was thereupon entered by them to this court.

Dexter, for the appellants. The sole question is, whether the District Court of Maine had jurisdiction. It is a case where a citizen, against whose property a tort has been committed [242] on the high seas, appears in his own natural forum, and the res, which was the instrument of the wrong done, is within the territorial jurisdiction of his own country, and in possession of the court for other (lawful) purposes when he applies for justice. 1. An injury of this nature is either to be redressed by a process in rem or in personam, and in either case, application must be made where the thing, or person, is found. The action is transitory in both cases; where the party proceeds in rem, the possession of the thing gives jurisdiction to the tribunal having that possession. It is said that in prize proceedings the forum of the captor is the only one having jurisdiction. But what is the extent of the principle, and what are the exceptions to the rule? The rule is not of a nature peculiar to prize proceedings, but is rather a corollary from the general principles of admiralty jurisdiction. The locality of the question of prize or no prize must have been originally determined by the fact of the property being carried infra præsidia of the captor's country, and in possession of its courts. I agree that the possession of the thing does not give jurisdiction to a neutral country, and the reason is, because the country is neutral. But this has only been recently settled; and in the reign of Charles II. the question was referred to the crown lawyers in England (then neutral), whether the property of English subjects, unjustly taken by foreign cruisers, should not be restored to them by 243] the English court.¹ *It is, however, now determined that, unless there has been a breach of neutrality in the capture, the courts of a neutral state cannot restore, much less condemn. But this concession does not shake the position that local jurisdiction is founded upon the possession of the res, which in this case having escaped from the former captor, the action becomes transitory, and follows the thing. There are several decisions of this court, all confirming, either directly or by analogy, the position now taken.² In the famous report of Sir George Lee, &c., on the memorial of the King of Prussia's minister, relative to the non-payment of the Silesian loan, which was intended to maintain the strongest maritime pretensions of Great Britain, the only passage that even glances at the doctrine of the exclusive jurisdiction of the courts of the captor's country is, that all captors are bound to submit their seizures to adjudication, and that the regular and proper court is that of their own country. But this principle is sustained rather by the authority of usage and treaties than by elementary writers; and yet, all the other incidental questions are illustrated by multifarious citations of elementary books, equally respected in Prussia as in England. The reporters do not fairly meet the menace of the Prussian monarch, to set up courts of prize in his own dominions; but content themselves with asserting that it would be irregular, absurd, and impracticable. Had *it been at that time settled by Europe- [244 an jurists of authority, the question would not have been made; or if made, would have been satisfactorily answered. The general principle has been rather assumed than proved. And the practice of one nation, at least, contradicts it; for the ordinance of Louis XIV. restores the property of French subjects brought into the ports of France.³ 2. Suppose the *ques- [245 tion of prize or no prize to be exclusively within the jurisdiction of the courts of the capturing power, yet that question does not arise in the present case. This is a question of probable cause. If the commander of L'Invincible took without probable cause, he had no right; if he took with probable cause, then the claimants have sustained no injury, and ought not to recover damages; consequently, no injury can result from the court taking cognizance of the suit. As to the spoliation after the capture, that is still less a question of prize. 3. But be the general principles as they may, the jurisdiction having attached for other purposes on recapture, the former owner of a vessel unlawfully taken and despoiled by the prize, comes in and claims damages under the law of nations.

Pinkney, contra. If there be any rule of public *law better established than another, [246 it is, that the question of prize is solely to be determined in the courts of the captor's country. The report on the memorial of the King of Prussia's minister, refers to it as the customary law of the whole civilized world. The English courts of prize have recorded it; the French courts have recorded it; this court has recorded it. It pervades all the adjudications on the law of prize, and it lays, as an elementary principle, at the very foundation of that law. The whole question, then, is, whether

3.—Ordonnance de la Marine, liv. 3, tit. 9, Des Prises, art. 15. The same provision is contained in the 16th article of the Spanish ordinance of 1718; and Valin considers the restitution of the effects as a just recompense for the benefit rendered to the captor, in granting him an asylum in the ports of the neutral country to whose subjects those effects belong. But Azuni contests this opinion, and maintains that the obligation to restore in this case is founded on the universal law of nations. Part 2, c. 4, art. 3, s. 18. And it must be confessed that the reasons on which Valin rests his opinion are by no means satisfactory; so that the French and Spanish ordinances are evidently mere municipal regulations, which have not been incorporated into the code of public law, and cannot be justified upon sound principles. It is an observation, somewhere made by M. Portalis, that such regulations are not, properly speaking, to be considered laws, but are essentially variable in their nature, pro temporibus et causis, and are to be tempered and modified by judicial wisdom and equity. These ordinances are indeed supported by the practice of the Italian states, and the theory of certain Italian writers. Among the latter are Galliani and Azuni, both of whom maintain, each upon different grounds, the right of the neutral power, within whose territorial jurisdiction a prize is brought, to adjudicate upon the question of prize or no prize, so far as the property of its own subjects are concerned. They are, however, opposed by their own countryman, Lampredi, who, after assigning the reasons for his dissent, concludes thus: "Egli" (the neutral) dunque dovrà rispettare questo possesso (that of the captor) lasciando che i giudici costituiti dal Sovrano del predatore lo dichiarino o legittimo, o illegittimo, e così o liberino la preda, o la facciano passare in dominio del predatore, purché questo giudizio si faccia fuori del suo territorio, ove nessuno usurpar può i diritti spettanti al sommo impero. E falso adunque in diritto quello, che asserisce il Galliani, ed il progetto, ch'egli propone sul giudizio delle prede non si porterebbe eseguire senza lesione dei diritti sovrani. Lampredi, p. 228. Since the decision of the case to which this note is appended, the following may be considered as the only exceptions to the general rule, that the question of prize or no prize, with all its incidents, is only to be determined in the courts of the captor's nation established in his country, or in that of an ally or co-belligerent. 1st. The case of a capture made by the cruisers of the belligerents within the jurisdiction of a neutral power; and, 2d. That of a capture made by armed vessels fitted out in violation of its neutrality, and where the captured property, or the capturing vessel, is brought into its ports. The obvious foundation of these exceptions is to be discovered in the right and the duty of every neutral state to maintain its neutrality impartially, and neither to do nor suffer any act which might tend to involve it in the war.

this case be an exception to the general rule. The positive law of nations has ordained the rule; the natural law of nations has assigned the reasons on which it is founded; and Rutherford, in his institutes,¹ explains those reasons, which arise from the amenability of governments to each other. A cruiser is amenable only to the government by whom he is commissioned; that government is amenable to the power whose subjects are injured by him; and after the ordinary prize judicature is exhausted, they are to apply to their own sovereign for redress. The principal object of that judicature is the examination into the conduct of the captors. The question of property is merely incidental. But, whatever the question may be, it is to be judged exclusively by the courts of the capturing power. It is contended, on the other side, that this jurisdiction must be exerted in rem; but the jurisdiction to which Rutherford refers is much more extensive, not confining it to the question whether the property be transferred. If the thing be within the possession of the court, then it exerts a jurisdiction in rem, by restitution, or condemnation, as the case may be. But if not, then it exerts it on the person, and inquires into the manner in which the captor has used his commission, and whether any wrong has been done to friends, under color of its authority. It is a gratuitous assumption that prize jurisdiction is always in rem, as that of the ordinary court of admiralty usually is. The commissioned captor cannot be responsible to any but his own sovereign; from him he receives the law which forms his rule of conduct. Sir William Scott expressly admits that his king can give him the law, and the judges of other European countries practically admit the same thing. A fortiori, can the sovereign give it to his delegated cruisers; he being answerable over, in the first instance, diplomatically, and finally by war, to the injured nation. The captor is responsible only through the courts of his own country. 2. Is this case an exception to the general rule? The reasons of the allowed exceptions do not apply to this case. Thus the cases are, of violation of neutral territory; or where a commission is issued to subjects of the neutral country; or, lastly, of a prize brought into its territorial limits with neutral property on board. In the case of Talbot v. Jansen the commission was null, and captures under it were void; it was equivalent to no commission at all. Here is no pretense that the commission was null; that she had been fitted out here; or that the thing captured had been brought within the grasp of our municipal law; or that the capture was made 248 within our limits. In Del Col v. Arnold the ground of the decision was, that the thing was brought voluntarily into our limits, and the wrong done within those limits. The judgment must be supported on that ground or it cannot be supported at all. As to The Betsey, its authority is doubtful, and it cannot be referred to any intelligible principle, unless it be that the belligerent captor submits to the neutral jurisdiction, by bringing the property within it. The Cassius,² is directly in point for the captors in the case now before the court. Why was the libellant's application refused in that case? Because the thing captured was not brought in; thereby showing that, in the present case, the prize not having been brought in, damages cannot be awarded against the captor. As to the ordinance of Louis XIV., it goes no further than this court did in the case of The Betsey. The same authority has been practically assumed among the Italian states; but further no nation, ancient or modern, has gone. The natural, customary, and conventional law of nations, are all equally adverse to it. The claimants have a remedy, correspondent to the extent of their injury, in the courts of France. The prize jurisdiction is as effectually exerted when the property is not, as when it is, within its control. The cases are multiplied where the thing is even lost, of an application compelling the captor to proceed to adjudication; if he fails to show that the capture was lawful, he is mulcted in costs and damages.³ The cruisers of every nation are bound to obey the 249 instructions of the sovereign power, whether lawful or not. The condemnations under the British orders in council of November, 1793, were reversed by the lords of appeal, and mere dry restitution decreed, without damages, because the cruisers were justified by the instructions. But the commissioners under the 7th article of the British treaty of 1794, gave damages for what the lords of appeal were obliged judicially to refuse them, upon the authority of Rutherford, and upon the ground that the British government was answerable over to the injured power. In the present case, if justice should be refused in the courts of France, the French government would be answerable over to this country. The process is here, in effect, in personam, and it is as if the captor were here. You go beyond retaining your own property merely, and lay your hand on his; which is his by the municipal code only; by the law of nations it is the property of the state. It is certain he was not originally responsible personally, and the capture and recapture can have made no difference. The acts exerted over him by the enemy could not have changed his responsibility; nor can the captor's having failed to proceed to adjudication in France, for the claimants may compel him; nor the bringing in of his vessel, for, as to him, it was involuntary. 3. Probable cause is emphatically a question of prize or no prize; but it is not always the same by the law of different countries. The law of France must, therefore, be looked into, and applied to the case, which the French courts only are competent to expound. If their ex- [250 position does injustice to the party, his remedy is by application to his own government. So, also, is the question of spoliation a question of prize; and the prize court, having jurisdiction of the principal matter, has jurisdiction of all its incidents.

Dexter, in reply. 1. There is only one authority produced to show that the prize jurisdiction is exclusively in the courts of the capturing power. Rutherford speaks only of cases where the proceeding is to condemn, or restore, the captured property. When he, or any other writer, gives the reasons for his opinion, the latter is worth just as much as the former, and no more. What is the reason? He says it cannot be known before trial that forcible possession was lawful; and if unlawful, it could not give jurisdiction. It may be answered, in every case where jurisdiction is gained by possession, it is unknown before trial whether it was obtained lawfully or by force or fraud. All-right of jurisdiction from possession is thus equally denied. The other party cannot be injured by submitting to the jurisdiction while that uncertainty remains. If it shall appear that the possession was unlawfully acquired, he will be restored to his right by the exercise of jurisdiction. Rutherford asserts that the true ground of prize jurisdiction is that the state of the captor is responsible to other states for his misconduct. It may be answered, that when the state has only granted a lawful commission, and has not assented to any unlawful act done by color of it, such state is not responsible, though the act be 251] unlawful. *For the naked unauthorized act, then, the state is not accountable. The unjust judgment of a neutral state, condemning the property, might make the latter state answerable, but not the former. The reasoning goes on the supposition that the state of the captor might relieve itself from responsibility by doing justice, in restoring the property. This can only be done where the property can be reached by it. Holding jurisdiction would rather relieve the state of the captor from responsibility; for either the injury of the complaining party would be repaired, or the courts of his own country would determine that he had not suffered any. There is no distinction between the property being lawfully brought in, as in this case, or voluntarily, as in the case of The Betsey. The injured party has an election to proceed in personam against the owners, or in rem against the inanimate instrument of the wrong. 2. There may be a jurisdiction to restore, without invading the exclusive prize jurisdiction of the captor's country. Let the court take jurisdiction, and if it turns out to be a question of prize or no prize, then dismiss the suit. Suppose the question to be, whether the captor had a commission, must we not proceed further, and see what is the extent of that commission? And if the act done exceed its limits, has not the neutral state a right to adjudge costs and damages to its citizens injured, without any authority from the captor's sovereign? 3. The vessel is in judicature, rightfully and lawfully. The party now protesting against the jurisdiction, had submitted to it for another purpose. He claims his property upon the payment of 252] vage. *The obvious answer to his demand is, When you have discharged all liens, you shall have it. The Court of Admiralty, having jurisdiction for another purpose, like a court of chancery in the case of a mortgage, has a right to do complete equity. Why is restitution decreed in the case of violated territory? Because the courts of the neutral state, having jurisdiction for the principal purpose of avenging its violated sovereignty, also takes jurisdiction of all the incidents.

JOHNSON, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It would be difficult to distinguish this case, in principle, from those of The Cassius and The Exchange,¹ decided in this court. The only circumstance, in fact, in which they differ, is that in those cases the vessels were the property of the nation; in this it belongs to private adventurers. But the commission under which they acted was the same; the same sovereign power which could claim immunities in those cases equally demands them in this; and although the privateer may be considered a volunteer in the war, it is not less a part of the efficient national force, set in action for the purpose of subduing an enemy. There may be, indeed, one shade of difference between them, and it *is that which is suggested [253 by Rutherford in the passage quoted in the argument. The hull, or the owners of the privateer, may, perhaps, under some circumstances, be subject to damages in a neutral court after the courts of the captor have decided that the capture was not sanctioned by his sovereign. But, until such a decision, the seizure by a private armed vessel is as much the act of the sovereign, and entitled to the same exemption from scrutiny, as the seizure by a national vessel. In the case of The Cassius, which belonged to the French republic, the vessel was finally prosecuted and condemned on an information qui tam, under the act of Congress for an illegal outfit, and thus had applied to her, under the statute, the principle which dictated the decision in the case of Talbot v. Jansen with relation to a private armed vessel. As to the restitution of prizes, made in violation of neutrality, there could be no reason suggested for creating a distinction between the national and the private armed vessels of a belligerent. Whilst a neutral yields to other nations the unobstructed exercise of their sovereign or belligerent rights, her own dignity and security require of her the vindication of her own neutrality, and of her sovereign right to remain the peaceable and impartial spectator of the war. As to her, it is immaterial in whom the property of the offending vessel is vested. The commission under which the captors act is the same, and that alone communicates the right of capture even to a vessel which is national property.

*But it is contended that, admitting [254 the general principle, that the exclusive cognizance of prize questions belongs to the capturing power, still the peculiar circumstances of this case constitute an exception, inasmuch as the recapture of the Mount Hope puts it out of the power of the French courts to exercise jurisdiction over the case. This leads us to inquire into the real ground upon which the exclusive cognizance of prize questions is yielded to the courts of the capturing power. For the appellants, it is contended that it rests upon the possession of the subject-matter of that jurisdiction; and as the loss of possession carries with it the loss of capacity to sit in judgment on the question of prize or no prize, it follows that the rights of

1.—February Term, 1812. In this case it was determined that a public vessel of war, belonging to the Emperor Napoleon, which was before the property of a citizen of the United States, and, as alleged, wrongfully seized by the French, coming into our ports, and demeaning herself in a friendly manner, was exempt from the jurisdiction of this country, and could not be reclaimed by the former owner in its tribunals.

judging reverts to the state whose citizen has been divested of his property. On the other hand, I presume, by the reference to Rutherford, we are to understand it to be contended that it is a right conceded by the customary law of nations, because the captor is responsible to his sovereign, and the sovereign to other nations.

But we are of opinion that it rests upon other grounds; and that the views of Vattel on the subject are the most reconcilable to reason, and the nature of things, and furnish the easiest solution of all the questions which arise under this head. That it is a consequence of the equality and absolute independence of sovereign states on the one hand, and of the duty to observe uniform impartial neutrality on the other.

Under the former, every sovereign becomes the acknowledged arbiter of his own justice, 255 and cannot, *consistently with his dignity, stoop to appear at the bar of other nations to defend the acts of, his commissioned agents, much less the justice and legality of those rules of conduct which he prescribes to them. Under the latter, neutrals are bound to withhold their interference between the captor and the captured; to consider the fact of possession as conclusive evidence of the right. Under this it is, also, that it becomes unlawful to divest a captor of possession even of the ship of a citizen, when seized under a charge of having trespassed upon belligerent rights.

In this case the capture is not made as of a vessel of the neutral power; but as of one who, quitting his neutrality, voluntarily arranges himself under the banners of the enemy. On this subject there appears to be a tacit convention between the neutral and belligerent; that, on the one hand, the neutral state shall not be implicated in the misconduct of the individual; and on the other, that the offender shall be subjected to the exercise of belligerent right. In this view the situation of a captured ship of a citizen is precisely the same as that of any other captured neutral; or, rather, the obligation to abstain from interference between the captor and captured becomes greater, inasmuch as it is purchased by a concession from the belligerent, of no little importance to the peace of the world, and particularly of the nation of the offending individual. The belligerent contents himself with cutting up the unneutral commerce, and makes no complaint to the neutral 256 power, not even *where the individual rescues his vessel, and escapes into his own port after capture.

Testing this case by these principles, it will be found that, to have sustained the claim of the appellants, the court below would have violated the hospitality which nations have a right to claim from each other, and the immunity which a sovereign commission confers on the vessel which acts under it; that it would have detracted from the dignity and equality of sovereign states, by reducing one to the condition of a suitor in the courts of another, and from the acknowledged right of every belligerent to judge for himself when his own rights on the ocean have been violated or evaded; and, finally, that it would have been a deviation from that strict line of neutrality which it is the universal duty of neutrals to observe—a duty of the most delicate nature with regard to her own citizens, inasmuch as through their misconduct she may draw upon herself the imputation of secretly supporting one of the contending parties. Under this view of the law of nations on this subject, it is evident that it becomes immaterial whether the corpus continue sub potestate of the capturing power or not. Yet, if the recapture of the prize necessarily draws after it consequences so fatal to the rights of an unoffending individual as have been supposed in the argument, it may well be asked, shall he be referred for redress to courts which, by the state of facts, are rendered incompetent to afford redress?

The answer is, that this consequence does not follow from the recapture. The courts of the captor *are still open for redress. The [257 injured neutral, it is to be presumed, will there receive indemnity for a wanton or illicit capture; and if justice be refused him, his own nation is bound to vindicate, or indemnify him.

Some confusion of idea appears to hang over this doctrine, resulting chiefly from a doubt as to the mode in which the principle of exclusive cognizance is to be applied in neutral courts to cases as they arise; and this obscurity is increased by the apparent bearing of certain cases decided in this court in the years 1794 and 1795.

The material questions necessary to be considered, in order to dissipate these doubts, are: 1st. Does this principle properly furnish a plea to the jurisdiction of the admiralty courts? 2d. If not, then does not jurisdiction over the subject-matter draw after it every incidental or resulting question relative to the disposal of the proceeds of the res subjecta?

The first of these questions was the only one settled in the case of Glass v. The Betsey, and the case was sent back with a view that the District Court should exercise jurisdiction, subject, however, to the law of nations on this subject as the rule to govern its decision.

And this is certainly the correct course. Every violent dispossession of property on the ocean is, prima facie, a maritime tort; as such, it belongs to the admiralty jurisdiction. But sitting and judging, as such courts do, by the law of nations, the moment it is ascertained to be a seizure by a commissioned cruiser, made in the legitimate exercise of the rights *of war, their progress is arrested; for this circumstance is, in those courts, a sufficient evidence of right. [258

That the mere fact of seizure as prize does not, of itself, oust the neutral admiralty court of its jurisdiction, is evident from this fact that there are acknowledged cases in which the courts of a neutral may interfere to divest possessions, to wit, those in which her own right to stand neutral is invaded; and there is no case in which the court of a neutral may not claim the right of determining whether the capturing vessel be, in fact, the commissioned cruiser of a belligerent power. Without the exercise of jurisdiction thus far, in all cases, the power of the admiralty would be inadequate to afford protection from piratical capture. The case of Talbot v. Jansen, as well in the reasoning of the judges as in the final decision of the case, is fully up to the support of this doctrine. But it is supposed that the case of The Mary Ford supports the idea that as the court had acknowledged jurisdiction over the question of salvage, its jurisdiction extended over the whole subject-matter, and authorized it to proceed finally to dispose of the residue between the parties litigant.

That case certainly will not support the doctrine to the extent contended for in this case. It is true that the court there lay down a principle, which, in its general application is unquestionably correct, and which, considered in the abstract, might be supposed applicable to the present case. But this presents only one of innumerable cases which occur in our 259 books to prove how apt we are to misconceive and misapply the decisions of a court, by detaching those decisions from the case which the court propose to decide. The decision of the Supreme Court in that case is in strict conformity with that of the Circuit Court in the present case. For when the court come to apply their principle, they do not enter into the question of prize between the belligerents, but decree the residue to the last possessor; thus making the fact of possession, as between the parties litigant, the criterion of right; and this is, unquestionably, consistent with the law of nations. Those points, which can be disposed of without any reference to the legal exercise of the rights of war, the court proceeds to decide; but those which necessarily involve the question of prize or no prize, they remit to another tribunal.

It would afford us much satisfaction could we, with equal facility, vindicate the consistency of this court in the case of Del Col v. Arnold. To say the least of that case, it certainly requires an apology. We are, however, induced to believe, from several circumstances, that we have transmitted to us but an imperfect sketch of the decision in that case. The brevity with which the case is reported, which we are informed had been argued successively at two terms, by men of the first legal talents, necessarily suggests this opinion; and when we refer to the case of The Cassius, decided but the term preceding, and observe the correctness with which the law applicable to this case, 260 in principle, is laid down in the recital to the prohibitions, we are confirmed in that opinion.

But the case itself furnishes additional confirmation. There is one view of it in which it is reconcilable to every legal principle. It appears that, when pursued by the Terpsicore, the Grand Sachem was wholly abandoned by the prize crew, and left in possession of one of the original American crew, and a passenger; that, in their possession, she was driven within our territorial limits, and was actually on shore when the prize crew resumed their possession, and plundered and scuttled her. Supposing this to have been a case of total dereliction (an opinion which, if incorrect, was only so on a point of fact, and one in support of which much might be said, as the prize crew had no proprietary interest, but only a right founded on the fact of possession), it would follow that the subsequent resumption of possession was tortious, and subjected the parties to damages. On the propriety of the seizure of the Industry, to satisfy those damages, the court give no opinion, but place the application of the proceeds of the sale of this vessel on the ground of consent; a principle, on the correctness of the application of which to that case the report affords no ground to decide.

But, admitting that the case of The Grand Sachem was decided under the idea that the courts of the neutral can take cognizance of the legality of belligerent seizure, it is glaringly inconsistent with the acknowledged doctrine in the case of The Cassius and of Talbot v. Jansen, decided the term next *preceding; [261 and in The Mary Ford, decided at the same term with that of The Grand Sachem. The subject has frequently, since that term, been submitted to the consideration of this court, and the decision has uniformly been that it is a question exclusively proper for the courts of the capturing power.

[INSTANCE COURT.]

THE EDWARD. SCOTT, Claimant.

In revenue, or instance causes, the Circuit Court may, upon appeal, allow the introduction of a new allegation into the information, by way of amendment.

Under the 3d section of the act of Congress of the 28th of June, 1809, every vessel bound to a foreign permitted port was obliged to give a bond, with condition not to proceed to any port with which commercial intercourse was not permitted, nor to trade with such port.

Where the evidence is sufficient to show a breach of the law, but the information is not sufficiently certain to authorize a decree, the Supreme Court will remand the cause to the Circuit Court, with directions to allow the information to be amended.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts. The offense charged in the information filed in this case, in the District Court of Massachusetts, is, that the ship Edward, on the 12th day of February, 1810, departed from the port of Savannah *with a cargo, bound to a foreign port [262 with which commercial intercourse was not permitted, without a clearance, and without giving a bond in conformity with the provisions of the act of Congress of the 28th of June, 1809. A claim was interposed by George Scott, of Savannah, in which he alleged that the ship did not depart from Savannah, bound to a foreign port, in manner and form as stated in the information. The District Court condemned the ship; from which sentence an appeal was taken to the Circuit Court, where the district attorney was permitted by the court to amend the information, by filing a new allegation, that Liverpool, in Great Britain, was the foreign port to which the ship was bound when she departed from Savannah, and that she did so depart without having a clearance, agreeably to law. The Circuit Court affirmed the sentence, and the cause was brought before this court upon an appeal.

Harper, for the appellants and claimant. 1. The object of the 3d section of the act of the 2d of June, 1809, was to prevent the going to prohibited ports. When this supposed offense was committed, there were no prohibited ports, and the legislature could never mean to attach the penalty to ports permitted temporarily. If Liverpool was not, at the time, a prohibited port, and there were no other prohibited ports, the vessel was not obliged to give bond. Before the voyage was undertaken, it had become impossible to commit the offense with which the vessel is charged. 2. The information 263 charges the vessel *with going to a forbidden port without a clearance. But Liverpool was not a forbidden port, and therefore the information cannot stand. 3. The allegation was, that the vessel proceeded from Savannah; but the proof was, that the voyage was undertaken from Charleston. The prosecutor could not lawfully prove a proceeding from any other port than that alleged in the information.

The Attorney-General and Law, for the respondents, argued: 1. That the laws, under which the supposed offense was committed, were in force at the time. But as the argument is fully stated in the opinions of the judges, it is omitted here. 2. Common law strictness is not required in these proceedings, and it is unreasonable to insist on the particular foreign port being named. The prosecutor had a right to prove a voyage from Charleston. It has been decided in this court that it is sufficient if the offense be laid in the words of the act. Even the rules of the common law applicable to indictments do not require time and place to be proved as stated; and the only case where a variance is fatal is where it affects the jurisdiction of the court, as where criminal proceedings are required to be local.¹ In no case in civil proceedings does the common law consider the venue as matter of substance, except where both the proceedings are in rem, and the effect of the judgment could not be obtained if the offense were laid in a wrong place.² 264 The Circuit Court had a *right to amend the proceedings, but the practice of this court is to remand the cause to the Circuit Court with directions to amend.

WASHINGTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court, and, after stating the facts, proceeded as follows:

Three questions have been made and discussed by the counsel: 1st. Whether the Circuit Court could, upon the appeal, allow the introduction of a new allegation into the information by way of amendment. 2d. Whether the omission to give the bond required by the 3d section of the act of the 28th of June, 1809, subjected the vessel to forfeiture; and if it did, then, 3d. Whether the information, which alleges the voyage to Liverpool to have commenced at Savannah, is supported by the evidence in the cause, and whether the sentence below ought not to be reversed for this reason, although the court should be satisfied that the ship departed from Charleston for Liverpool without giving the bond required?

Upon the first question it is contended, for the claimant, that the Circuit Court has only appellate jurisdiction in cases of this nature, and that to allow the introduction of a new allegation, would be, in fact, to originate the cause in the Circuit Court. This question appears to be fully decided by the cases of The Caroline and Emily, determined in this court. These were informations in rem, under the slave-trade act, and the opinion of this court was, that the evidence was sufficient to show a breach of the law; but that the informations were not sufficiently certain *to author- [265] ize a decree. The sentence of the Circuit Court was therefore reversed, and the cause remanded to that court, with directions to allow the information to be amended. But even if an amendment would be improper if it stated a different case from that which was presented to the District Court, the objection would not apply to this case, in which the offense, though more definitely laid in the second allegation than it was in the first, is yet substantially the same. In both of them the charge is, departing from Savannah to a foreign interdicted port without giving bond, and the amendment, in substance, merely states the particular foreign port to which the vessel was destined.

The next question is, whether the omission to give the bond required by the third section of the act of the 28th of June, 1809, subjected the vessel to forfeiture? It is contended, by the claimant's counsel, that after the end of the session of Congress in which this law passed, there were no foreign ports either permitted or interdicted by law, inasmuch as the embargo laws which prohibited exportations from the United States to foreign countries, would then stand repealed, by force of the 19th section of the act of the 1st of March, 1809, to interdict the commercial intercourse with Great Britain and France, and the 2d section of the above act of the 28th of June. That all the ports of the world being thus permitted to the commerce of the United States, no subject would remain on which the 3d section would operate; and, consequently, there could be no necessity for giving a bond not to go to an interdicted port.

*An attentive consideration, however, [266] of the two acts above mentioned, will show that the argument is not well founded. The 3d section of the act of the 28th of June, 1809, declares, that during the continuance of that act, no vessel, not within the exceptions therein stated, shall be permitted to depart for a foreign port with which commercial intercourse has not been, or may not be, permitted by virtue of this act, or the act of the 1st of March, 1809. And if bound to a foreign port with which commercial intercourse has been, or may be, permitted, still she shall not be allowed to depart without bond being given, with condition not to proceed to any port with which commercial intercourse is not thus permitted, nor be directly or indirectly engaged, during the voyage, in any trade with such port. This law was in full force at the time the offense charged in this information is alleged to have been committed.

If, then, there was any country with which commercial intercourse was interdicted, and would continue to be so after the end of the session, during which this law was passed, it seems to be admitted in the argument that a vessel destined to a foreign permitted port would be liable to forfeiture, unless the above bond had been given. To ascertain whether there was any such country, it will be necessary to inquire what is the true meaning of the term commercial intercourse. No higher or more satisfactory authority upon this subject need be resorted to than the legislature itself, by which this act was passed.

The act of the 1st of March, 1809, which is entitled, "An act to interdict the commercial 267"] intercourse *between the United States and Great Britain," &c., contains nineteen sections. The first ten (exclusive of the first, which denies to the vessels of those countries the privilege of entering the ports and harbors of the United States) forbid the importation into the United States of the products and manufactures of Great Britain and France, or of any other part of the world, if brought from the ports of either of those countries. The 12th section repeals, after the 15th of March, 1809, all the embargo laws, except as they relate to Great Britain and France; and the 19th section repeals them, after the end of the succeeding session of Congress, as to all the world. The 18th, 14th, 15th, 16th, and 18th sections are intended to provide securities for enforcing the non-importation system established by this law; and the 17th section repeals the former non-importation law of April, 1806.

Hence, it appears that the commercial intercourse which this law was intended to interdict consisted of importations from Great Britain and France, and of the products and manufactures of those countries, and of exportations to them. In the 11th section it is called the trade of the United States, suspended by that act and the embargo laws, which trade the President is authorized to renew, by his proclamation, upon a certain contingency; and in pursuance of this power, he did, accordingly, renew it with Great Britain in April, 1809.

Thus stood the commercial intercourse of the United States with foreign nations at the commencement of the extraordinary session of Congress which *commenced in May, 1809; permitted by the above law, both as to exportations and importations with all the world, except Great Britain and France, and their dependencies; and, as to them, interdicted in both respects as to France, and permitted with Great Britain by virtue of the President's proclamation. But, as the law of the 1st of March would expire, by its own limitation, after the end of the May session, whereby, not only exportations, but the importations forbidden by that act, in relation to France, would become lawful; the 1st section of the act of the 28th of June, 1809, revives the whole non-importation system, except so far as it had been permitted to Great Britain by the proclamation; and the 2d section declares, in effect, that the embargo laws, which were repealed by the 12th and 19th sections of the act of the 1st of March, shall be and remain repealed, notwithstanding the expiration of that law by its own limitation.

From this view of the subject, it appears that the non-importation system of the 1st of March was to continue in force until the end of the session of Congress, which would succeed that of May, 1809, except as to Great Britain; and that, after the end of that session, the embargo laws would cease to operate against any nation.

If, then, importation be a branch of commercial intercourse, in the avowed meaning of Congress, and if, on the 28th of June, and from thence until the end of the next session of Congress, it was to continue in force, as to France (unless the President should declare, by proclamation, the revocation of *her offensive edicts), but were inoperative as to Great Britain, it follows, inevitably, that, in February or March, 1810, when the offense is charged to have been committed by this vessel, there were foreign ports permitted, and others interdicted, to the commerce of the United States; and, consequently, that the destination of this vessel being to Liverpool, a bond ought to have been given, such as the 3d section of the act of the 28th of June required, not to go to an interdicted port.

This construction of the law has frequently been given to it by this court; but the serious opposition made to it, by the counsel for the claimant, will account for the deliberate examination of the question which is contained in this opinion.

As to the last question, a majority of the court being of opinion, upon a view of the whole evidence, that the voyage to Liverpool had its inception at Savannah, the objection as to the form of the information, in this respect, has nothing to stand upon. Were the evidence on this point more doubtful than it is, the court would remand the cause, with directions to the Circuit Court to allow an amendment, by inserting Charleston instead of Savannah, from which the claimant could derive no benefit, since it is not denied that the ship departed from Charleston directly for Liverpool, without giving bond.

LIVINGSTON, J. This ship was proceeded against under the 3d section of the act of the 28th of June, 1809, for sailing from the United States to a foreign port with which commercial intercourse had not *been, nor was then, [270 permitted, by virtue of that act, or of the act to interdict commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, without a clearance, and without a bond having been given, in conformity to the provisions of the said act, not to proceed to any port with which commercial intercourse was not then, by law, permitted, nor be directly or indirectly engaged, during the voyage, in any trade or traffic with such place.

The only question, on this part of the case, is, whether, at the time of the departure of the Edward from Savannah, which was in February, 1810, there existed any law subjecting her to forfeiture if the owner omitted giving the bond prescribed by the 3d section of the act above mentioned.

By the claimant it is contended, that after the end of the session of Congress in which this act passed, which occurred on the 28th of June, 1809, there ceased to exist in the United States any distinction between prohibited and permitted ports within the meaning of the restrictive system; that the embargo laws, which alone restricted exportations to foreign countries, had, at that time, become repealed by the operation of the last section of the act of the 1st of March, 1809, as well as by that of the 2d section of the act of the 28th of June of the same year; that by this repeal the whole world, as far as could depend on our own laws, was open to the vessels of the United States, and, consequently, that it could not be illegal to neglect giving a bond not to go to an interdicted port, if, at the time of sailing, there was 271] no port in the world to which that interdiction could apply.

In examining this question, my attention will be confined to a consideration of the two acts which have just been mentioned; because, if the interdiction which is supposed to have existed when the Edward left Savannah is not to be found in either of these laws, no other has been referred to as creating it. Let us, then, see what has been done, and if there be no ambiguity in the provisions of these two acts on the subject before us, it will be safer, in a case so highly penal, to adhere to the letter of them than to incur the danger of falling into error by indulging in a mode of interpretation which was adopted at the bar, and which was too conjectural to be in any degree satisfactory.

By the 12th section of the act of the 1st of March, 1809, the embargo law was repealed as to all nations, except Great Britain and France, and their dependencies. This repeal, necessarily and immediately, created a distinction between ports with which commercial intercourse was permitted, and those to which it was interdicted; and we accordingly find Congress, in the very next section of this act, providing for this new state of things by requiring bonds to be given when vessels were going to ports which had now become permitted ports, not to proceed to any port or place in Great Britain or France, &c. No such regulation had been prescribed in consequence merely of the non-importation law, and for the plainest reason; for, while they prohibited an introduction into the United 272] States, from any part of the world, of the produce and manufactures of France and England, our vessels were allowed to go to those countries, and thus continue a commercial intercourse with either or both of them, limited, it is true, as to the articles which might be brought from thence, but uncontrolled as to the commodities which might be carried thither, or as to the port to which they might go. This partial trade between the two countries, whether originating in the acts of the one government or the other, may frequently take place; but cannot, when it does, with any propriety, be termed an interdiction or suspension of commercial intercourse, which ex vi termini, means an entire cessation, for the time being, of all trade whatever. It was under the embargo laws alone that intercourse was interdicted between this country and Great Britain and France, as it was also with the rest of the world; which interdiction, as it arose out of those laws, so it is expressly continued, as it regards those two kingdoms, by excepting them out of the operation of the 12th section of the act of the 1st of March, 1809, which repealed the embargo laws as to all other parts of the world. It would seem, then, that after this no other inquiry would remain than to ascertain whether the commercial intercourse thus interdicted by the act laying an embargo, and continued, or rather not repealed, as it respected Great Britain and France, by the 12th section just mentioned, was still in force at the time this offense is alleged to have been committed. Without leaving the act now under consideration, we find that it was to [273 continue in force only until the end of the next session of Congress, and that the act itself, which lays the embargo, was to expire at the same time. This event took place on the 28th of June, 1809. Now, unless some law were passed before that time to continue the embargo longer, or, after that period, to revive it, how can it be said that, after that day, a distinction could still continue between prohibited and permitted ports? This brings us to see whether anything was done by Congress at the extraordinary session which commenced in May, 1809. By an act which they passed on the 28th of June of that year, they continued in force until the end of the next session, which happened on the 1st of May, 1810, the 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th, 17th and 18th sections of the act of March, 1809, and they declare that all the acts repealed by the said act shall remain repealed, notwithstanding any part of that act might expire by its own limitation. Now, if we return to the sections which are revived, we find them containing nothing more than an interdiction of the harbors and waters of the United States to vessels sailing under the flag of Great Britain or France, or owned by subjects of either, accompanied with a prohibition to import from any foreign port whatever, into the United States, any goods, &c., being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of those countries or their dependencies. In not one of them is found a prohibition to our citizens against trading with either of those countries. Their revival, then, does not operate so as to create a single interdicted port in the whole commercial world. Such interdiction, as has already been [274 said, was a creature of, and owed its existence solely and exclusively to, the embargo laws. If it be said that such prohibition necessarily flowed from the revival of these sections, notwithstanding their entire silence on the subject, then would our vessels have been under a disability of going to any part of the world, because they were no more at liberty to bring British and French goods from other countries than from Great Britain and France; and yet the 12th section of this act, by only taking the embargo out of their way, permitted them to go to any port of the world except to Great Britain and France. But, in availing themselves of this permission, they were still under a restraint not to bring to this country any British or French goods. The 11th section of the act of March, 1809, which is continued by that of June of the same year, authorizes the President, in certain cases, to issue his proclamation; after which, the trade of the United States, suspended by that act, and by the embargo law, may be renewed with Great Britain or with France, as the case may be. In this section we are presented with a distinction, taken by the legislature themselves, and which, indeed, pervades the whole system between the suspension of trade created by that act, and by the embargo laws. The two systems were entirely different, and enforced by different and distinct penalties. By the one, our vessels were at liberty to go where they pleased; by the other, they were prevented from going to any foreign port whatever. The revival, then, of 275*] these sections, did not preclude *our vessels from going to any part of the world, but only forbid their bringing to this country the articles whose importation was prohibited. If the 12th section had also been revived, then no vessel of the United States could have gone to Great Britain or France, and the distinction of permitted and forbidden ports would have continued until the 1st of May, 1810. But as the whole embargo system expired in June, 1809, not only by the 19th section of the act of March, 1809, but also by the express provision of the act of June of the same year, the conclusion is inevitable that when the Edward sailed there was no law in force by which any distinction of prohibited and permitted ports existed; and that, therefore, the not giving the bond in question was no violation of law.

No notice has been taken of either of the proclamations of the President, because, if the view here presented be correct, neither of them has any bearing on the question. Admitting the validity of both of them, the latter would not make the ports of England prohibited ports, if the laws which created the distinction had done it away by opening to the citizens of the United States the ports of every nation on the globe. The President's power could only exist while such a state of things continued as suggested the necessity of, and would render, an interference on his part proper and useful, and no longer.

It may be, and has been, said that the opinion here expressed is at variance with the public opinion on this subject, as well as with the understanding *of the collectors and some other officers of government; and that even this court has, at its present term, condemned property for the same offense with which the Edward is charged. The answer to all this is, that the condemnation alluded to passed sub silentio, without bringing the point distinctly to our view, and is, therefore, no precedent; and that, as to public opinion, or that of the officers of government, however respectable they may be, it can furnish no good grounds for enforcing so heavy a penalty, unless, on investigation, it shall appear to have been correctly formed. It was also urged that Congress must have supposed the law to be as it is now contended for by the Attorney-General, or they would not have passed the 3d section of the act of the 28th June, 1809, when there was no state of things to which its provisions could apply. To this the answer which was given at the bar is satisfactory. At the time of the bringing in of that bill the embargo laws were still in force, and would continue so until the end of that session. Now, as it could not then be foreseen that the bill would not become a law until the last day of the session, a prohibition not to go to prohibited ports was necessary, but became nugatory by the law not passing until the time prescribed for the extinction of the whole system.

Upon the whole, it appears to me clear that there was no law in force when the Edward left Savannah interdicting her from going to any foreign port whatever, or requiring from her owners any bond not to go to such port; and, under this persuasion, *I have thought [277] it a duty to express my dissent from the judgment which has been just rendered.

But were the case doubtful, I should still arrive at the same conclusion, rather than execute a law so excessively penal, about whose existence and meaning such various opinions have been entertained.

To satisfy ourselves that great difficulties must exist, in relation to this law, we have only to look at the progress of the case now before us. The offense with which the Edward is charged in the information, is going, without giving bond, to a prohibited foreign port. The condemnation in the Circuit Court, however, proceeded on the ground of all the ports of Great Britain (to one of which it was alleged she was going) being permitted ports. In the very able argument which was made here in support of the prosecution, it was attempted to be shown that Liverpool was not a permitted, but an interdicted, port. This state of uncertainty, which, it would seem, could hardly exist if the legislature had expressed themselves with that precision and perspicuity which are always expected in criminal cases, would, with me, independent of my own convictions that there was no such prohibiting law, have been a sufficient reason for restoring this property to the claimants.

1.—In order to enable the reader the better to understand this case, the following account of the dates and substance of the British orders in council, the French decrees, and the consequent acts of the United States government, has been subjoined:

278*] *On the 16th of May, 1806, the British government issued an order in council declaring the coast included between the Elbe and Brest in a state of blockade.

On the 21st of November, 1806, the French emperor issued his Berlin decree declaring Great Britain and her dependencies in a state of blockade.

On the 7th of January, 1807, the British government issued an order in council prohibiting neutral ships from carrying on trade from one enemy's port to another, including France and her allies.

On the 11th of November, 1807, the British orders in council were issued, which declared the continental ports from which British ships were excluded in a state of blockade (except in case of ships cleared out from Great Britain whose cargoes had paid a transit duty), and rendered liable to condemnation all neutral ships, with their cargoes, trading to or from the ports of France, or her allies, and their dependencies, or having on board certificates of origin.

On the 7th of December, 1807, the French emperor issued his Milan decree, declaring that any neutral ships which should have touched at a British port, or paid a transit duty to the British government, or submitted to be searched by British cruisers, should be liable to condemnation.

On the 22d of December, 1807, the American embargo took place.

On the 1st of March, 1809, the embargo was removed, and a non-intercourse substituted with both France and England.

On the 19th of April, 1809, a negotiation was concluded by Mr. Erskine, in consequence of which the trade with Great Britain was renewed on the 10th of June.

On the 28th of April, 1809, a British order in council was issued, modifying the former blockade, which was henceforth to be confined to ports under the governments of Holland (as far north as the river Ems) and France, together with the colonies of both, and all ports of Italy included between Orbitello and Pesaro.

THE MUTUAL ASSURANCE SOCIETY
v.
WATTS' EXECUTOR.

Under the 6th and 8th sections of the Act of Assembly of Virginia, of the 22d of December, 1794, property pledged to the Mutual Assurance Society, &c., continues liable for assessments, on account of the losses insured against, in the hands of a bona fide purchaser without notice.

A mere change of sovereignty produces no change in the state of rights existing in the soil; and the cession of the District of Columbia to the national government did not affect the lien created by the above act on real property situate in the town of Alexandria, though the personal character or liability of a member of the society could not be thereby forced on a purchaser of such property.

A PPEAL from the Circuit Court in the District of Columbia for Alexandria county. The cause was argued by Swann for the appellants, and by Taylor and Lee for the respondents.

JOHNSON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

280*] This is a bill in chancery, filed by the complainants, to charge certain premises, in the possession of the defendant, situate in the town of Alexandria, with the payment of a sum of money, assessed in pursuance of the laws establishing the Mutual Assurance Society, for quotas becoming due after his testator acquired possession. The executor has, in fact, sold the premises, under a power given him by the testator, but the money remains in his hands; and it is conceded that the sole object now contended for is to charge the money arising from the sale of the land in question with the assessment to which it is contended that the land was liable. The insurance was made in 1799, and the property sold to the defendant's testator in 1807, long after the town of Alexandria ceased to be subject to the laws of Virginia. It is admitted that the sale was made without notice of this incumbrance (if it was one), and the quota demanded was assessed on the premises for a loss which happened subsequent to the transfer. The points made in the case arise out of the construction of the 6th and 8th sections of the act of Virginia, passed the 22d of December, 1794. The 6th section is in these words: "If the funds should not be sufficient, a repartition among the whole of the persons insured shall be made, and each shall pay, on demand of the cashier, his, her, or their share, according to the sum insured, and rate of hazard at which the building stands, agreeably to the rate of premium, for which purpose it is hereby declared that the subscribers, as soon as they shall insure their property in the Assurance Society aforesaid, do mutually, for 281] themselves, *their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, engage their property insured as security, and subject the same to be sold, if necessary, for the payment of such quotas." And the 8th section is in these words: "To the end that purchasers or mortgagees of any property insured, by virtue of this act, may not become losers thereby, the subscriber selling, mortgaging, or otherwise transferring such property, shall, at the time, apprise the purchaser or mortgagee of such assurance; and indorse to him or them the policy thereof. And in every case of such change the purchaser or mortgagee shall be considered as a subscriber in the room of the original, and the property so sold, mortgaged, or otherwise transferred, shall still remain liable for the payment of the quotas, in the same manner as if the right thereof had remained in the original owner."

In the argument two points were made: 1st. That property pledged to the society remained liable for the quota to a purchaser without notice. 2d. That the purchaser, by the purchase of such property, although without notice, became, by virtue of the 8th section, a member of the society, and liable, in all respects, as such.

The second of these questions is now withdrawn from the consideration of this court by an agreement entered on record. And it must be admitted, that whatever may be the strict construction of the 8th section and its operation in the state of Virginia, so far as it is intended to force on the purchaser a personal character or liability, it could have no operation in the town of Alexandria at the date of this transfer. *The laws of Virginia had then [282 ceased to be the laws of Alexandria, and it could only be under an actually existing law, operating at the time of the transfer, that the character of membership in the Virginia company would be forced upon the purchaser. This is not one of those cases in which tenure attaches to an individual a particular characteristic or obligation; such cases arise exclusively between the occupant of the soil and the sovereignty which presides immediately over the territory. The transfer, therefore, of the District of Alexandria to the national government, put an end to the operation of the 8th section, so far as it operated by mere force of law, independent of his own consent, to fasten on the purchaser the characteristics of a member. But it is otherwise with regard to the soil. The idea is now exploded that a mere change of sovereignty produced any change in the state of rights existing in the soil. In this respect everything remains in the actual state, whether the interest was acquired by law, under a grant, or by individual contract.¹

with Great Britain again took place, in consequence of Mr. Erskine's arrangement not being ratified.

On the 1st of May, 1810, the trade with both Great Britain and France was opened, under a law of Congress, that whenever either power should rescind its orders or decrees, the President should issue a proclamation to that effect; and in case the other party should not, within three months, equally withdraw its orders or decrees, that the non-importation act should go into effect with respect to that power.

Wheat. 1.

On the 2d of November, 1810, the President issued his proclamation, declaring the Berlin and Milan decrees to be so far withdrawn as no longer to affect the neutral rights of America; and the orders in council not being rescinded,

On the 2d of February, 1811, the importation of British goods, and the admission of British ships into America, were prohibited.

On the 4th of April, 1812, an embargo was laid in the United States, and on the 18th of June following, war was declared against Great Britain.

to this: Does property, pledged to the society, continue liable for assessments in the hands of a bona fide purchaser without notice, notwithstanding that he does not become a member by the transfer?

Here we give no opinion on the extent or meaning of the words "property insured," how far they will operate to charge the lands on which buildings stand. The question was 283 not made in the argument, and is *probably of no consequence in this or any other case. We only notice it in order that such a construction may not be supposed admitted, as is too often concluded, because a court passes over a question sub silentio.

Whatever be the property thus pledged, it is very clear that the words of the 6th section are abundantly sufficient to create in it a common law lien, not only in the hands of the original subscriber, but by express words in those of his assignee. If the case rested here, there would be no doubt or difficulty; but every law, and every contract, must be construed with a reference to the subject of that law or contract, and which it is designed to answer. In this view we readily concede that the duration of the lien could not extend beyond the duration of the liability of the subscriber to pay the premium; nor could the liability of the subscriber extend beyond the liability of the company to indemnify him. On the other hand, it would seem that as long as the company could exact of the subscriber the premium, they ought to be held liable to indemnify him. It will, then, be conceded that the liability of the subscriber, and of the company, are mutual, correlative, and co-extensive, and it remains to be examined how this concession affects the case.

It is very clear that there are but three ways by which a subscriber can cease to be a member: 1st. By the consumption of the buildings insured, which results from the nature of the contract. 2d. By complying with the stipulations of the 9th article of the rules and regulations of the society. 284 3d. By substituting a vendee in his place, in conformity with the 8th section of the act of the 22d December, 1794. If, then, a subscriber has not become discharged in one of these three ways, what is to prevent the society from pursuing their summary remedy against him? They are not bound to search for his vendee, or to raise the money by a sale of the property pledged; much less are they bound to prosecute their remedy against a purchaser whose name is unknown to them, or who may be absent from the state, or from the United States, or insolvent, or protected, at the time, by some legal privilege. Their contract is with the original subscriber; their rules point out the mode in which he is to extricate himself from this liability, and if he has not pursued it, what defense is left him against a suit instituted by the society? The court cannot imagine one that could avail him. He cannot urge that he has parted with the property. The rules point out to him the conduct that he is to pursue in that event. He may give notice to the vendee of the insurance, and tender an assignment. If the vendee refuse to receive it, he is bound to remain but six weeks longer under the obligation to pay his quotas and indemnify the vendee, at the end of which time he will be entitled to a discharge, upon giving due notice, and complying with the other requisitions of the 9th section. Nor can he urge that he has no longer any interest in the thing insured; this, if any plea at all, is none in his lips. It belongs to the insurer to avail himself of it, if it belongs to anyone. But it is a plea not true in fact; for he continues *to indemnify his vendee against the [285 quotas that may be assessed, which, by possibility, may reach to the value of the whole property sold or insured; and, if correct in principle or fact, still this plea could not avail him, since it is in consequence of his own folly or laches that he continues liable to pay the premium of insurance for another's property. And should it be urged that this would be converting an actual insurance into a wager policy, two answers may be given to it, either of which is sufficient; that there is nothing illegal in a wager policy, in itself, and if there were, it is no objection in this case, when it results from the constitution and laws of the society.

But it may be contended that the insurer is discharged, and, therefore, the liability for the quotas ceases.

It is unquestionably true, as a general principle, that where an insurer runs no risk, equity does not consider him entitled to a premium: and, although there exist some reasons in the policy and constitution of this society to apply it, in its fullest extent, to this case, yet, to give the argument its utmost weight, we are disposed to concede it. But what has occurred in this case to discharge the underwriters from their contract? The subscriber was clearly not discharged from his liability to them, and this single consideration furnishes a strong reason for holding them still bound under their contract. What has the subscriber done inconsistent with that contract? The only act he can be charged with, is alienating, without indorsing, the policy. But alienation *alone is perfectly [286 consistent with the contract, for the policy issues to him and his assigns; and so far from interposing any obstruction to alienation, provision is made for that very case, and unlimited discretion vested in the subscriber to indorse his policy to whom he pleases. Nor is alienation, without indorsing the policy, considered in any more offensive light; inasmuch as the 8th section which enforces the assignment declares expressly that it is for the benefit of purchasers and mortgagees, "to the intent that they may not become losers thereby." It is not pretended that it is for the society's own security; nor do they ever require notice to be given them in case of such transfer of the policy. As to them, therefore, it is an innocent act, and we see no ground on which the society can be discharged, either to the vendor or vendee; they certainly remain liable, and although it may be a question to which of them equity would decree the money, yet to one or the other it certainly would be adjudged; but it is not material to this argument which, as it is a question between the vendor and vendee.

If, then, the case presents no legal ground for discharging either insurer or insured from the contract, and the lien created by the 6th section be commensurate with the liability of the insured, it will follow that the plaintiffs, in this case, ought to have a decree in their favor.

But we will examine, at a closer view, the liability of the property in the hands of the vendee. That he is not liable to the summary remedy is evident from a variety of considerations. He must, then, be *brought into chancery to have his property subjected to the consequences of the lien, whenever a loss happens and a quota is assessed. In that case his defense will always be just what it is in this—that he purchased without notice. But this was never held to be a defense to a bill to foreclose a mortgage, which is precisely a similar case to this. Nor is it any better defense to urge that he could derive no benefit under the policy in case of a loss; for this is precisely the same defense, a little varied, as will be seen by supposing that the vendee of a mortgageor should plead, to a bill of foreclosure, that the money borrowed did not come to his use. But his case is not as good as that of the vendee of the mortgageor in the case supposed; for the 8th section makes provision for his relief. That section says: "To the end that purchasers, or mortgagees, of any property insured, may not become losers thereby" the vendor shall give them notice, and indorse the policy over. In what manner shall the purchasers, or mortgagees, become losers, unless the lien is to continue on the property in their hands? If the vendor be guilty of the folly of paying the quotas, and the vendee never receives notice of the lien, through a demand from the society, there is no damage sustained. If he should be assailed with such a demand, he has a right to require of the vendee an assignment of the policy; and as there existed an original duty to make such an assignment, it may well be held to operate, nunc pro tunc, and carry with it all the benefits of an original assignment.

288*] *But it is contended that the 8th section explains and limits the 6th section in such a manner as to restrict the duration of the lien in the hands of the vendee to those cases only in which the transfer of the policy also takes place.

This consequence cannot be logically maintained. The argument is, that the words "such change" mean only a change of the property, attended with an assignment of the policy, and that if the legislature had supposed that property sold would, in the hands of the vendee, remain subject to the lien, they would not expressly have subjected it in such a case. But this section will, with philological correctness, admit of a different construction, and a construction more consistent with legal principles, inasmuch as it will not admit of an implication inconsistent with the preceding section, and even with other parts of the same section. Nor, if the construction on which this argument is founded were unavoidable, would the conclusion follow which the argument asserts. The question is, what is the meaning of the words "in every change," in the section under consideration? The solution is only to be found by referring to the preceding and only other clause of the same section; and there we find that a general provision is inevitably to be made for every possible change of sale or purchase. The operation of the clause will, then, be only to confirm and support the general words of the sixth section, and if it left any doubt with regard to the duration of the lien in the hands of the vendee, to remove those doubts by express provision. This construction is also the most consistent with the recital *in the first clause of [*289 the same section, which, as has been before observed, with another view, is founded altogether on the idea that property sold remained pledged to the society in the hands of the vendee, whether with or without notice; as, in that case alone, could vendees, or mortgagees, need the protection held out to them in that clause.

But if a different construction could legally be given to that section, so as to restrict the words "every such case" to mean those cases only which were attended with an assignment of the policy, it would not follow that the lien ceased its operation in all others. To apply to this case the maxim, expressio unius est exclusio alterius, would be a glaring sophism. For, the only principle on which such a conclusion could be founded would be that the repetition of a legal provision, included, with many others, in another law, produced a repeal of all others by necessary implication. Such an implication may be resorted to in order to determine the intention of the legislature in a case of doubtful import, but cannot operate to destroy the effect of clear and unequivocal expressions. An obvious and unanswerable objection to giving this effect to this clause is, that it puts it in the power of the subscriber to exonerate the property from the lien by the single act of sale, not even sustaining it for the term of six weeks after the notice given of his intention to withdraw; an effect glaringly inconsistent, no less with the express words than with the general view of the law on this subject. For there is nothing in the act which obliges the vendee to accept an assignment. *A tender to [*290 him, therefore, cannot subject him to any onerous consequences. He does no more than what he may lawfully do. If, then, the lien ceases, unless he accepts the assignment, and it is legally at his option to accept or refuse, the subscriber, in having the right to sell to whom he pleases, has also the duration of the lien submitted to his will.

Some difficulty has also existed in the minds of some of the court on the contingent nature of this lien, whether the lien was complete to all purposes at any period before the assessment of a quota. But, on this subject the majority are of opinion that, as to legal incumbrance, or duration of a lien, it makes no difference whether its object is to secure an existing debt or a contingent indemnity. In the case of Black et al., mortgagees of Gardner, v. Kraig & Mitchell, this court sustained a mortgage, given to secure an indorser against notes which he might indorse, where he had entered into no stipulation to indorse for the mortgageor. And in the case of bonds given for the discharge of duties, offices, or annuities, it never was maintained as an objection that the object of the lien was future, contingent, or uncertain. In this case the mutual stipulation to indemnify each other against losses operates as a purchase of the lien, and places the parties on strong equitable grounds as to each other.

Some cases were cited in the argument from the reports of decisions which have been made in the courts of Virginia. This court uniformly acts under the influence of a desire to conform its decisions to those of the state courts on their 291*] local laws; and *would not hesitate to pay great respect to those decisions, if they had appeared to reach the question now under consideration. But they are persuaded that those cases do not come up to the present. In the case of Greenhow et al. v. Barton (1 Munf., 598), it is true that the decision of the District Court, which was finally confirmed, was in favor of the purchaser without notice. But it was solely on the question whether he was liable to the summary remedy, or, in other words, liable generally, as a member. And the case of Anne Byrd, reported in the cases of the General Court, was likewise the case of a motion for a summary judgment. In the latter case, the court went much further in charging the vendee than this court is called upon to proceed in the present case. But in neither of those cases was a bill filed to charge the vendee, as in the present; nor was the question brought up in either detached from that of his general liability as a member.

WALDEN v. THE HEIRS OF GRATZ.

Under the Act of Assembly of Kentucky of 1798, entitled, "An Act concerning champerty and maintenance," a deed will pass the title to lands, notwithstanding an adverse possession.

The statute of limitations of Kentucky, does not differ essentially from the English statute of the 21st James I., c. 1., and is to be construed as that statute, and all other acts of limitation founded upon it, have been construed. The whole possession must be taken together; when the statute has once begun to run it continues, and an adverse possession under a survey, previous to its being carried into grant may be connected with a subsequent possession.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Kentucky. This was an action of ejectment in which the defendants in error were the lessors of the plaintiff in the court below. The declaration in ejectment was returned to the November term of that court, 1813. At the May term, 1814, the suit was abated as to one defendant; judgment by default was entered against Joseph Day, another defendant; and the defendants were admitted to defend instead of the casual ejector. The lessors of the plaintiff claimed under a patent issue to John Craig, in November, 1784. On the 20th of April, 1791, John Craig conveyed the lands mentioned in the declaration, in trust, to Robert Johnson, Elijah Craig, and the survivor of them. On the 11th of February, 1813, Robert Johnson, 293*] styling himself surviving *trustee, conveyed to the lessors of the plaintiff. The defendants below, now plaintiffs in error, claimed under a patent issue to John Coburn in September, 1795, founded on a survey made for Benjamin Netherland in May, 1782. John Coburn, claiming under the said survey, entered thereon about the year 1790, and dwelt in a house within the limits of said survey, but without the lines of Craig's patent. On the trial, the counsel for the defendants below moved the court to instruct the jury,

1st. That if the defendants, and those under whom they claim, were in the actual adverse possession of the lands in question, at the making of the deed by Craig's trustee to the lessors of the plaintiff, that deed did not pass such title as would enable them to recover in this suit.

2d. That if the defendants, and those under whom they claim, were in the actual adverse possession of the lands in question, at the making of the deed by Craig's trustee to the lessors of the plaintiff, and had held such adverse possession for twenty years next before said time, that said deed did not pass such title as would enable the plaintiffs to recover in this suit.

3d. That if the defendants, and those under whom they claim, have had possession of the land in question, or any part thereof, for twenty years next before the commencement of this suit, that the plaintiff cannot recover the lands so possessed for twenty years.

On the two first points, the court instructed the jury that, according to the principles of the common law, the deed from Craig's trustee to the lessors of *the plaintiff, would not [294 pass the title to the lessors of the plaintiff; but that under the operation of the act of assembly of the state of Kentucky, of 1798, the said deed was valid, and did pass the title to the lessors of the plaintiffs, notwithstanding the adverse possession of the defendants. The court refused to give the last instruction applied for, but did instruct the jury that if Coburn entered upon the land in controversy, under the survey on which his patent was founded, and he, and those holding under him, held the said lands for twenty years and upwards, prior to the commencement of this suit, yet, as the patent to Coburn did not issue until 1795, such possession could not avail the defendants claiming under the said Coburn, but that the plaintiffs could recover, notwithstanding such possession. To these opinions and instructions, given by the court, the counsel for the defendants below excepted, and the cause was brought by writ of error into this court.

Hardin, for the plaintiff in error, and defendant in ejectment. 1. No person out of possession can grant; first, because at common law there must be livery of seizin; second, because the grantee could not purchase a mere right of action. Coburn was in possession adversely; therefore, the deed from Craig's trustee to the lessors of the plaintiffs was void. 2. The limitation of twenty years' possession by the defendant before notice of the ejectment was a complete bar. 3. The deed of trust was joint, and it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove that one of the trustees was dead. The recital in the deed of conveyance, that [295 E. Craig was dead, was no sufficient evidence of that fact, except as between the grantor and grantee. 4. There is error in the judgment by default against Day.

Hughes and Talbot, contra. 1. Before the act of 1798, "concerning champerty and maintenance," no title could pass without an actual possession of the grantor; but this statute has abrogated the common law in that particular.

Wheat. 1.

But, in fact, Coburn was not in possession adversely, and a grant from the commonwealth of vacant lands gives the patentee a right to convey. 2. A person leaving it equivocal what his possession was, cannot have an instruction in his favor. It does not appear what part the defendant possessed, nor was the instruction asked under an adverse possession. Twenty years' possession was no bar; the local courts adhere to the English principle, that when the statute has once begun to run, it continues; but the act of assembly differs materially from the English act of 21 James I., c. 1.; and, after the statute has begun to run, it stops if the title passes to a person under any legal disability, and recommences after the disability is removed.

The act of assembly, on which the opinion of the court below, on the first question, was given, is entitled, "An act concerning champerty and maintenance." It enacts, "that no person 296] purchasing, or *procuring an interest in any legal or equitable claim to land held, &c., shall be precluded from prosecuting or defending said claim, under such purchase or contract; neither shall any suit, or suits, brought to establish such purchase, or make good the title to such claim, be considered as coming within the provisions, either at common law or by statute, against champerty or maintenance," &c. This court is of opinion that this statute enabled the lessors of the plaintiff to maintain a suit in their own name for the lands conveyed to them, and that there is no error in this instruction of the Circuit Court.

On the third question the Circuit Court instructed the jury that an adverse possession under a survey, previous to its being carried into grant, could not be connected with a subsequent possession, but that the computation must commence from the date of the patent. In giving this opinion, the court unquestionably erred. No principle can be better settled than that the whole possession must be taken together.

The counsel for the defendants in error have endeavored to sustain this opinion by a construction of the statute of limitations of Kentucky. They contend that after the statute has begun to run, it stops, if the title passes to a person under any legal disability, and recommences after such disability shall be removed. This construction, in the opinion of this court, is not justified by the words of the statute. Its language does not vary essentially from the language of the statute of James, the construction of which has been well settled; and it is to be construed as that statute, and all other acts 297] of limitation *founded on it, have been construed. This court is therefore of opinion that there is error in the instruction given by the Circuit Court to the jury on the third prayer of the plaintiff in error.¹

It has been contended by the counsel for the plaintiff, that there is also error in the judgment rendered against Joseph Day by default; but of his case the court can take no notice, as he is not one of the plaintiffs in error, and the judgment rendered against him is not before us. The judgment must be reversed for error in the directions of the court to the jury on the third point, on which instructions were given.

JUDGMENT.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record, from the Circuit Court for the District of Kentucky, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof this court is of opinion that there is error in the proceedings and judgment of the Circuit Court in this, that the judge thereof directed the jury that the tenants in possession could not connect their adverse possession previous to the date of the patent under which they claimed with their adverse possession subsequent thereto, but in the length of time which would bar the action could compute that only which had passed subsequent to the emanation of their grant. Wherefore it is considered by the court that the judgment of the Circuit *Court [298 be reversed and annulled, and that the cause be remanded to the Circuit Court, with directions to award a new trial therein.

Judgment reversed.

THE HARRISON. HERBERT, Claimant.

If the national character of property, captured and brought in for adjudication, appears ambiguous or neutral, and no claim is interposed, the cause is postponed for a year and a day after the prize proceedings are commenced; and if no claimant appears within that time, the property is condemned to the captors.

In prize causes this court has an appellate jurisdiction only, and a claim cannot for the first time be interposed here; but where the court below had proceeded to adjudication before the above period had elapsed, the cause was remanded to that court, with directions to allow a claim to be filed therein, and the libel to be amended, &c.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland. The libel filed by the captors, in this case, in the District Court, alleged that the goods for which condemnation was sought were captured and taken out of a Spanish vessel. No claim was filed for the goods in either of the courts below. But, upon hearing, the District Court dismissed the libel, upon the ground that the property, to whomsoever belonging, was protected by the 15th article of the treaty *of 1795 with Spain, by [299 which free ships make free goods; and this decree was affirmed, upon the same principle, in the Circuit Court. The captors brought the cause, by appeal, to this court; and a motion was made by Winder, in behalf of Elry Herbert, an asserted claimant, to be admitted to file a claim in this court.

We have considered this question with a view to the general rules of practice. Whenever a prize is brought to adjudication in the admiralty, if, upon the hearing of the cause upon the ship's papers, and the evidence taken in preparatory, the property appears to belong to enemies, it is immediately condemned. If its national character appear doubtful, or even neutral, and no claim is interposed, the court do not proceed to a final decree, but the cause is postponed, with a view to enable any person having title to assert it, within a reasonable time, before the court. This reasonable time has been, by the general usage of nations, fixed to a year and a day after the institution of the prize proceedings; and if no claim be interposed within that period, the property is deemed to be abandoned, and is condemned to the captors for contumacy and default of the supposed owner. In the present case the prescribed period had not elapsed at the time when the District Court proceeded to decree a dismissal of the libel. A claim cannot, by the practice of this court, be for the first time interposed here. In prize causes this court can exercise only an appellate jurisdiction, and between 300 parties who have litigated in the court below. We are all, therefore, of opinion that this cause ought to be remanded to the Circuit Court, with directions to allow the claim to be filed in that court; and, also, to allow the libel to be amended so as to conform to the general allegation of prize, and enable the captors to obtain condemnation of the property, if the asserted claim shall not be sustained, and the property shall not appear entitled to the protection of the Spanish treaty.

HARDEN v. FISHER ET AL.

Under the 9th article of the treaty of 1794, between the United States and Great Britain, by which it is provided that British subjects, holding lands in the United States, and their heirs, so far as respects those lands, and the remedies incident thereto, should not be considered as aliens; the parties must show that the title to the land for which the suit was commenced was in them, or their ancestors, at the time the treaty was made.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of New York. This case was argued, with great learning and ability, by Hoffman for the plaintiff in error, and defendant in ejectment, and by Stockton, for the defendants in 301 error and plaintiffs in ejectment. But, as the court gave no judgment upon the points discussed, the argument has been omitted.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of ejectment, brought by the defendants in error, in the Circuit Court for the District of New York, to recover certain lands, which they claim as the heirs of Donald Fisher, deceased. A special verdict was found in the case, which shows that Donald Fisher was a British subject, residing in the City of New York, and departed this life in the year

1798, leaving the lessors of the plaintiffs in ejectment his heirs at law, who are also British subjects. The plaintiffs, being thus found to be British subjects, are incapable of maintaining an action for real estate in the state of New York, unless they are enabled to do so by the 9th article of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, made in the year 1794, which provides that British subjects, holding lands in the United States, and their heirs, so far as respects those lands, and the legal remedies incident thereto, should not be considered as aliens. To avail themselves of this treaty, the lessors of the plaintiff below must show that their ancestors held the lands for which this suit was instituted at the time when it was made. The court does not mean to say that they must show a seizin in fact, or an actual possession of the land, but that the title was in him at the time. This must be *shown in order to bring the case [302 within the protection afforded by the treaty.

The jurors find that Donald Fisher was, on the 1st day of January, in the year 1777, seized in his demesne, as of fee, of the lands and tenements in the declaration mentioned, and was in the actual possession thereof, and continued so seized and possessed, until the rendering the judgment herein after mentioned.

On the 17th day of April, in the year 1780, the grand jury, for the county of Charlotte, in the state of New York, found an indictment, stating that Donald Fisher (who is the ancestor under whom the lessors of the plaintiffs claim) did, on the 14th day of July, in the year 1777, voluntarily with force and arms, adhere to the enemies of the state. The record proceeds to state that "the said Donald Fisher having, according to the form of the act of the legislature, entitled 'an act for the forfeiture and sale of the estates of persons who have adhered to the enemies of the state,' &c., been notified to appear and traverse the said indictment, and not having appeared and traversed within the time, and in the manner in and by the said act limited and required, it is therefore considered that the said Donald Fisher do forfeit all and singular the estate, both real and personal, whether in possession, reversion, or remainder, had or claimed by him in this state." This judgment was signed on the 29th day of December, 1783, and is the judgment referred to in the special verdict, as herein before mentioned. Under these proceedings the lands in the declaration mentioned *were sold, [303 and the defendants, in the court below, hold under that sale.

There are other points raised in the special verdict, and urged by counsel; but it will be unnecessary to notice them, and the court does not mean to give any opinion on them. The court gave judgment for the plaintiffs below, and that judgment is now before this court on a writ of error.

It is contended by the defendants in error that this judgment having been rendered subsequent to the treaty of peace of 1783, and in direct repugnance thereto, is not merely voidable, but absolutely void. By the plaintiffs it is alleged to be voidable only.

This court cannot now decide that question. The verdict does not find that Donald Fisher held his title until the treaty of 1794 was made.

and although nothing is found to show that he has parted with it, yet the court cannot presume that he did not part with it. The verdict ought to have shown that the title was in Donald Fisher when the treaty was made, and continued in him to the time of his death. For this essential defect, the verdict is too imperfect to enable the court to decide on the case. The judgment of the Circuit Court must therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded to that court, with directions to award a venire facias de novo.

JUDGMENT.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the Circuit Court for the District of New York, and was 304*] argued by counsel; *all which being considered, this court is of opinion that there is error in the judgment of the Circuit Court for the District of New York, in this, that the said court ought not to have rendered judgment on the said verdict in favor of the plaintiffs in ejectment, because it does not appear certainly, in the said verdict, that the ancestor, under whom they claim, held in law, or in fact, the lands mentioned in the declaration, when the treaty of 1794, between the United States and Great Britain, was made; therefore, it is considered by this court that the said judgment be reversed and annulled, and that the cause be remanded to the Circuit Court for the District of New York, with directions to award a venire facias de novo.

under, the United States, and the decision is against the title, right, privilege, or exemption specially set up or claimed, by either party, under such clause of the constitution, treaty, statute or commission.

Such judgment or decree may be re-examined by writ of error in the same manner as if rendered in a circuit court.

If the cause has been once remanded before, and the state court decline or refuse to carry into effect the mandate of the Supreme Court thereon, this court will proceed to a final decision of the same, and award execution thereon.

If the validity or construction of a treaty of the United States is drawn in question, and the decision is against its validity, or the title specially set up by either party, under the treaty, this court has jurisdiction to ascertain that title and determine its legal validity, and is not confined to the abstract construction of the treaty itself.

The return of a copy of the record, under the seal of the court, certified by the clerk, and annexed to the writ of error, is a sufficient return in such a case.

It need not appear that the judge who granted the writ of error did, upon issuing the citation, take a bond, as required by the 22d section of the judiciary act. That provision is merely directory to the judge, and the presumption of law is, until the contrary appears, that every judge who signs a citation has obeyed the injunctions of the act.

THIS was a writ of error to the Court of Appeals of the State of Virginia, founded upon the refusal of that court to obey the mandate of this court, requiring the judgment rendered in this same cause, at February term, 1813, to be carried into due execution. The following is the judgment of the Court of Appeals, rendered on the mandate: "The court is unanimously of opinion that the appellate power of the Supreme Court of the United States does not *extend to this court under a sound [*306 construction of the constitution of the United States; that so much of the 25th section of the act of Congress, to establish the judicial courts of the United States, as extends the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to this court, is not in pursuance of the constitution of the United States. That the writ of error in this cause was improvidently allowed under the authority of that act; that the proceedings thereon in the Supreme Court were coram non jndice in relation to this court, and that obedience to its mandate be declined by the court."

The original suit was an action of ejectment, brought by the defendant in error, in one of the district courts of Virginia, holden at Winchester, for the recovery of a parcel of land, situate within that tract, called the northern neck of Virginia, and part and parcel thereof. A declaration in ejectment was served (April, 1791,) on the tenants in possession; whereupon Denny Fairfax (late Denny Martin), a British subject, holding the land in question,

NOTE.—Where by the statutes of a state it is necessary in order to appeal from an inferior state court to the highest court of the state, that leave of such highest court or of a judge thereof should be first obtained, and where that leave has been refused, a writ of error, if there be in the case "a federal question," properly lies, under section 709 of the U. S. revised statutes, to the inferior, and not to such highest court. Gregory v. McVeigh, 23 Wall. 294, 307.

It is necessary in order to give the Supreme Court jurisdiction over a judgment of a state court, that it should appear that one of the questions mentioned in the statute was raised and presented to the state court; and that such question was decided by the state court against the title, right, privilege or immunity, specially set up or claimed by the plaintiff in error, under the constitution, treaty, statute, commission or authority of the United States, or that such a decision was necessary to the judgment or decree rendered in the case. Murdock v. City of Memphis, 20 Wall. 591.

If such claim of right of the plaintiff in error was erroneously decided, by the state court, still, if the judgment of the state court can be sustained upon any other ground or issue adjudged in it, the judgment will be affirmed. Idem.

This court has no jurisdiction to re-examine the judgment of a state court, where a federal question was not in fact passed upon and where a decision of it was unnecessary in the view which the court below took of the case; or where the error was one of the jury alone, the charge of the court being correct. McManis v. O'Sullivan, 1 Otto, 578; Bol-under the devise of the late Thomas Lord Fairfax, was admitted to defend the suit, and plead the general issue, upon the usual terms of confessing lease, entry, and ouster, &c., and agreeing to insist, at the trial, on the title only, &c. The facts being settled in the form of a case agreed to be taken and considered as a special verdict, the court, on consideration thereof, gave judgment (24th of April, 1794), in favor of the defendant in ejectment. From that judgment the plaintiff in ejectment (now defendant in error) appealed to the Court of Appeals, 307 being the highest court of law of Virginia. At April term, 1810, the Court of Appeals reversed the judgment of the District Court, and gave judgment for the then appellant, now defendant in error, and thereupon the case was removed into this court.

State of the facts as settled by the case agreed:

1st. The title of the late Lord Fairfax to all that entire territory and tract of land called the Northern Neck of Virginia, the nature of his estate in the same, as he inherited it, and the purport of the several charters and grants from the kings Charles II. and James II., under which his ancestor held, are agreed to be truly recited in an act of the assembly of Virginia, passed in the year 1736 (vide Rev. Code, v. 1, ch. 3, p. 5), "For the confirming and better securing the titles to lands in the Northern Neck, held under the Rt. Hon. Thomas Lord Fairfax," &c.

From the recitals of the act, it appears that the first letters patent (1 Car. II.), granting the land in question to Ralph Lord Hopton and others, being surrendered, in order to have the grant renewed, with alterations, the Earl of St. Albans and others (partly survivors of, and partly purchasers under, the first patentees) obtained new letters patent (2 Car. II.), for the same land and appurtenances, and by the same description, but with additional privileges and reservations, &c.

The estate granted is described to be, "All that entire tract, territory, or parcel of land, situate, &c., and bounded by, and within the heads of, the rivers Tappahannock, &c., together with the rivers themselves, and all the islands, &c.; and all woods, underwoods, timber, &c., 308 mines of gold and silver, lead, tin, &c., and quarries of stone and coal, &c., to have, hold and enjoy the said tract of lands, &c., to the said patentees, their heirs and assigns forever, to their only use and behoof, and to no other use, intent or purpose whatsoever."

There is reserved to the crown the annual rent of £6 13 4 "in lieu of all services and demands whatsoever;" also one-fifth part of all gold, and one-tenth part of all silver mines.

To the absolute title and seizin in fee of the land and its appurtenance, and the beneficial use and enjoyment of the same, assured to the patentees, as tenants in capite, by the most direct and abundant terms of conveyancing, there are superadded certain collateral powers of baronial dominion; reserving, however, to the governor, council and assembly of Virginia, the exclusive authority in all the military concerns of the granted territory, and the power to impose taxes on the persons and property of its inhabitants for the public and common defense of the colony, as well as a general jurisdiction over the patentees, their heirs and assigns, and all other inhabitants of the said territory.

In the enumeration of privileges specifically granted to the patentees, their heirs and assigns, is that "freely and without molestation of the king, to give, grant, or by any ways or means, sell or alien all and singular the granted premises, and every part and parcel thereof, to any person or persons being willing to contract for, or buy, the same."

There is also a condition to avoid the grant, as to so much of the granted premises as should not be *possessed, inhabited, or planted [309] ed, by the means or procurement of the patentees, their heirs or assigns, in the space of 21 years.

The third and last of the letters patent referred to (4 Jac. II.), after reciting a sale and conveyance of the granted premises by the former patentees, to Thomas Lord Culpepper, "who was thereby become sole owner and proprietor thereof, in fee-simple," proceeds to confirm the same to Lord Culpepper, in fee-simple, and to release him from the said condition for having the lands inhabited or planted as aforesaid.

The said act of assembly then recites, that Thomas Lord Fairfax, heir at law of Lord Culpepper, had become "sole proprietor of the said territory, with the appurtenances, and the above-recited letters patent."

By another act of assembly, passed in the year 1748 (Rev. Code, v. 1, ch. 4, p. 10), certain grants from the crown, made while the exact boundaries of the Northern Neck were doubtful, for lands which proved to be within those boundaries, as then recently settled and determined, were, with the express consent of Lord Fairfax, confirmed to the grantees; to be held, nevertheless, of him, and all the rents, services, profits, and emoluments (reserved by such grants), to be paid and performed to him.

In another act of assembly, passed May, 1779, ling v. Lersner, 1 Otto, 594; Brown v. Atwell, 2 Otto, 327; Woodruff v. Hough, 1 Otto, 596; nor unless the decision of the state court is against the plaintiff in error. Long v. Converse, 1 Otto, 105. But in a chancery suit, where all of the evidence is brought up, as part of the record, the case may be re-examined as to the law and the facts, so far as to determine the validity of a right claimed under an act of Congress, the decision of the state court being adverse thereto. Rep. R. B. Co. v. Kansas P. R. Co., 2 Otto, 315.

Though there be error in the charge, yet if it be evident that if the court had charged correctly the result would have been the same, this court will not reverse. Decatur Bk. v. St. Louis Bk., 21 Wall. 294.

If the record shows that a federal question was not necessarily involved, and does not show that one was raised, this court will not go outside of it, to the opinion or elsewhere, to ascertain whether one was in fact decided. Moore v. Mississippi, 21 Wall. 636.

If the facts and decision are such as to show that a federal right was adversely decided below, the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the U. S. is not defeated by showing that the record does not mention a federal question, or state in terms that one was presented below. Murray v. Charleston, 6 Otto, 432; Wolf v. Stix, 6 Otto, 541.

A decision of the highest court of a state, reversing a decision of a court below, and remanding the case for further proceedings, is not final, so that it can be reviewed by the U. S. Supreme Court. Davis v. Crouch, 4 Otto, 514.

for establishing a land-office, and ascertaining the terms and manner of granting waste and unappropriated lands, there is the following clause, viz. (vide Chy. Rev. of 1783, ch. 13, s. 310*) 6, p. 98): "And that the *proprietary of land within this commonwealth may no longer be subject to any servile, feudal, or precarious tenure, and to prevent the danger to a free state from perpetual revenue, be it enacted, that the royal mines, quit-rents, and all other reservations and conditions in the patents or grants of land from the crown of England, under the former government, shall be, and are hereby declared null and void; and that all lands thereby respectively granted shall be held in absolute and unconditional property, to all intents and purposes whatsoever, in the same manner with the lands hereafter granted by the commonwealth, by virtue of this act."

2d. As respects the actual exercise of his proprietary rights by Lord Fairfax.

It is agreed that he did, in the year 1748, open and conduct, at his own expense, an office within the Northern Neck, for granting and conveying what he described and called the waste and ungranted lands therein, upon certain terms, and according to certain rules by him established and published; that he did, from time to time, grant parcels of such lands in fee (the deeds being registered at his said office, in books kept for that purpose, by his own clerks and agents); that, according to the uniform tenor of such grants, he did, styling himself proprietor of the Northern Neck, &c., in consideration of a certain composition to him paid, and of certain annual rents therein reserved, grant, &c.; with a clause of re-entry for non-payment of the rent, &c.; that he also demised, for lives and terms of years, parcels of the same description of lands, also reserving 311*) annual *rents; that he kept his said office open for the purposes aforesaid, from the year 1748 till his death, in December, 1781; during the whole of which period, and before, he exercised the right of granting in fee, and demising for lives and terms of years, as aforesaid, and received and enjoyed the rents annually, as they accrued, as well under the grants in fee as under the leases for lives and years. It is also agreed that Lord Fairfax died seized of lands in the Northern Neck, equal to about 300,000 acres, which had been granted by him in fee, to one T. B. Martin, upon the same terms and conditions, and in the same form as the other grants in fee before described; which lands were, soon after being so granted, reconveyed to Lord Fairfax in fee.

3d. Lord Fairfax, being a citizen and inhabitant of Virginia, died in the month of December, 1781, and, by his last will and testament, duly made and published, devised the whole of his lands, &c., called, or known by the name of the Northern Neck of Virginia, in fee, to Denny Fairfax (the original defendant in ejectment), by the name and description of the Reverend Denny Martin, &c., upon condition of his taking the name and arms of Fairfax, &c.; and it is admitted that he fully complied with the conditions of the devise.

4th. It is agreed that Denny Fairfax, the devisee, was a native born British subject, and never became a citizen of the United States, nor any one of them, but always resided in England, as well during the revolutionary war as from his birth, about the year 1750, to his death, which happened some time between *the [*312 years 1796 and 1803, as appears from the record of the proceedings in the Court of Appeals.

It is also admitted that Lord Fairfax left, at his death, a nephew named Thomas Bryan Martin, who was always a citizen of Virginia, being the younger brother of the said devisee, and the second son of a sister of the said Lord Fairfax; which sister was still living, and had always been a British subject.

5th. The land demanded by this ejectment being agreed to be part and parcel of the said territory and tract of land called the Northern Neck, and to be a part of that description of lands within the Northern Neck, called and described by Lord Fairfax as "waste and ungranted," and being also agreed never to have been escheated and seized into the hands of the commonwealth of Virginia, pursuant to certain acts of assembly concerning escheators, and never to have been the subject of any inquest of office, was contained and included in a certain patent, bearing date the 30th of April, 1789, under the hand of the then governor, and the seal of the commonwealth of Virginia, purporting that the land in question is granted by the said commonwealth unto David Hunter (the lessor of the plaintiff in ejectment) and his heirs forever, by virtue and in consideration of a land-office treasury warrant, issued the 28d of January, 1788. The said lessor of the plaintiff in ejectment is, and always has been, a citizen of Virginia; and in pursuance of his said patent, entered into the land in question, and was thereof possessed, prior to the institution of the said action of ejectment.

*6th. The definitive treaty of peace [*313 concluded in the year 1783, between the United States of America and Great Britain, and also the several acts of the assembly of Virginia, concerning the premises, are referred to as making a part of the case agreed.

Upon this state of facts the judgment of the Court of Appeals of Virginia was reversed by this court, at February term, 1813, and thereupon the mandate above mentioned was issued to the Court of Appeals, which being disobeyed, the cause was again brought before this court.

Jones, for the plaintiffs in error. There are two questions in the cause: 1st. Whether this court has jurisdiction. 2d. Whether it has been rightly exercised in the present case. 1. Contemporaneous construction, and the uniform practice since the constitution was adopted, confirms the jurisdiction of the court. The authority of all the popular writers who were friendly to it, is to the same effect; and the letters of Publius show that it was agreed, both by its friends and foes, that the judiciary power extends to this class of cases. In the conventions, by which the constitution was adopted, it was never denied by its friends that its powers extended as far as its enemies alleged. It was admitted, and justified as expedient and necessary. Ascending from these popular and parliamentary authorities to the more judicial evidence of what is the supreme law of the land, we find a concurrence of opinion. This government *is not a mere confederacy, like [314 the Grecian leagues, or the Germanic constitution, or the old continental confederation. In 275] these sections, did not preclude *our vessels from going to any part of the world, but only forbid their bringing to this country the articles whose importation was prohibited. If the 12th section had also been revived, then no vessel of the United States could have gone to Great Britain or France, and the distinction of permitted and forbidden ports would have continued until the 1st of May, 1810. But as the whole embargo system expired in June, 1809, not only by the 19th section of the act of March, 1809, but also by the express provision of the act of June of the same year, the conclusion is inevitable that when the Edward sailed there was no law in force by which any distinction of prohibited and permitted ports existed; and that, therefore, the not giving the bond in question was no violation of law.

No notice has been taken of either of the proclamations of the President, because, if the view here presented be correct, neither of them has any bearing on the question. Admitting the validity of both of them, the latter would not make the ports of England prohibited ports, if the laws which created the distinction had done it away by opening to the citizens of the United States the ports of every nation on the globe. The President's power could only exist while such a state of things continued as suggested the necessity of, and would render, an interference on his part proper and useful, and no longer.

It may be, and has been, said that the opinion here expressed is at variance with the public opinion on this subject, as well as with the understanding *of the collectors and some other officers of government; and that even this court has, at its present term, condemned property for the same offense with which the Edward is charged. The answer to all this is, that the condemnation alluded to passed sub silentio, without bringing the point distinctly to our view, and is, therefore, no precedent; and that, as to public opinion, or that of the officers of government, however respectable they may be, it can furnish no good grounds for enforcing so heavy a penalty, unless, on investigation, it shall appear to have been correctly formed. It was also urged that Congress must have supposed the law to be as it is now contended for by the Attorney-General, or they would not have passed the 3d section of the act of the 28th June, 1809, when there was no state of things to which its provisions could apply. To this the answer which was given at the bar is satisfactory. At the time of the bringing in of that bill the embargo laws were still in force, and would continue so until the end of that session. Now, as it could not then be foreseen that the bill would not become a law until the last day of the session, a prohibition not to go to prohibited ports was necessary, but became nugatory by the law not passing until the time prescribed for the extinction of the whole system.

Upon the whole, it appears to me clear that there was no law in force when the Edward left Savannah interdicting her from going to any foreign port whatever, or requiring from her owners any bond not to go to such port; and, under this persuasion, *I have thought [277] it a duty to express my dissent from the judgment which has been just rendered.

But were the case doubtful, I should still arrive at the same conclusion, rather than execute a law so excessively penal, about whose existence and meaning such various opinions have been entertained.

To satisfy ourselves that great difficulties must exist, in relation to this law, we have only to look at the progress of the case now before us. The offense with which the Edward is charged in the information, is going, without giving bond, to a prohibited foreign port. The condemnation in the Circuit Court, however, proceeded on the ground of all the ports of Great Britain (to one of which it was alleged she was going) being permitted ports. In the very able argument which was made here in support of the prosecution, it was attempted to be shown that Liverpool was not a permitted, but an interdicted, port. This state of uncertainty, which, it would seem, could hardly exist if the legislature had expressed themselves with that precision and perspicuity which are always expected in criminal cases, would, with me, independent of my own convictions that there was no such prohibiting law, have been a sufficient reason for restoring this property to the claimants.

*Sentence of the Circuit Court affirmed.*¹

1.—In order to enable the reader the better to understand this case, the following account of the dates and substance of the British orders in council, the French decrees, and the consequent acts of the United States government, has been subjoined:

278*] *On the 16th of May, 1806, the British government issued an order in council declaring the coast included between the Elbe and Brest in a state of blockade.

On the 21st of November, 1806, the French emperor issued his Berlin decree declaring Great Britain and her dependencies in a state of blockade.

On the 7th of January, 1807, the British government issued an order in council prohibiting neutral ships from carrying on trade from one enemy's port to another, including France and her allies.

On the 11th of November, 1807, the British orders in council were issued, which declared the continental ports from which British ships were excluded in a state of blockade (except in case of ships cleared out from Great Britain whose cargoes had paid a transit duty), and rendered liable to condemnation all neutral ships, with their cargoes, trading to or from the ports of France, or her allies, and their dependencies, or having on board certificates of origin.

On the 7th of December, 1807, the French emperor issued his Milan decree, declaring that any neutral ships which should have touched at a British port, or paid a transit duty to the British government, or submitted to be searched by British cruisers, should be liable to condemnation.

On the 22d of December, 1807, the American embargo took place.

On the 1st of March, 1809, the embargo was removed, and a non-intercourse substituted with both France and England.

On the 19th of April, 1809, a negotiation was concluded by Mr. Erskine, in consequence of which the trade with Great Britain was renewed on the 10th of June.

On the 26th of April, 1809, a British order in council was issued, modifying the former blockade, which was henceforth to be confined to ports under the governments of Holland (as far north as the river Ems) and France, together with the colonies of both, and all ports of Italy included between Orbitello and Pesaro.

v.
WATTS' EXECUTOR.

Under the 6th and 8th sections of the Act of Assembly of Virginia, of the 22d of December, 1794, property pledged to the Mutual Assurance Society, &c., continues liable for assessments, on account of the losses insured against, in the hands of a bona fide purchaser without notice.

A mere change of sovereignty produces no change in the state of rights existing in the soil; and the cession of the District of Columbia to the national government did not affect the lien created by the above act on real property situate in the town of Alexandria, though the personal character or liability of a member of the society could not be thereby forced on a purchaser of such property.

A PPEAL from the Circuit Court in the District of Columbia for Alexandria county. The cause was argued by Swann for the appellants, and by Taylor and Lee for the respondents.

JOHNSON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

280*] This is a bill in chancery, filed by the complainants, to charge certain premises, in the possession of the defendant, situate in the town of Alexandria, with the payment of a sum of money, assessed in pursuance of the laws establishing the Mutual Assurance Society, for quotas becoming due after his testator acquired possession. The executor has, in fact, sold the premises, under a power given him by the testator, but the money remains in his hands; and it is conceded that the sole object now contended for is to charge the money arising from the sale of the land in question with the assessment to which it is contended that the land was liable. The insurance was made in 1799, and the property sold to the defendant's testator in 1807, long after the town of Alexandria ceased to be subject to the laws of Virginia. It is admitted that the sale was made without notice of this incumbrance (if it was one), and the quota demanded was assessed on the premises for a loss which happened subsequent to the transfer. The points made in the case arise out of the construction of the 6th and 8th sections of the act of Virginia, passed the 22d of December, 1794. The 6th section is in these words: "If the funds should not be sufficient, a repartition among the whole of the persons insured shall be made, and each shall pay, on demand of the cashier, his, her, or their share, according to the sum insured, and rate of hazard at which the building stands, agreeably to the rate of premium, for which purpose it is hereby declared that the subscribers, as soon as they shall insure their property in the Assurance Society aforesaid, do mutually, for 281] themselves, *their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, engage their property insured as security, and subject the same to be sold, if necessary, for the payment of such quotas." And the 8th section is in these words: "To the end that purchasers or mortgagees of any property insured, by virtue of this act, may not become losers thereby, the subscriber selling, mortgaging, or otherwise transferring such property, shall, at the time, apprise the purchaser or mortgagee of such assurance; and indorse to him or them the policy thereof. And in every case of such change the purchaser or mortgagee shall be considered as a subscriber in the room of the original, and the property so sold, mortgaged, or otherwise transferred, shall still remain liable for the payment of the quotas, in the same manner as if the right thereof had remained in the original owner."

In the argument two points were made: 1st. That property pledged to the society remained liable for the quota to a purchaser without notice. 2d. That the purchaser, by the purchase of such property, although without notice, became, by virtue of the 8th section, a member of the society, and liable, in all respects, as such.

The second of these questions is now withdrawn from the consideration of this court by an agreement entered on record. And it must be admitted, that whatever may be the strict construction of the 8th section and its operation in the state of Virginia, so far as it is intended to force on the purchaser a personal character or liability, it could have no operation in the town of Alexandria at the date of this transfer. *The laws of Virginia had then [282 ceased to be the laws of Alexandria, and it could only be under an actually existing law, operating at the time of the transfer, that the character of membership in the Virginia company would be forced upon the purchaser. This is not one of those cases in which tenure attaches to an individual a particular characteristic or obligation; such cases arise exclusively between the occupant of the soil and the sovereignty which presides immediately over the territory. The transfer, therefore, of the District of Alexandria to the national government, put an end to the operation of the 8th section, so far as it operated by mere force of law, independent of his own consent, to fasten on the purchaser the characteristics of a member. But it is otherwise with regard to the soil. The idea is now exploded that a mere change of sovereignty produced any change in the state of rights existing in the soil. In this respect everything remains in the actual state, whether the interest was acquired by law, under a grant, or by individual contract.¹

with Great Britain again took place, in consequence of Mr. Erskine's arrangement not being ratified.

On the 1st of May, 1810, the trade with both Great Britain and France was opened, under a law of Congress, that whenever either power should rescind its orders or decrees, the President should issue a proclamation to that effect; and in case the other party should not, within three months, equally withdraw its orders or decrees, that the non-importation act should go into effect with respect to that power.

Wheat. 1.

On the 2d of November, 1810, the President issued his proclamation, declaring the Berlin and Milan decrees to be so far withdrawn as no longer to affect the neutral rights of America; and the orders in council not being rescinded,

On the 2d of February, 1811, the importation of British goods, and the admission of British ships into America, were prohibited.

On the 4th of April, 1812, an embargo was laid in the United States, and on the 18th of June following, war was declared against Great Britain.

to this: Does property, pledged to the society, continue liable for assessments in the hands of a bona fide purchaser without notice, notwithstanding that he does not become a member by the transfer?

Here we give no opinion on the extent or meaning of the words "property insured," how far they will operate to charge the lands on which buildings stand. The question was 283 not made in the argument, and is *probably of no consequence in this or any other case. We only notice it in order that such a construction may not be supposed admitted, as is too often concluded, because a court passes over a question sub silentio.

Whatever be the property thus pledged, it is very clear that the words of the 6th section are abundantly sufficient to create in it a common law lien, not only in the hands of the original subscriber, but by express words in those of his assignee. If the case rested here, there would be no doubt or difficulty; but every law, and every contract, must be construed with a reference to the subject of that law or contract, and which it is designed to answer. In this view we readily concede that the duration of the lien could not extend beyond the duration of the liability of the subscriber to pay the premium; nor could the liability of the subscriber extend beyond the liability of the company to indemnify him. On the other hand, it would seem that as long as the company could exact of the subscriber the premium, they ought to be held liable to indemnify him. It will, then, be conceded that the liability of the subscriber, and of the company, are mutual, correlative, and co-extensive, and it remains to be examined how this concession affects the case.

It is very clear that there are but three ways by which a subscriber can cease to be a member: 1st. By the consumption of the buildings insured, which results from the nature of the contract. 2d. By complying with the stipulations of the 9th article of the rules and regulations of the society. 284 3d. By substituting a vendee in his place, in conformity with the 8th section of the act of the 22d December, 1794. If, then, a subscriber has not become discharged in one of these three ways, what is to prevent the society from pursuing their summary remedy against him? They are not bound to search for his vendee, or to raise the money by a sale of the property pledged; much less are they bound to prosecute their remedy against a purchaser whose name is unknown to them, or who may be absent from the state, or from the United States, or insolvent, or protected, at the time, by some legal privilege. Their contract is with the original subscriber; their rules point out the mode in which he is to extricate himself from this liability, and if he has not pursued it, what defense is left him against a suit instituted by the society? The court cannot imagine one that could avail him. He cannot urge that he has parted with the property. The rules point out to him the conduct that he is to pursue in that event. He may give notice to the vendee of the insurance, and tender an assignment. If the vendee refuse to receive it, he is bound to remain but six weeks longer under the obligation to pay his quotas and indemnify the vendee, at the end of which time he will be entitled to a discharge, upon giving due notice, and complying with the other requisitions of the 9th section. Nor can he urge that he has no longer any interest in the thing insured; this, if any plea at all, is none in his lips. It belongs to the insurer to avail himself of it, if it belongs to anyone. But it is a plea not true in fact; for he continues *to indemnify his vendee against the [285 quotas that may be assessed, which, by possibility, may reach to the value of the whole property sold or insured; and, if correct in principle or fact, still this plea could not avail him, since it is in consequence of his own folly or laches that he continues liable to pay the premium of insurance for another's property. And should it be urged that this would be converting an actual insurance into a wager policy, two answers may be given to it, either of which is sufficient; that there is nothing illegal in a wager policy, in itself, and if there were, it is no objection in this case, when it results from the constitution and laws of the society.

But it may be contended that the insurer is discharged, and, therefore, the liability for the quotas ceases.

It is unquestionably true, as a general principle, that where an insurer runs no risk, equity does not consider him entitled to a premium; and, although there exist some reasons in the policy and constitution of this society to apply it, in its fullest extent, to this case, yet, to give the argument its utmost weight, we are disposed to concede it. But what has occurred in this case to discharge the underwriters from their contract? The subscriber was clearly not discharged from his liability to them, and this single consideration furnishes a strong reason for holding them still bound under their contract. What has the subscriber done inconsistent with that contract? The only act he can be charged with, is alienating, without indorsing, the policy. But alienation *alone is perfectly [286 consistent with the contract, for the policy issues to him and his assigns; and so far from interposing any obstruction to alienation, provision is made for that very case, and unlimited discretion vested in the subscriber to indorse his policy to whom he pleases. Nor is alienation, without indorsing the policy, considered in any more offensive light; inasmuch as the 8th section which enforces the assignment declares expressly that it is for the benefit of purchasers and mortgagees, "to the intent that they may not become losers thereby." It is not pretended that it is for the society's own security; nor do they ever require notice to be given them in case of such transfer of the policy. As to them, therefore, it is an innocent act, and we see no ground on which the society can be discharged, either to the vendor or vendee; they certainly remain liable, and although it may be a question to which of them equity would decree the money, yet to one or the other it certainly would be adjudged; but it is not material to this argument which, as it is a question between the vendor and vendee.

If, then, the case presents no legal ground for discharging either insurer or insured from the contract, and the lien created by the 6th section be commensurate with the liability of the insured, it will follow that the plaintiffs, in this case, ought to have a decree in their favor.

But we will examine, at a closer view, the liability of the property in the hands of the vendee. That he is not liable to the summary remedy is evident from a variety of considerations. He must, then, be *brought into chancery to have his property subjected to the consequences of the lien, whenever a loss happens and a quota is assessed. In that case his defense will always be just what it is in this—that he purchased without notice. But this was never held to be a defense to a bill to foreclose a mortgage, which is precisely a similar case to this. Nor is it any better defense to urge that he could derive no benefit under the policy in case of a loss; for this is precisely the same defense, a little varied, as will be seen by supposing that the vendee of a mortgageor should plead, to a bill of foreclosure, that the money borrowed did not come to his use. But his case is not as good as that of the vendee of the mortgageor in the case supposed; for the 8th section makes provision for his relief. That section says: "To the end that purchasers, or mortgagees, of any property insured, may not become losers thereby" the vendor shall give them notice, and indorse the policy over. In what manner shall the purchasers, or mortgagees, become losers, unless the lien is to continue on the property in their hands? If the vendor be guilty of the folly of paying the quotas, and the vendee never receives notice of the lien, through a demand from the society, there is no damage sustained. If he should be assailed with such a demand, he has a right to require of the vendee an assignment of the policy; and as there existed an original duty to make such an assignment, it may well be held to operate, nunc pro tunc, and carry with it all the benefits of an original assignment.

288*] *But it is contended that the 8th section explains and limits the 6th section in such a manner as to restrict the duration of the lien in the hands of the vendee to those cases only in which the transfer of the policy also takes place.

This consequence cannot be logically maintained. The argument is, that the words "such change" mean only a change of the property, attended with an assignment of the policy, and that if the legislature had supposed that property sold would, in the hands of the vendee, remain subject to the lien, they would not expressly have subjected it in such a case. But this section will, with philological correctness, admit of a different construction, and a construction more consistent with legal principles, inasmuch as it will not admit of an implication inconsistent with the preceding section, and even with other parts of the same section. Nor, if the construction on which this argument is founded were unavoidable, would the conclusion follow which the argument asserts. The question is, what is the meaning of the words "in every change," in the section under consideration? The solution is only to be found by referring to the preceding and only other clause of the same section; and there we find that a general provision is inevitably to be made for every possible change of sale or purchase. The operation of the clause will, then, be only to confirm and support the general words of the sixth section, and if it left any doubt with regard to the duration of the lien in the hands of the vendee, to remove those doubts by express provision. This construction is also the most consistent with the recital *in the first clause of [*289 the same section, which, as has been before observed, with another view, is founded altogether on the idea that property sold remained pledged to the society in the hands of the vendee, whether with or without notice; as, in that case alone, could vendees, or mortgagees, need the protection held out to them in that clause.

But if a different construction could legally be given to that section, so as to restrict the words "every such case" to mean those cases only which were attended with an assignment of the policy, it would not follow that the lien ceased its operation in all others. To apply to this case the maxim, expressio unius est exclusio alterius, would be a glaring sophism. For, the only principle on which such a conclusion could be founded would be that the repetition of a legal provision, included, with many others, in another law, produced a repeal of all others by necessary implication. Such an implication may be resorted to in order to determine the intention of the legislature in a case of doubtful import, but cannot operate to destroy the effect of clear and unequivocal expressions. An obvious and unanswerable objection to giving this effect to this clause is, that it puts it in the power of the subscriber to exonerate the property from the lien by the single act of sale, not even sustaining it for the term of six weeks after the notice given of his intention to withdraw; an effect glaringly inconsistent, no less with the express words than with the general view of the law on this subject. For there is nothing in the act which obliges the vendee to accept an assignment. *A tender to [*290 him, therefore, cannot subject him to any onerous consequences. He does no more than what he may lawfully do. If, then, the lien ceases, unless he accepts the assignment, and it is legally at his option to accept or refuse, the subscriber, in having the right to sell to whom he pleases, has also the duration of the lien submitted to his will.

Some difficulty has also existed in the minds of some of the court on the contingent nature of this lien, whether the lien was complete to all purposes at any period before the assessment of a quota. But, on this subject the majority are of opinion that, as to legal incumbrance, or duration of a lien, it makes no difference whether its object is to secure an existing debt or a contingent indemnity. In the case of Black et al., mortgagees of Gardner, v. Kraig & Mitchell, this court sustained a mortgage, given to secure an indorser against notes which he might indorse, where he had entered into no stipulation to indorse for the mortgageor. And in the case of bonds given for the discharge of duties, offices, or annuities, it never was maintained as an objection that the object of the lien was future, contingent, or uncertain. In this case the mutual stipulation to indemnify each other against losses operates as a purchase of the lien, and places the parties on strong equitable grounds as to each other.

Some cases were cited in the argument from the reports of decisions which have been made in the courts of Virginia. This court uniformly acts under the influence of a desire to conform its decisions to those of the state courts on their 291*] local laws; and *would not hesitate to pay great respect to those decisions, if they had appeared to reach the question now under consideration. But they are persuaded that those cases do not come up to the present. In the case of Greenhow et al. v. Barton (1 Munf., 598), it is true that the decision of the District Court, which was finally confirmed, was in favor of the purchaser without notice. But it was solely on the question whether he was liable to the summary remedy, or, in other words, liable generally, as a member. And the case of Anne Byrd, reported in the cases of the General Court, was likewise the case of a motion for a summary judgment. In the latter case, the court went much further in charging the vendee than this court is called upon to proceed in the present case. But in neither of those cases was a bill filed to charge the vendee, as in the present; nor was the question brought up in either detached from that of his general liability as a member.

The decree below will be reversed, and a decree ordered to be entered for the complainants.

WALDEN v. THE HEIRS OF GRATZ.

Under the Act of Assembly of Kentucky of 1798, entitled, "An Act concerning champerty and maintenance," a deed will pass the title to lands, notwithstanding an adverse possession.

The statute of limitations of Kentucky, does not differ essentially from the English statute of the 21st James I., c. 1, and is to be construed as that statute, and all other acts of limitation founded upon it, have been construed. The whole possession must be taken together; when the statute has once begun to run it continues, and an adverse possession under a survey, previous to its being carried into grant may be connected with a subsequent possession.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Kentucky. This was an action of ejectment in which the defendants in error were the lessors of the plaintiff in the court below. The declaration in ejectment was returned to the November term of that court, 1813. At the May term, 1814, the suit was abated as to one defendant; judgment by default was entered against Joseph Day, another defendant; and the defendants were admitted to defend instead of the casual ejector. The lessors of the plaintiff claimed under a patent issue to John Craig, in November, 1784. On the 20th of April, 1791, John Craig conveyed the lands mentioned in the declaration, in trust, to Robert Johnson, Elijah Craig, and the survivor of them. On the 11th of February, 1813, Robert Johnson, 293*] styling himself surviving *trustee, conveyed to the lessors of the plaintiff. The defendants below, now plaintiffs in error, claimed under a patent issue to John Coburn in September, 1795, founded on a survey made for Benjamin Netherland in May, 1782. John Coburn, claiming under the said survey, entered thereon about the year 1790, and dwelt in a house within the limits of said survey, but without the lines of Craig's patent. On the trial, the counsel for the defendants below moved the court to instruct the jury,

1st. That if the defendants, and those under whom they claim, were in the actual adverse possession of the lands in question, at the making of the deed by Craig's trustee to the lessors of the plaintiff, that deed did not pass such title as would enable them to recover in this suit.

2d. That if the defendants, and those under whom they claim, were in the actual adverse possession of the lands in question, at the making of the deed by Craig's trustee to the lessors of the plaintiff, and had held such adverse possession for twenty years next before said time, that said deed did not pass such title as would enable the plaintiffs to recover in this suit.

3d. That if the defendants, and those under whom they claim, have had possession of the land in question, or any part thereof, for twenty years next before the commencement of this suit, that the plaintiff cannot recover the lands so possessed for twenty years.

On the two first points, the court instructed the jury that, according to the principles of the common law, the deed from Craig's trustee to the lessors of *the plaintiff, would not [294 pass the title to the lessors of the plaintiff; but that under the operation of the act of assembly of the state of Kentucky, of 1798, the said deed was valid, and did pass the title to the lessors of the plaintiffs, notwithstanding the adverse possession of the defendants. The court refused to give the last instruction applied for, but did instruct the jury that if Coburn entered upon the land in controversy, under the survey on which his patent was founded, and he, and those holding under him, held the said lands for twenty years and upwards, prior to the commencement of this suit, yet, as the patent to Coburn did not issue until 1795, such possession could not avail the defendants claiming under the said Coburn, but that the plaintiffs could recover, notwithstanding such possession. To these opinions and instructions, given by the court, the counsel for the defendants below excepted, and the cause was brought by writ of error into this court.

Hardin, for the plaintiff in error, and defendant in ejectment. 1. No person out of possession can grant; first, because at common law there must be livery of seizin; second, because the grantee could not purchase a mere right of action. Coburn was in possession adversely; therefore, the deed from Craig's trustee to the lessors of the plaintiffs was void. 2. The limitation of twenty years' possession by the defendant before notice of the ejectment was a complete bar. 3. The deed of trust was joint, and it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove that one of the trustees was dead. The recital in the deed of conveyance, that [295 E. Craig was dead, was no sufficient evidence of that fact, except as between the grantor and grantee. 4. There is error in the judgment by default against Day.

Hughes and Talbot, contra. 1. Before the act of 1798, "concerning champerty and maintenance," no title could pass without an actual possession of the grantor; but this statute has abrogated the common law in that particular.

Wheat. 1.

But, in fact, Coburn was not in possession adversely, and a grant from the commonwealth of vacant lands gives the patentee a right to convey. 2. A person leaving it equivocal what his possession was, cannot have an instruction in his favor. It does not appear what part the defendant possessed, nor was the instruction asked under an adverse possession. Twenty years' possession was no bar; the local courts adhere to the English principle, that when the statute has once begun to run, it continues; but the act of assembly differs materially from the English act of 21 James I., c. 1.; and, after the statute has begun to run, it stops if the title passes to a person under any legal disability, and recommences after the disability is removed.

The act of assembly, on which the opinion of the court below, on the first question, was given, is entitled, "An act concerning champerty and maintenance." It enacts, "that no person 296*" purchasing, or *procuring an interest in any legal or equitable claim to land held, &c., shall be precluded from prosecuting or defending said claim, under such purchase or contract; neither shall any suit, or suits, brought to establish such purchase, or make good the title to such claim, be considered as coming within the provisions, either at common law or by statute, against champerty or maintenance," &c. This court is of opinion that this statute enabled the lessors of the plaintiff to maintain a suit in their own name for the lands conveyed to them, and that there is no error in this instruction of the Circuit Court.

On the third question the Circuit Court instructed the jury that an adverse possession under a survey, previous to its being carried into grant, could not be connected with a subsequent possession, but that the computation must commence from the date of the patent. In giving this opinion, the court unquestionably erred. No principle can be better settled than that the whole possession must be taken together.

The counsel for the defendants in error have endeavored to sustain this opinion by a construction of the statute of limitations of Kentucky. They contend that after the statute has begun to run, it stops, if the title passes to a person under any legal disability, and recommences after such disability shall be removed. This construction, in the opinion of this court, is not justified by the words of the statute. Its language does not vary essentially from the language of the statute of James, the construction of which has been well settled; and it is to be construed as that statute, and all other acts 297*] of limitation *founded on it, have been construed. This court is therefore of opinion that there is error in the instruction given by the Circuit Court to the jury on the third prayer of the plaintiff in error.¹

It has been contended by the counsel for the plaintiff, that there is also error in the judgment rendered against Joseph Day by default; but of his case the court can take no notice, as he is not one of the plaintiffs in error, and the judgment rendered against him is not before us. The judgment must be reversed for error in the directions of the court to the jury on the third point, on which instructions were given.

JUDGMENT.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record, from the Circuit Court for the District of Kentucky, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof this court is of opinion that there is error in the proceedings and judgment of the Circuit Court in this, that the judge thereof directed the jury that the tenants in possession could not connect their adverse possession previous to the date of the patent under which they claimed with their adverse possession subsequent thereto, but in the length of time which would bar the action could compute that only which had passed subsequent to the emanation of their grant. Wherefore it is considered by the court that the judgment of the Circuit *Court [*298 be reversed and annulled, and that the cause be remanded to the Circuit Court, with directions to award a new trial therein.

THE HARRISON. HERBERT, Claimant.

If the national character of property, captured and brought in for adjudication, appears ambiguous or neutral, and no claim is interposed, the cause is postponed for a year and a day after the prize proceedings are commenced; and if no claimant appears within that time, the property is condemned to the captors.

In prize causes this court has an appellate jurisdiction only, and a claim cannot for the first time be interposed here; but where the court below had proceeded to adjudication before the above period had elapsed, the cause was remanded to that court, with directions to allow a claim to be filed therein, and the libel to be amended, &c.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland. The libel filed by the captors, in this case, in the District Court, alleged that the goods for which condemnation was sought were captured and taken out of a Spanish vessel. No claim was filed for the goods in either of the courts below. But, upon hearing, the District Court dismissed the libel, upon the ground that the property, to whomsoever belonging, was protected by the 15th article of the treaty *of 1795 with Spain, by [*299 which free ships make free goods; and this decree was affirmed, upon the same principle, in the Circuit Court. The captors brought the cause, by appeal, to this court; and a motion was made by Winder, in behalf of Elry Herbert, an asserted claimant, to be admitted to file a claim in this court.

We have considered this question with a view to the general rules of practice. Whenever a prize is brought to adjudication in the admiralty, if, upon the hearing of the cause upon the ship's papers, and the evidence taken in preparatory, the property appears to belong to enemies, it is immediately condemned. If its national character appear doubtful, or even neutral, and no claim is interposed, the court do not proceed to a final decree, but the cause is postponed, with a view to enable any person having title to assert it, within a reasonable time, before the court. This reasonable time has been, by the general usage of nations, fixed to a year and a day after the institution of the prize proceedings; and if no claim be interposed within that period, the property is deemed to be abandoned, and is condemned to the captors for contumacy and default of the supposed owner. In the present case the prescribed period had not elapsed at the time when the District Court proceeded to decree a dismissal of the libel. A claim cannot, by the practice of this court, be for the first time interposed here. In prize causes this court can exercise only an appellate jurisdiction, and between 300] *parties who have litigated in the court below. We are all, therefore, of opinion that this cause ought to be remanded to the Circuit Court, with directions to allow the claim to be filed in that court; and, also, to allow the libel to be amended so as to conform to the general allegation of prize, and enable the captors to obtain condemnation of the property, if the asserted claim shall not be sustained, and the property shall not appear entitled to the protection of the Spanish treaty.

HARDEN v. FISHER ET AL.

Under the 9th article of the treaty of 1794, between the United States and Great Britain, by which it is provided that British subjects, holding lands in the United States, and their heirs, so far as respects those lands, and the remedies incident thereto, should not be considered as aliens; the parties must show that the title to the land for which the suit was commenced was in them, or their ancestors, at the time the treaty was made.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of New York. This case was argued, with great learning and ability, by Hoffman for the plaintiff in error, and defendant in ejectment, and by Stockton, for the defendants in 301] *error and plaintiffs in ejectment. But, as the court gave no judgment upon the points discussed, the argument has been omitted.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of ejectment, brought by the defendants in error, in the Circuit Court for the District of New York, to recover certain lands, which they claim as the heirs of Donald Fisher, deceased. A special verdict was found in the case, which shows that Donald Fisher was a British subject, residing in the City of New York, and departed this life in the year

1798, leaving the lessors of the plaintiffs in ejectment his heirs at law, who are also British subjects. The plaintiffs, being thus found to be British subjects, are incapable of maintaining an action for real estate in the state of New York, unless they are enabled to do so by the 9th article of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, made in the year 1794, which provides that British subjects, holding lands in the United States, and their heirs, so far as respects those lands, and the legal remedies incident thereto, should not be considered as aliens. To avail themselves of this treaty, the lessors of the plaintiff below must show that their ancestors held the lands for which this suit was instituted at the time when it was made. The court does not mean to say that they must show a seizin in fact, or an actual possession of the land, but that the title was in him at the time. This must be *shown in order to bring the case [302 within the protection afforded by the treaty.

The jurors find that Donald Fisher was, on the 1st day of January, in the year 1777, seized in his demesne, as of fee, of the lands and tenements in the declaration mentioned, and was in the actual possession thereof, and continued so seized and possessed, until the rendering the judgment herein after mentioned.

On the 17th day of April, in the year 1780, the grand jury, for the county of Charlotte, in the state of New York, found an indictment, stating that Donald Fisher (who is the ancestor under whom the lessors of the plaintiffs claim) did, on the 14th day of July, in the year 1777, voluntarily with force and arms, adhere to the enemies of the state. The record proceeds to state that "the said Donald Fisher having, according to the form of the act of the legislature, entitled 'an act for the forfeiture and sale of the estates of persons who have adhered to the enemies of the state,' &c., been notified to appear and traverse the said indictment, and not having appeared and traversed within the time, and in the manner in and by the said act limited and required, it is therefore considered that the said Donald Fisher do forfeit all and singular the estate, both real and personal, whether in possession, reversion, or remainder, had or claimed by him in this state." This judgment was signed on the 29th day of December, 1783, and is the judgment referred to in the special verdict, as herein before mentioned. Under these proceedings the lands in the declaration mentioned *were sold, [303 and the defendants, in the court below, hold under that sale.

There are other points raised in the special verdict, and urged by counsel; but it will be unnecessary to notice them, and the court does not mean to give any opinion on them. The court gave judgment for the plaintiffs below, and that judgment is now before this court on a writ of error.

It is contended by the defendants in error that this judgment having been rendered subsequent to the treaty of peace of 1783, and in direct repugnance thereto, is not merely voidable, but absolutely void. By the plaintiffs it is alleged to be voidable only.

This court cannot now decide that question. The verdict does not find that Donald Fisher held his title until the treaty of 1794 was made, and although nothing is found to show that he has parted with it, yet the court cannot presume that he did not part with it. The verdict ought to have shown that the title was in Donald Fisher when the treaty was made, and continued in him to the time of his death. For this essential defect, the verdict is too imperfect to enable the court to decide on the case. The judgment of the Circuit Court must therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded to that court, with directions to award a venire facias de novo.

JUDGMENT.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the Circuit Court for the District of New York, and was 304*] argued by counsel; *all which being considered, this court is of opinion that there is error in the judgment of the Circuit Court for the District of New York, in this, that the said court ought not to have rendered judgment on the said verdict in favor of the plaintiffs in ejectment, because it does not appear certainly, in the said verdict, that the ancestor, under whom they claim, held in law, or in fact, the lands mentioned in the declaration, when the treaty of 1794, between the United States and Great Britain, was made; therefore, it is considered by this court that the said judgment be reversed and annulled, and that the cause be remanded to the Circuit Court for the District of New York, with directions to award a venire facias de novo.

MARTIN, Heir at law and devisee of FAIRFAX,
v.
HUNTER'S LESSEE.

The appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States extends to a final judgment or decree in any suit in the highest court of law or equity of a state; where is drawn in question the validity of a treaty, or statute of, or an authority 305*] exercised under, the United States, and the decision is against their validity; or where is drawn in question the validity of a statute of, or an authority exercised under, any state, on the ground of their being repugnant to the constitution, treaties, or laws of the United States, and the decision is in favor of such their validity; or the construction of a treaty, or statute of, or commission held under, the United States, and the decision is against the title, right, privilege, or exemption specially set up or claimed, by either party, under such clause of the constitution, treaty, statute or commission.

Such judgment or decree may be re-examined by writ of error in the same manner as if rendered in a circuit court.

If the cause has been once remanded before, and the state court decline or refuse to carry into effect the mandate of the Supreme Court thereon, this court will proceed to a final decision of the same, and award execution thereon.

If the validity or construction of a treaty of the United States is drawn in question, and the decision is against its validity, or the title specially set up by either party, under the treaty, this court has jurisdiction to ascertain that title and determine its legal validity, and is not confined to the abstract construction of the treaty itself.

The return of a copy of the record, under the seal of the court, certified by the clerk, and annexed to the writ of error, is a sufficient return in such a case.

It need not appear that the judge who granted the writ of error did, upon issuing the citation, take a bond, as required by the 22d section of the judiciary act. That provision is merely directory to the judge, and the presumption of law is, until the contrary appears, that every judge who signs a citation has obeyed the injunctions of the act.

THIS was a writ of error to the Court of Appeals of the State of Virginia, founded upon the refusal of that court to obey the mandate of this court, requiring the judgment rendered in this same cause, at February term, 1813, to be carried into due execution. The following is the judgment of the Court of Appeals, rendered on the mandate: "The court is unanimously of opinion that the appellate power of the Supreme Court of the United States does not *extend to this court under a sound [*306 construction of the constitution of the United States; that so much of the 25th section of the act of Congress, to establish the judicial courts of the United States, as extends the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to this court, is not in pursuance of the constitution of the United States. That the writ of error in this cause was improvidently allowed under the authority of that act; that the proceedings thereon in the Supreme Court were coram non iudice in relation to this court, and that obedience to its mandate be declined by the court."

The original suit was an action of ejectment, brought by the defendant in error, in one of the district courts of Virginia, holden at Winchester, for the recovery of a parcel of land, situate within that tract, called the northern neck of Virginia, and part and parcel thereof. A declaration in ejectment was served (April, 1791,) on the tenants in possession; whereupon Denny Fairfax (late Denny Martin), a British subject, holding the land in question,

NOTE.—Where by the statutes of a state it is necessary in order to appeal from an inferior state court to the highest court of the state, that leave of such highest court or of a judge thereof should be first obtained, and where that leave has been refused, a writ of error, if there be in the case "a federal question," properly lies, under section 709 of the U. S. revised statutes, to the inferior, and not to such highest court. Gregory v. McVeigh, 23 Wall. 294, 307.

It is necessary in order to give the Supreme Court jurisdiction over a judgment of a state court, that it should appear that one of the questions mentioned in the statute was raised and presented to the state court; and that such question was decided by the state court against the title, right, privilege or immunity, specially set up or claimed Wheat. 1. U. S., Book 4.

by the plaintiff in error, under the constitution, treaty, statute, commission or authority of the United States, or that such a decision was necessary to the judgment or decree rendered in the case. Murdock v. City of Memphis, 20 Wall. 591.

If such claim of right of the plaintiff in error was erroneously decided, by the state court, still, if the judgment of the state court can be sustained upon any other ground or issue adjudged in it, the judgment will be affirmed. Idem.

This court has no jurisdiction to re-examine the judgment of a state court, where a federal question was not in fact passed upon and where a decision of it was unnecessary in the view which the court below took of the case; or where the error was one of the jury alone, the charge of the court being correct. McManis v. O'Sullivan, 1 Otto, 578; Bolvery cheerfully admit), it does not aid the argument. It is manifest that the constitution has proceeded upon a theory of its own, and 347 given or withheld *powers according to the judgment of the American people, by whom it was adopted. We can only construe its powers, and cannot inquire into the policy or principles which induced the grant of them. The constitution has presumed (whether rightly or wrongly we do not inquire) that state attachments, state prejudices, state jealousies, and state interests, might sometimes obstruct, or control, or be supposed to obstruct or control, the regular administration of justice. Hence, in controversies between states; between citizens of different states; between citizens claiming grants under different states; between a state and its citizens, or foreigners, and between citizens and foreigners, it enables the parties, under the authority of Congress, to have the controversies heard, tried, and determined before the national tribunals. No other reason than that which has been stated can be assigned, why some, at least, of those cases should not have been left to the cognizance of the state courts. In respect to the other enumerated cases—the cases arising under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, cases affecting ambassadors and other public ministers, and cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction—reasons of a higher and more extensive nature, touching the safety, peace, and sovereignty of the nation, might well justify a grant of exclusive jurisdiction.

This is not all. A motive of another kind, perfectly compatible with the most sincere respect for state tribunals, might induce the grant of appellate power over their decisions. That motive is the importance, and even necessity of uniformity of decisions throughout 348 the whole United States, upon all subjects within the purview of the constitution. Judges of equal learning and integrity, in different states, might differently interpret a statute, or a treaty of the United States, or even the constitution itself. If there were no revising authority to control these jarring and discordant judgments, and harmonize them into uniformity, the laws, the treaties, and the constitution of the United States would be different in different states, and might, perhaps, never have precisely the same construction, obligation, or efficacy, in any two states. The public mischiefs that would attend such a state of things would be truly deplorable; and it cannot be believed that they could have escaped the enlightened convention which formed the constitution. What, indeed, might then have been only prophecy, has now become fact; and the appellate jurisdiction must continue to be the only adequate remedy for such evils.

There is an additional consideration, which is entitled to great weight. The constitution of the United States was designed for the common and equal benefit of all the people of the United States. The judicial power was granted for the same benign and salutary purposes. It was not to be exercised exclusively for the benefit of parties who might be plaintiffs, and would elect the national forum, but also for the protection of defendants who might be entitled to try their rights, or assert their privileges, before the same forum. Yet, if the construction contended for be correct, it will follow, that as the plaintiff may always elect the state court, the defendant *may be deprived of all the [*349] security which the constitution intended in aid of his rights. Such a state of things can in no respect be considered as giving equal rights. To obviate this difficulty, we are referred to the power which it is admitted Congress possess to remove suits from state courts to the national courts; and this forms the second ground upon which the argument we are considering has been attempted to be sustained.

This power of removal is not to be found in express terms in any part of the constitution; if it be given, it is only given by implication, as a power necessary and proper to carry into effect some express power. The power of removal is certainly not, in strictness of language an exercise of original jurisdiction; it presupposes an exercise of original jurisdiction to have attached elsewhere. The existence of this power of removal is familiar in courts acting according to the course of the common law in criminal as well as civil cases, and it is exercised before as well as after judgment. But this is always deemed in both cases an exercise of appellate, and not of original jurisdiction. If, then, the right of removal be included in the appellate jurisdiction, it is only because it is one mode of exercising that power, and as Congress is not limited by the constitution to any particular mode, or time of exercising it, it may authorize a removal either before or after judgment. The time, the process, and the manner, must be subject to its absolute legislative control. A writ of error is, indeed, but a process which removes the record of one court to the possession of another court, *and [*350] enables the latter to inspect the proceedings, and give such judgment as its own opinion of the law and justice of the case may warrant. There is nothing in the nature of the process which forbids it from being applied by the legislature to interlocutory as well as final judgments. And if the right of removal from state courts exist before judgment, because it is included in the appellate power, it must, for the same reason, exist after judgment. And if the appellate power by the constitution does not include cases pending in state courts, the right of removal, which is but a mode of exercising that power, cannot be applied to them. Precisely the same objections, therefore, exist as to the right of removal before judgment, as after, and both must stand or fall together. Nor, indeed, would the force of the arguments on either side materially vary if the right of removal were an exercise of original jurisdiction. It would equally trench upon the jurisdiction and independence of state tribunals.

The remedy, too, of removal of suits would be utterly inadequate to the purposes of the constitution, if it could act only on the parties, and not upon the state courts. In respect to criminal prosecutions, the difficulty seems admitted to be insurmountable; and in respect to civil suits, there would, in many cases, be rights without corresponding remedies. If state courts should deny the constitutionality of the authority to remove suits from their cognizance, in what manner could they be compelled to relinquish the jurisdiction? In respect to criminal cases, there would at once be an end of all 351 control, and the *state decisions would be paramount to the constitution; and though in civil suits the courts of the United States might act upon the parties, yet the state courts might act in the same way; and this conflict of jurisdictions would not only jeopardize private rights, but bring into imminent peril the public interests.

On the whole, the court are of opinion that the appellate power of the United States does extend to cases pending in the state courts; and that the 25th section of the judiciary act, which authorizes the exercise of this jurisdiction in the specified cases, by a writ of error, is supported by the letter and spirit of the constitution. We find no clause in that instrument which limits this power; and we dare not interpose a limitation where the people have not been disposed to create one.

Strong as this conclusion stands upon the general language of the constitution, it may still derive support from other sources. It is an historical fact that this exposition of the constitution, extending its appellate power to state courts, was, previous to its adoption, uniformly and publicly avowed by its friends, and admitted by its enemies, as the basis of their respective reasonings, both in and out of the state conventions. It is an historical fact that at the time when the judiciary act was submitted to the deliberations of the first Congress, composed, as it was, not only of men of great learning and ability, but of men who had acted a principal part in framing, supporting, or opposing that constitution, the same exposition was explicitly declared and admitted by the friends and by the opponents of that system. 352 It *is an historical fact that the Supreme Court of the United States have, from time to time, sustained this appellate jurisdiction in a great variety of cases, brought from the tribunals of many of the most important states in the Union, and that no state tribunal has ever breathed a judicial doubt on the subject, or declined to obey the mandate of the Supreme Court, until the present occasion. This weight of contemporaneous exposition by all parties, this acquiescence of enlightened state courts, and these judicial decisions of the Supreme Court through so long a period, do, as we think, place the doctrine upon a foundation of authority which cannot be shaken, without delivering over the subject to perpetual and irremediable doubts.

The next question which has been argued is, whether the case at bar be within the purview of the 25th section of the judiciary act, so that this court may rightfully sustain the present writ of error. This section, stripped of passages unimportant in this inquiry, enacts, in substance, that a final judgment or decree in any suit in the highest court of law or equity of a state, where is drawn in question the validity of a treaty or statute of, or an authority exercised under, the United States, and the decision is against their validity; or where is drawn in question the validity of a statute of, or an authority exercised under, any state, on the ground of their being repugnant to the constitution, treaties, or laws, of the United States, and the decision is in favor of such their validity; or of the constitution, or of a treaty or statute of, or commission held under, the United *States, and the decision is [353 against the title, right, privilege, or exemption, specially set up or claimed by either party under such clause of the said constitution, treaty, statute, or commission, may be re-examined and reversed or affirmed in the Supreme Court of the United States, upon a writ of error, in the same manner, and under the same regulations, and the writ shall have the same effect, as if the judgment or decree complained of had been rendered or passed in a circuit court, and the proceeding upon the reversal shall also be the same, except that the Supreme Court, instead of remanding the cause for a final decision, as before provided, may, at their discretion, if the cause shall have been once remanded before, proceed to a final decision of the same, and award execution. But no other error shall be assigned or regarded as a ground of reversal in any such case as aforesaid, than such as appears upon the face of the record, and immediately respects the before-mentioned question of validity or construction of the said constitution, treaties, statutes, commissions, or authorities in dispute.

That the present writ of error is founded upon a judgment of the court below, which drew in question and denied the validity of a statute of the United States, is incontrovertible, for it is apparent upon the face of the record. That this judgment is final upon the rights of the parties is equally true; for if well founded, the former judgment of that court was of conclusive authority, and the former judgment of this court utterly void. The decision was, therefore, equivalent to a perpetual stay of proceedings upon *the mandate, and a per- [354 petual denial of all the rights acquired under it. The case, then, falls directly within the terms of the act. It is a final judgment in a suit in a state court, denying the validity of a statute of the United States; and unless a distinction can be made between proceedings under a mandate, and proceedings in an original suit, a writ of error is the proper remedy to revise that judgment. In our opinion no legal distinction exists between the cases.

In causes remanded to the circuit courts, if the mandate be not correctly executed, a writ of error or appeal has always been supposed to be a proper remedy, and has been recognized as such in the former decisions of this court. The statute gives the same effect to writs of error from the judgments of state courts as of the circuit courts; and in its terms provides for proceeding where the same cause may be a second time brought up on writ of error before the Supreme Court. There is no limitation or description of the cases to which the second writ of error may be applied; and it ought, therefore, to be co-extensive with the cases which fall within the mischiefs of the statute. It will hardly be denied that this cause stands in that predicament; and if so, then the appellate jurisdiction of this court has rightfully attached.

But it is contended that the former judgment of this court was rendered upon a case not within the purview of this section of the judicial act, and that as it was pronounced by an incompetent jurisdiction, it was utterly void, and cannot be a sufficient foundation to sustain 355*] *any subsequent proceedings. To this argument several answers may be given. In the first place, it is not admitted that, upon this writ of error, the former record is before us. The error now assigned is not in the former proceedings, but in the judgment rendered upon the mandate issued after the former judgment. The question now litigated is not upon the construction of a treaty, but upon the constitutionality of a statute of the United States, which is clearly within our jurisdiction. In the next place, in ordinary cases a second writ of error has never been supposed to draw in question the propriety of the first judgment, and it is difficult to perceive how such a proceeding could be sustained upon principle. A final judgment of this court is supposed to be conclusive upon the rights which it decides, and no statute has provided any process by which this court can revise its own judgments. In several cases which have been formerly adjudged in this court, the same point was argued by counsel, and expressly overruled. It was solemnly held that a final judgment of this court was conclusive upon the parties, and could not be re-examined.

In this case, however, from motives of a public nature, we are entirely willing to waive all objections, and to go back and re-examine the question of jurisdiction as it stood upon the record formerly in judgment. We have great confidence that our jurisdiction will, on a careful examination, stand confirmed as well upon principle as authority. It will be recollected that the action was an ejectment for a parcel of land in the Northern Neck, formerly belonging 356] to *Lord Fairfax. The original plaintiff claimed the land under a patent granted to him by the state of Virginia, in 1789, under a title supposed to be vested in that state by escheat or forfeiture. The original defendant claimed the land as devisee under the will of Lord Fairfax. The parties agreed to a special statement of facts in the nature of a special verdict, upon which the District Court of Winchester, in 1793, gave a general judgment for the defendant, which judgment was afterwards reversed in 1810, by the Court of Appeals, and a general judgment was rendered for the plaintiff; and from this last judgment a writ of error was brought to the Supreme Court. The statement of facts contained a regular deduction of the title of Lord Fairfax until his death, in 1781, and also the title of his devisee. It also contained a regular deduction of the title of the plaintiff, under the state of Virginia, and further referred to the treaty of peace of 1783, and to the acts of Virginia respecting the lands of Lord Fairfax, and the supposed escheat or forfeiture thereof as component parts of the case. No facts disconnected with the titles thus set up by the parties were alleged on either side.

It is apparent, from this summary explanation, that the title thus set up by the plaintiff might be open to other objections; but the title of the defendant was perfect and complete, if it was protected by the treaty of 1783. If, therefore, this court had authority to examine into the whole record, and to decide upon the legal validity of the title of the defendant, as well as its application to the treaty of peace, it would be a case within the express purview of the 25th *section of the act; for there was nothing in the record upon which the court below could have decided but upon the title as connected with the treaty; and if the title was otherwise good, its sufficiency must have depended altogether upon its protection under the treaty. Under such circumstances it was strictly a suit where was drawn in question the construction of a treaty, and the decision was against the title specially set up or claimed by the defendant. It would fall, then, within the very terms of the act.

The objection urged at the bar is, that this court cannot inquire into the title, but simply into the correctness of the construction put upon the treaty by the Court of Appeals; and that their judgment is not re-examinable here, unless it appear on the face of the record that some construction was put upon the treaty. If, therefore, that court might have decided the case upon the invalidity of the title (and, non constat, that they did not), independent of the treaty, there is an end of the appellate jurisdiction of this court. In support of this objection much stress is laid upon the last clause of the section, which declares that no other cause shall be regarded as a ground of reversal than such as appears on the face of the record and immediately respects the construction of the treaty, &c., in dispute.

If this be the true construction of the section, it will be wholly inadequate for the purposes which it professes to have in view, and may be evaded at pleasure. But we see no reason for adopting this narrow construction; and there are the strongest *reasons [358] against it, founded upon the words as well as the intent of the legislature. What is the case for which the body of the section provides a remedy by writ of error? The answer must be in the words of the section, a suit where is drawn in question the construction of a treaty, and the decision is against the title set up by the party. It is, therefore, the decision against the title set up with reference to the treaty, and not the mere abstract construction of the treaty itself, upon which the statute intends to found the appellate jurisdiction. How, indeed, can it be possible to decide whether a title be within the protection of a treaty, until it is ascertained what that title is, and whether it have a legal validity? From the very necessity of the case, there must be a preliminary inquiry into the existence and structure of the title, before the court can construe the treaty in reference to that title. If the court below should decide that the title was bad, and, therefore, not protected by the treaty, must not this court have a power to decide the title to be good, and, therefore, protected by the treaty? Is not the treaty, in both instances, equally construed, and the title of the party, in reference to the treaty, equally ascertained and decided? Nor does the clause relied on in the objection impugn this construction. It requires, that the error upon which the appellate court is to decide shall appear on the face of the record, and immediately respect the questions before mentioned in the section. One of the questions is as to the construction of a treaty upon a title specially set up by a party, and every error that immediately respects that question must, of [359] course, be within the cognizance of the court.

The title set up in this case is apparent upon the face of the record, and immediately respects the decision of that question; any error, therefore, in respect to that title must be re-examinable, or the case could never be presented to the court.

The restraining clause was manifestly intended for a very different purpose. It was foreseen that the parties might claim under various titles, and might assert various defenses, altogether independent of each other. The court might admit or reject evidence applicable to one particular title, and not to all, and in such cases it was the intention of Congress to limit what would otherwise have unquestionably attached to the court, the right of revising all the points involved in the cause. It therefore restrains this right to such errors as respect the questions specified in the section; and in this view, it has an appropriate sense, consistent with the preceding clauses. We are, therefore, satisfied, that, upon principle, the case was rightfully before us, and if the point were perfectly new, we should not hesitate to assert the jurisdiction.

But the point has been already decided by this court upon solemn argument. In Smith v. The State of Maryland (6 Cranch, 286), precisely the same objection was taken by counsel, and overruled by the unanimous opinion of the court. That case was, in some respects, stronger than the present; for the court below decided, expressly, that the party had no title, and, therefore, the treaty could not operate 360 upon it. This court entered into an examination of that question, and being of the same opinion, affirmed the judgment. There cannot, then, be an authority which could more completely govern the present question.

It has been asserted at the bar that, in point of fact, the Court of Appeals did not decide either upon the treaty or the title apparent upon the record, but upon a compromise made under an act of the legislature of Virginia. If it be true (as we are informed) that this was a private act, to take effect only upon a certain condition, viz., the execution of a deed of release of certain lands, which was matter in pais, it is somewhat difficult to understand how the court could take judicial cognizance of the act, or of the performance of the condition, unless spread upon the record. At all events, we are bound to consider that the court did decide upon the facts actually before them.

The treaty of peace was not necessary to have been stated, for it was the supreme law of the land, of which all courts must take notice. And at the time of the decision in the Court of Appeals and in this court, another treaty had intervened, which attached itself to the title in controversy, and, of course, must have been the supreme law to govern the decision, if it should be found applicable to the case. It was in this view that this court did not deem it necessary to rest its former decision upon the treaty of peace, believing that the title of the defendant was, at all events, perfect under the treaty of 1794.

361* The remaining questions respect more the practice than the principles of this court. The forms of process, and the modes of proceeding in the exercise of jurisdiction are, with few exceptions, left by the legislature Wheat. 1.

to be regulated and changed as this court may, in its discretion, deem expedient. By a rule of this court, the return of a copy of a record of the proper court, under the seal of that court, annexed to the writ of error, is declared to be "a sufficient compliance with the mandate of the writ." The record, in this case, is duly certified by the clerk of the Court of Appeals, and annexed to the writ of error. The objection, therefore, which has been urged to the sufficiency of the return, cannot prevail.

Another objection is, that it does not appear that the judge who granted the writ of error did, upon issuing the citation, take the bond required by the 22d section of the judiciary act.

We consider that provision as merely directory to the judge; and that an omission does not avoid the writ of error. If any party be prejudiced by the omission, this court can grant him summary relief, by imposing such terms on the other party as, under all the circumstances, may be legal and proper. But there is nothing in the record by which we can judicially know whether a bond has been taken or not; for the statute does not require the bond to be returned to this court, and it might, with equal propriety, be lodged in the court below, who would ordinarily execute the judgment to be rendered on the writ. And the presumption of law is, until the contrary *appears, [*362] that every judge who signs a citation has obeyed the injunctions of the act.

We have thus gone over all the principal questions in the cause, and we deliver our judgment with entire confidence, that it is consistent with the constitution and laws of the land.

We have not thought it incumbent on us to give any opinion upon the question, whether this court have authority to issue a writ of mandamus to the Court of Appeals to enforce the former judgments, as we do not think it necessarily involved in the decision of this cause.

It is the opinion of the whole court that the judgment of the Court of Appeals of Virginia, rendered on the mandate in this cause, be reversed, and the judgment of the District Court, held at Winchester, be, and the same is hereby affirmed.

JOHNSON, J. It will be observed in this case, that the court disavows all intention to decide on the right to issue compulsory process to the state courts; thus leaving us, in my opinion, where the constitution and laws place us—supreme over persons and cases as far as our judicial powers extend, but not asserting any compulsory control over the state tribunals.

In this view I acquiesce in their opinion, but not altogether in the reasoning, or opinion, of my brother who delivered it. Few minds are accustomed to the same habit of thinking, and our conclusions are most satisfactory to ourselves when arrived at in our own way.

*I have another reason for expressing [*363] my opinion on this occasion. I view this question as one of the most momentous importance; as one which may affect, in its consequences, the permanence of the American Union. It presents an instance of collision between the judicial powers of the Union, and one of the greatest states in the Union, on a point the most delicate and difficult to be adjusted. On the one hand, the general government must cease to exist whenever it loses the power of protecting itself in the exercise of its constitutional powers. Force, which acts upon the physical powers of man, or judicial process, which addresses itself to his moral principles or his fears, are the only means to which governments can resort in the exercise of their authority. The former is happily unknown to the genius of our constitution, except as far as it shall be sanctioned by the latter; but let the latter be obstructed in its progress by an opposition which it cannot overcome or put by, and the resort must be to the former, or government is no more.

On the other hand, so firmly am I persuaded that the American people can no longer enjoy the blessings of a free government, whenever the state sovereignties shall be prostrated at the feet of the general government, nor the proud consciousness of equality and security, any longer than the independence of judicial power shall be maintained consecrated and intangible, that I could borrow the language of a celebrated orator, and exclaim: "I rejoice that Virginia has resisted."

Yet here I must claim the privilege of ex-
364*] pressing *my regret that the opposition of the high and truly respected tribunal of that state had not been marked with a little more moderation. The only point necessary to be decided in the case then before them was, "whether they were bound to obey the mandate emanating from this court." But in the judgment entered on their minutes, they have affirmed that the case was, in this court, coram non judice, or, in other words, that this court had not jurisdiction over it.

This is assuming a truly alarming latitude of judicial power. Where is it to end? It is an acknowledged principle of, I believe, every court in the world, that not only the decisions, but everything done under the judicial process of courts, not having jurisdiction, are, ipso facto, void. Are, then, the judgments of this court to be reviewed in every court of the Union? and is every recovery of money, every change of property, that has taken place under our process, to be considered as null, void, and tortious?

We pretend not to more infallibility than other courts composed of the same frail materials which compose this. It would be the height of affectation to close our minds upon the recollection that we have been extracted from the same seminaries in which originated the learned men who preside over the state tribunals. But there is one claim which we can with confidence assert in our own name upon those tribunals—the profound, uniform, and unaffected respect which this court has always exhibited for state decisions, give us strong pretensions to judicial comity. And another claim I may assert, in the name of the American people; in this court, every state in the 365] Union is represented; we are constituted by the voice of the Union, and when decisions take place, which nothing but a spirit to give ground and harmonize can reconcile, ours is the superior claim upon the comity of the state tribunals. It is the nature of the human mind to press a favorite hypothesis too far, but magnanimity will always be ready to sacrifice the pride of opinion to public welfare.

In the case before us, the collision has been, on our part, wholly unsolicited. The exercise of this appellate jurisdiction over the state decisions has long been acquiesced in, and when the writ of error, in this case, was allowed by the president of the Court of Appeals of Virginia, we were sanctioned in supposing that we were to meet with the same acquiescence there. Had that court refused to grant the writ in the first instance, or had the question of jurisdiction, or on the mode of exercising jurisdiction, been made here originally, we should have been put on our guard, and might have so modeled the process of the court as to strip it of the offensive form of a mandate. In this case it might have been brought down to what probably the 25th section of the judiciary act meant it should be, to wit, an alternative judgment, either that the state court may finally proceed, at its option, to carry into effect the judgment of this court, or, if it declined doing so, that then this court would proceed itself to execute it. The language, sense, and operation of the 25th section on this subject, merit particular attention. In the preceding section, which has relation to causes brought up by writ of error from the circuit courts *of the [366 United States, this court is instructed not to issue executions, but to send a special mandate to the Circuit Court to award execution thereupon. In case of the Circuit Court's refusal to obey such mandate, there could be no doubt as to the ulterior measures; compulsory process might, unquestionably, be resorted to. Nor, indeed, was there any reason to suppose that they ever would refuse; and, therefore, there is no provision made for authorizing this court to execute its own judgment in cases of that description. But not so in cases brought up from the state courts; the framers of that law plainly foresaw that the state courts might refuse; and not being willing to leave ground for the implication, that compulsory process must be resorted to, because no specific provision was made, they have provided the means, by authorizing this court, in case of reversal of the state decision, to execute its own judgment. In case of reversal only was this necessary; for, in case of affirmance, this collision could not arise. It is true that the words of this section are, that this court may, in their discretion, proceed to execute its own judgment. But these words were very properly put in, that it might not be made imperative upon this court to proceed indiscriminately in this way; as it could only be necessary in case of the refusal of the state courts; and this idea is fully confirmed by the words of the 13th section, which restrict this court in issuing the writ of mandamus, so as to confine it expressly to those courts which are constituted by the United States.

*In this point of view the legislature [367 is completely vindicated from all intention to violate the independence of the state judiciaries. Nor can this court, with any more correctness, have imputed to it similar intentions. The form of the mandate issued in this case is that known to appellate tribunals, and used in the ordinary cases of writs of error from the courts of the United States. It will, perhaps, not be too much, in such cases, to expect of those who are conversant in the forms, fictions, and technicality of the law, not to give the process of courts too literal a construction. They should be considered with a view to the ends they are intended to answer, and the law and practice in which they originate. In this view, the mandate was no more than a mode of submitting to that court the option which the 25th section holds out to them.

Had the decision of the court of Virginia been confined to the point of their legal obligation to carry the judgment of this court into effect, I should have thought it unnecessary to make any further observations in this cause. But we are called upon to vindicate our general revising power, and its due exercise in this particular case.

Here, that I may not be charged with arguing upon a hypothetical case, it is necessary to ascertain what the real question is which this court is now called to decide on.

In doing this, it is necessary to do what, although, in the abstract, of very questionable propriety, appears to be generally acquiesced in, to wit, to review the case as it originally came 368 up to this court *on the former writ of error. The cause, then, came up upon a case stated between the parties, and under the practice of that state, having the effect of a special verdict. The case stated brings into view the treaty of peace with Great Britain, and then proceeds to present the various laws of Virginia, and the facts upon which the parties found their respective titles. It then presents no particular question, but refers generally to the law arising out of the case. The original decision was obtained prior to the treaty of 1794, but before the case was adjudicated in this court, the treaty of 1794 had been concluded.

The difficulties of the case arise under the construction of the 25th section above alluded to, which, as far as it relates to this case, is in these words: "A final judgment or decree in any suit, in the highest court of law or equity of a state in which a decision in the suit could be had," "where is drawn in question the construction of any clause of the constitution or of a treaty," "and the decision is against the title set up or claimed by either party under such clause, may be re-examined and reversed, or affirmed." "But no other error shall be assigned or regarded as a ground of reversal in any such case as aforesaid, than such as appears on the face of the record, and immediately respects the before-mentioned questions of validity or construction of the said treaties," &c.

The first point decided under this state of the case was, that the judgment being a part of the record, if that judgment was not such as, upon that case, it ought to have been, it was an error 369 for apparent on the *face of the record. But it was contended that the case there stated presented a number of points upon which the decision below may have been founded, and that it did not, therefore, necessarily appear to have been an error immediately respecting a question on the construction of a treaty. But the court held, that as the reference was general to the law arising out of the case, if one question arose, which called for the construction of a treaty, and the decision negatived the right set up under it, this court will reverse that decision, and that it is the duty of the party who would avoid the inconvenience of this principle, so to mould the case as to obviate the ambiguity. And under this point arises the question whether this court can inquire into the title of the party, or whether they are so restricted in their judicial powers as to be confined to decide on the operation of a treaty upon a title previously ascertained to exist.

If there is any one point in the case on which an opinion may be given with confidence, it is this, whether we consider the letter of the statute, or the spirit, intent, or meaning, of the constitution and of the legislature, as expressed in the 27th section, it is equally clear that the title is the primary object to which the attention of the court is called in every such case. The words are, "and the decision be against the title," so set up, not against the construction of the treaty contended for by the party setting up the title. And how could it be otherwise? The title may exist, notwithstanding the decision of the state courts to the contrary; and in that case the *party is entitled to the [*370] benefits intended to be secured by the treaty. The decision to his prejudice may have been the result of those very errors, partialities, or defects in state jurisprudence against which the constitution intended to protect the individual. And if the contrary doctrine be assumed, what is the consequence? This court may then be called upon to decide on a mere hypothetical case—to give a construction to a treaty without first deciding whether there was any interest on which that treaty, whatever be its proper construction, would operate. This difficulty was felt, and weighed in the case of Smith and the State of Maryland, and that decision was founded upon the idea that this court was not thus restricted.

But another difficulty presented itself: The treaty of 1794 had become the supreme law of the land since the judgment rendered in the court below. The defendant, who was at that time an alien, had now become confirmed in his rights under that treaty. This would have been no objection to the correctness of the original judgment. Were we, then, at liberty to notice that treaty in rendering the judgment of this court?

Having dissented from the opinion of this court in the original case, on the question of title, this difficulty did not present itself in my way in the view I then took of the case. But the majority of this court determined that, as a public law, the treaty was a part of the law of every case depending in this court; that, as such, it was not necessary that it should be spread upon the record, and that it was obligatory upon *this court, in rendering judgment [*371] upon this writ of error, notwithstanding the original judgment may have been otherwise unimpeachable. And to this opinion I yielded my hearty consent; for it cannot be maintained that this court is bound to give a judgment unlawful at the time of rendering it, in consideration that the same judgment would have been lawful at any prior time. What judgment can now be lawfully rendered between the parties is the question to which the attention of the court is called. And if the law which sanctioned the original judgment expire, pending an appeal, this court has repeatedly reversed the judgment below, although rendered whilst the law existed. So, too, if the plaintiff in error die, pending suit, and his land descend on an alien, it cannot be contended that this court will maintain the suit in right of the judgment, in favor of his ancestor, notwithstanding his present disability.

It must here be recollected that this is an action of ejectment. If the term formerly declared upon expires pending the action, the court will permit the plaintiff to amend, by extending the term. Why? Because, although the right may have been in him at the commencement of the suit, it has ceased before judgment, and without this amendment he could not have judgment. But suppose the suit were really instituted to obtain possession of a leasehold, and the lease expire before judgment, would the court permit the party to amend in opposition to the right of the case? On the contrary, if the term formerly declared on were more extensive than the lease in which the legal title was founded, could they give judgment for more than costs? It must be recollected that, under this judgment, a writ of restitution is the fruit of the law. This, in its very nature, has relation to, and must be founded upon, a present existing right at the time of judgment. And whatever be the cause which takes this right away, the remedy must, in the reason and nature of things, fall with it.

When all these incidental points are disposed of, we find the question finally reduced to this:

Does the judicial power of the United States extend to the revision of decisions of state courts, in cases arising under treaties? But, in order to generalize the question, and present it in the true form in which it presents itself in this case, we will inquire whether the constitution sanctions the exercise of a revising power over the decisions of state tribunals in those cases to which the judicial power of the United States extends.

And here it appears to me that the great difficulty is on the other side. That the real doubt is, whether the state tribunals can constitutionally exercise jurisdiction in any of the cases to which the judicial power of the United States extends.

Some cession of judicial power is contemplated by the third article of the constitution: that which is ceded can no longer be retained. In one of the circuit courts of the United States, it has been decided (with what correctness I will not say) that the cession of a power to pass an uniform act of bankruptcy, although not acted 373 on by the United States, deprives the states of the power of passing laws to that effect. With regard to the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, it would be difficult to prove that the states could resume it, if the United States should abolish the courts vested with that jurisdiction; yet, it is blended with the other cases of jurisdiction, in the second section of the third article, and ceded in the same words. But it is contended that the second section of the third article contains no express cession of jurisdiction; that it only vests a power in Congress to assume jurisdiction to the extent therein expressed. And under this head arose the discussion on the construction proper to be given to that article.

On this part of the case I shall not pause long. The rules of construction, where the nature of the instrument is ascertained, are familiar to everyone. To me the constitution appears, in every line of it, to be a contract, which, in legal language, may be denominated tripartite. The parties are the people, the states, and the United States. It is returning in a circle to contend that it professes to be the exclusive act of the people, for what have the people done but to form this compact? That the states are recognized as parties to it is evident from various passages, and particularly that in which the United States guaranty to each state a republican form of government.

The security and happiness of the whole was the object, and, to prevent dissention and collision, each surrendered those powers which might make them dangerous to each other. Well aware of the sensitive irritability [*374] of sovereign states, where their wills or interests clash, they placed themselves, with regard to each other, on the footing of sovereigns upon the ocean; where power is mutually conceded to act upon the individual, but the national vessel must remain unviolated. And to remove all ground for jealousy and complaint, they relinquish the privilege of being any longer the exclusive arbiters of their own justice, where the rights of others come in question, or the great interests of the whole may be affected by those feelings, partialities, or prejudices, which they meant to put down forever.

Nor shall I enter into a minute discussion on the meaning of the language on this section. I have seldom found much good result from hypercritical severity, in examining the distinct force of words. Language is essentially defective in precision; more so than those are aware of who are not in the habit of subjecting it to philological analysis. In the case before us, for instance, a rigid construction might be made, which would annihilate the powers intended to be ceded. The words are, "shall extend to;" now, that which extends to, does not necessarily include in, so that the circle may enlarge until it reaches the objects that limit it, and yet not take them in. But the plain and obvious sense and meaning of the word shall, in this sentence, is in the future sense, and has nothing imperative in it. The language of the framers of the constitution is: "We are about forming a general government—when that government is formed, its powers shall extend," &c. I therefore see nothing imperative in this clause, and certainly it would [*375] have been very unnecessary to use the word in that sense; for, as there was no controlling power constituted, it would only, if used in an imperative sense, have imposed a moral obligation to act. But the same result arises from using it in a future sense, and the constitution everywhere assumes, as a postulate, that wherever power is given it will be used, or, at least, used as far as the interests of the American people require it, if not from the natural proneness of man to the exercise of power, at least from a sense of duty, and the obligation of an oath.

Nor can I see any difference in the effect of the words used in this section, as to the scope of the jurisdiction of the United States courts over the cases of the first and second description, comprised in that section. "Shall extend to controversies," appears to me as comprehensive in effect as "shall extend to all cases."

Wheat. 1.

For, if the judicial power extend "to controversies between citizen and alien," &c., to what controversies of that description does it not extend? If no case can be pointed out which is excepted, it then extends to all controversies.

But I will assume the construction as a sound one, that the cession of power to the general government means no more than that they may assume the exercise of it whenever they think it advisable. It is clear that Congress have hitherto acted under that impression, and my own opinion is in favor of its correctness. But does it not then follow that the jurisdiction of the state court, within the range ceded to the general government, is permitted, and 376 may be withdrawn whenever Congress think proper to do so? As it is a principle that every one may renounce a right introduced for his benefit, we will admit that as Congress have not assumed such jurisdiction, the state courts may, constitutionally, exercise jurisdiction in such cases. Yet, surely, the general power to withdraw the exercise of it includes in it the right to modify, limit, and restrain that exercise. "This is my domain, put not your foot upon it; if you do, you are subject to my laws, I have a right to exclude you altogether; I have, then, a right to prescribe the terms of your admission to a participation. As long as you conform to my laws, participate in peace, but I reserve to myself the right of judging how far your acts are conformable to my laws." Analogy, then, to the ordinary exercise of sovereign authority, would sustain the exercise of this controlling or revising power.

But it is argued that a power to assume jurisdiction to the constitutional extent, does not necessarily carry with it a right to exercise appellate power over the state tribunals.

This is a momentous question, and one on which I shall reserve myself uncommitted for each particular case as it shall occur. It is enough, at present, to have shown that Congress has not asserted, and this court has not attempted, to exercise that kind of authority in personam over the state courts which would place them in the relation of an inferior responsible body without their own acquiescence. And I have too much confidence in the state tribunals to believe that a case ever will occur 377 in which it will be necessary for the general government to assume a controlling power over these tribunals. But is it difficult to suppose a case which will call loudly for some remedy or restraint? Suppose a foreign minister, or an officer, acting regularly under authority from the United States, seized to-day, tried to-morrow, and hurried the next day to execution. Such cases may occur, and have occurred, in other countries. The angry vindictive passions of men have too often made their way into judicial tribunals, and we cannot hope forever to escape their baleful influence. In the case supposed, there ought to be a power somewhere to restrain or punish, or the Union must be dissolved. At present the uncontrollable exercise of criminal jurisdiction is most securely confided to the state tribunals. The courts of the United States are vested with no power to scrutinize into the proceedings of the state courts in criminal cases; on the contrary, the general government has, in more than one instance, exhibited their confidence, by a wish to vest them with the execution of their own penal law. And extreme, indeed, I flatter myself, must be the case in which the general government could ever be induced to assert this right. If ever such a case should occur, it will be time enough to decide upon their constitutional power to do so.

But we know that by the 3d article of the constitution, judicial power, to a certain extent, is vested in the general government, and that by the same instrument power is given to pass all laws necessary to carry into effect the provisions of the constitution. At present it is only necessary to vindicate the laws which 378 they have passed affecting civil cases pending in state tribunals.

In legislating on this subject, Congress, in the true spirit of the constitution, have proposed to secure to everyone the full benefit of the constitution, without forcing anyone necessarily into the courts of the United States. With this view, in one class of cases, they have not taken away absolutely from the state courts all the cases to which their judicial power extends, but left it to the plaintiff to bring his action there originally, if he choose, or to the defendant to force the plaintiff into the courts of the United States where they have jurisdiction, and the former has instituted his suit in the state courts. In this case they have not made it legal for the defendant to plead to the jurisdiction; the effect of which would be to put an end to the plaintiff's suit, and oblige him, probably at great risk or expense, to institute a new action; but the act has given him a right to obtain an order for a removal, on a petition to the state court, upon which the cause, with all its existing advantages, is transferred to the Circuit Court of the United States. This, I presume, can be subject to no objection; as the legislature has an unquestionable right to make the ground of removal a ground of plea to the jurisdiction, and the court must then do no more than it is now called upon to do, to wit, give an order or a judgment, or call it what we will, in favor of that defendant. And so far from asserting the inferiority of the state tribunal, this act is rather that of a superior, inasmuch as the Circuit Court of the United States becomes bound, by that order, to take jurisdiction of [*379 the case. This method, so much more unlikely to affect official delicacy than that which is resorted to in the other class of cases, might, perhaps, have been more happily applied to all the cases which the legislature thought it advisable to remove from the state courts. But the other class of cases, in which the present is included, was proposed to be provided for in a different manner. And here, again, the legislature of the Union evince their confidence in the state tribunals; for they do not attempt to give original cognizance to their own circuit courts of such cases, or to remove them by petition and order; but still believing that their decisions will be generally satisfactory, a writ of error is not given immediately as a question within the jurisdiction of the United States shall occur, but only in case the decision shall finally, in the court of the last resort, be against the title set up under the constitution, treaty, &c.

In this act I can see nothing which amounts to an assertion of the inferiority or dependence of the state tribunals. The presiding judge of the State Court is himself authorized to issue the writ of error, if he will, and thus give jurisdiction to the Supreme Court; and if he thinks proper to decline it, no compulsory process is provided by law to oblige him. The party who imagines himself aggrieved is then at liberty to apply to a judge of the United States, who issues the writ of error, which (whatever the form) is, in substance, no more than a mode of compelling the opposite party to appear before this court, and maintain the legality of his judgment obtained before the 380 state tribunal. An exemplification of a record is the common property of everyone who chooses to apply and pay for it, and thus the case and the parties are brought before us; and so far is the court itself from being brought under the revising power of this court that nothing but the case, as presented by the record and pleadings of the parties, is considered, and the opinions of the court are never resorted to unless for the purpose of assisting this court in forming their own opinions.

The absolute necessity that there was for Congress to exercise something of a revising power over cases and parties in the state courts, will appear from this consideration.

Suppose the whole extent of the judicial power of the United States vested in their own courts, yet such a provision would not answer all the ends of the constitution, for two reasons:

1st. Although the plaintiff may, in such case, have the full benefit of the constitution extended to him, yet the defendant would not; as the plaintiff might force him into the court of the state at his election.

2d. Supposing it possible so to legislate as to give the courts of the United States original jurisdiction in all cases arising under the constitution, laws, &c., in the words of the 2d section of the 8d article (a point on which I have some doubt, and which in time might, perhaps, under some quo minus fiction, or a willing construction, greatly accumulate the jurisdiction of those courts), yet a very large class of cases would remain unprovided for. Incidental questions would often arise, and as a court of 381 competent jurisdiction in the principal case must decide all such questions, whatever laws they arise under, endless might be the diversity of decisions throughout the Union upon the constitution, treaties and laws, of the United States; a subject on which the tranquillity of the Union, internally and externally, may materially depend.

I should feel the more hesitation in adopting the opinions which I express in this case were I not firmly convinced that they are practical, and may be acted upon without compromising the harmony of the Union, or bringing humility upon the state tribunals. God forbid that the judicial power in these states should ever, for a moment, even in its humblest departments, feel a doubt of its own independence. Whilst adjudicating on a subject which the laws of the country assign finally to the revising power of another tribunal, it can feel no such doubt. An anxiety to do justice is ever relieved by the knowledge that what we do is not final between the parties. And no sense of dependence can be felt from the knowledge that the parties, not the court, may be summoned before another tribunal. With this view, by means of laws, avoiding judgments obtained in the state courts in cases over which Congress has constitutionally assumed jurisdiction, and inflicting penalties on parties who shall contumaciously persist in infringing the constitutional rights of others—under a liberal extension of the writ of injunction and the habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, I flatter myself that the full extent of the constitutional revising power may be secured to the United States, and the *benefits of it to the individual, without [382 ever resorting to compulsory or restrictive process upon the state tribunals; a right which, I repeat again, Congress has not asserted; nor has this court asserted, nor does there appear any necessity for asserting.

The remaining points in the case being mere questions of practice, I shall make no remarks upon them.

Judgment affirmed.

THE COMMERCEN. LINDGREN, Claimant.

Provisions, neutral property, but the growth of the enemy's country, and destined for the supply of the enemy's military or naval forces, are contraband.

Provisions, neutral property, and the growth of a neutral country, destined for the general supply of human life in the enemy's country, are not contraband.

Freight is never due to the neutral carrier of contraband.

Quære, in what cases the vehicle of contraband is confiscable.

A neutral ship, laden with provisions, enemy's property, and the growth of the enemy's country, specially permitted to be exported for the supply of his forces, is not entitled to freight.

It makes no difference in such a case, that the enemy is carrying on a distinct war, in conjunction with his allies, who are friends of the captor's country, and that the provisions are intended for the supply of his troops engaged in that war, and that the ship in which they are transported belongs to subjects of one of those allies.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts. This was a case of a Swedish *vessel captured on the 16th [383 of April, 1814, by the private armed schooner Lawrence, on a voyage from Limerick, in Ireland, to Bilbao, in Spain. The cargo consisted of barley and oats, the property of British subjects, the exportation of which is generally prohibited by the British government; and, as well by the official papers of the custom-house as by the private letters of the shippers, it appears to have been shipped under the special permission of the government, for the sole use of His Britannic Majesty's forces then in Spain. Bonds were accordingly given for the fulfillment of this object. At the hearing in the District Court of Maine, the cargo was condemned as enemy's property, and the vessel restored with an allowance, among other things, of the freight for the voyage, according to the stipulation of the charter-party. The captors appealed from so much of the sentence as decreed freight to the neutral ship; and, upon the appeal to the Circuit Court of Massachusetts, the decree, as to freight, was reversed, and from this last sentence an appeal was prosecuted to this court.

Key, for the appellant and claimants. 1. The general principle of law allows freight to the neutral carrier of enemy's property. It is incumbent upon the captors to show that this case forms an exception to the rule, which they can only do by alleging this to be an unlawful interposition in the war between the United States and Great Britain; but an interposition in the Peninsular war, was not necessarily an interposition in the American war. Were it 384 so, it would follow that the Spaniards and Swedes might not trade with the United States, they being the allies of Great Britain; as the prize courts of England decide, that the subjects of an ally cannot lawfully trade with the common enemy. Bynkershoek puts the case of two powers allied during a truce, but before enemies:¹ What would be the situation of neutrals? If they came to the assistance of either, they might be liable to be treated as enemies by the other. In the present instance, if the British forces had been so situated as that they might operate against the United States as well as France, it would alter the case. But remote and uncertain consequences cannot be held to affect the conduct of neutrals with illegality. 2. There is no proof or presumption that the master knew the special destination of the cargo. His act cannot be unlawful, unless done knowingly and willfully, as in the case of carrying enemy's dispatches, where Sir William Scott at first went entirely on the ground of the master's privity; afterwards he adopted a rule more strict and severe; but still knowledge was held to be necessary, and presumed wherever there was a want of extraordinary diligence on the part of the master. It is conceded that the onus is on the claimant to show his ignorance of the contents of the papers concerning the cargo, which, if the present testimony is not sufficient, may be done upon further proof. 385 STORY, J. Ignorance of the master was not pretended in the court below.

Dexter, for the respondents and captors. The rule that the neutral carrier of enemy's property is entitled to freight, is a mitigated rule, and Bynkershoek argues with much force against its reasonableness.² But the master, in the present case, is not entitled to the benefit of it, having, by his conduct, made himself an enemy, pro hac vice. The principle; as to the nature of the Spanish war, was settled when the court determined that to carry goods to Lisbon, under a British license, was cause of confiscation. Can a party in a similar predicament be entitled to freight? Can a neutral stand on any better ground than a citizen? Either the British troops in the peninsula were enemies or friends. If enemies, this is an interposition which cannot be permitted to neutrals. Being at war, the British fleets and armies were hostile in every quarter of the globe. Where shall the line be drawn to mark when they became our enemies? At what period from the time of their landing in Portugal, until their crossing the Pyrenees, and embarking at Bordeaux for the United States? It is impossible to aid the operations of our enemy in any part of the world without strengthening his means of annoying us. The very men fed by this trade came here to fight us on our own soil, and to destroy our capital. It is said that this involves the consequence that we were at war *with [*386 Spain and Portugal; but it depends upon the councils of every country to judge what acts of hostility shall render it expedient to make war; it depended on us to be at war with the allies of our declared enemy. It is a general rule that it is not unlawful to carry provisions to a neutral country; but if the enemy be there, and the articles are destined for his use, it is unlawful. The whole evidence shows that the master knew he was carrying provisions for the supply of the British forces, and his ignorance of the law is immaterial. But even if it were material, the inflated rate of freight shows that he was conscious of the risk he run.

Harper, in reply. The principle contended for by the captors is stricti juris, and extreme in its application to this particular case, where there is nothing like moral guilt in the conduct of the master, who did not intend to interfere in our distinct war. There is no adjudged case that comes up to this; and freight is refused from analogy to the general principle established by the British prize courts as to neutral interposition in the war. But an interference in the coasting and colonial, or other privileged trade of the enemy, and relief to him, is a direct assistance, and the rule cannot justly be extended to a remote and consequential aid not contemplated by the party. The license cases determined by this court, went on the ground of an adoption of the enemy character, and an incorporation with enemy interests; the case of The Liverpool Packet, determined by the same learned judge who tried this cause, shows the distinction *between this and the license [*387 cases.³ The rule of the war of 1756, even supposing it to be well established, does not apply to the relative situation of Great Britain and the United States. The former had hung out no signals of depression and defeat in the peninsular war, and required no neutral aid as a relief from the pressure of her enemies.⁴

The single point now in controversy in this cause is, whether the ship is entitled to the freight for the voyage. The general rule that the neutral carrier of enemy's property is entitled to his freight, is now too firmly established to admit of discussion. But to this rule there are many exceptions. If the neutral be guilty of fraudulent or unneutral conduct, or has interposed himself to assist the enemy in carrying on the war, he is justly deemed to have forfeited his title to freight. Hence, the carrying of contraband goods to the enemy; the engaging in the coasting or colonial trade of the enemy; the spoliation of papers, and the fraudulent suppression of enemy interests, have been held to affect the neutral with the forfeiture of freight, and in cases of a more flagrant character, such as carrying dispatches or hostile military passengers, an engagement in the transport service of the enemy, and a breach of blockade, the penalty of confiscation of the vessel has also been inflicted.¹ By the modern 388 law of nations, provisions are not, in general, deemed contraband; but they may become so, although the property of a neutral, on account of the particular situation of the war, or on account of their destination.² If destined for the ordinary use of life in the enemy's country they are not, in general, contraband; but it is otherwise if destined for military use. Hence, if destined for the army or navy of the enemy, or for his ports of naval or military equipment, they are deemed contraband.³ Another exception from being treated as contraband is, where the provisions are the growth of the neutral exporting country. But if they be the growth of the enemy's country, and more especially if the property of his subjects, and destined for enemy's use, there does not seem any good reason for the exemption; for, as Sir William Scott has observed, in such case the party has not only gone out of his way for the supply of the enemy, but he has assisted him by taking off his surplus commodities. But it is argued that the doctrine of contraband cannot apply to the present case, because the destination was to a neutral country; and it is certainly true that goods destined for the use of a neutral country can never be deemed contraband, whatever may be their character, or however well adapted to warlike purposes. But if such goods are destined for the direct and *avowed use of the enemy's army or [389 navy, we should be glad to see an authority which countenances this exemption from forfeiture, even though the property of a neutral. Suppose, in time of war, a British fleet were lying in a neutral port, would it be lawful for a neutral to carry provisions or munitions of war thither, avowedly for the exclusive supply of such fleet? Would it not be a direct interposition in the war, and an essential aid to the enemy in his hostile preparations? In such a case the goods, even if belonging to a neutral, would have had the taint of contraband in its most offensive character, on account of their destination; and the mere interposition of a neutral port would not protect them from forfeiture.⁵ Strictly speaking, however, this is *not a question of contraband; for that [390 can arise only when the property belongs to a neutral, *and here the property belong- [391 ed to an enemy, and, therefore, was liable, at all events, to condemnation. But was the voyage lawful, and such as a neutral could, with good faith, and without a forfeiture, engage in? It has been solemnly adjudged that being engaged in the transport service, or in the conveyance of military persons in his employ, are Grotius, de J. B. ac P. l. 3, c. 1, s. 5; Vattel, l. 3, c. 7, s. 112. Among the latter class are included naval stores and provisions; though Vattel considers naval stores as always contraband, whilst he holds that provisions only become so under peculiar circumstances. "Les choses qui sont d'un usage particulier pour la guerre, et dont on empêche le transport chez l'ennemi s'appellent marchandises de contrebande. Telles sont les armes, les munitions de guerre, les bois, et tout ce qui sert à la construction, et à l'armement des vaisseaux de guerre, les chevaux, et les vivres mêmes en certaines occasions, ou l'on espère de réduire l'ennemi par la faim." But Bynkershoek reasons against admitting into the list of contraband, articles of promiscuous use, and the materials out of which warlike articles are formed. 2 J. Pub. l. 1, c. 10. He, however, states that materials for building ships may be prohibited under certain circumstances. "Quandoque tamen accidit, ut et navium materia prohibeatur, si hostis ea quam maxime indigent, et absque ea commode bellum gerere haud possit. Quum Ordines Generales in s. 2, edicti contra Lysitanos Dec. 31, 1657, his, quae communi populorum usu contrabanda censentur, Lysitanos juvari vetuissent, specialiter addunt in s. 3, ejusdem edicti, quia nihil nisi mari a Lysitanos metuebant, ne quis etiam navium materiam his advehere vellet, palam sic navium a contrabandis distincta, sed ob specialem rationem addita. instrumentis belli in s. 2, d. Edicti contra Anglos Dec. 5, 1652, et in Edicto Ordinum Generalium contra Francos 9, Mart. 1689. Sed sunt hae exceptiones, quae regulam confirmant." So also of provisions, they are not, in general, contraband; but if the produce of an enemy's country, and not destined for the ordinary sustenance of human life, but for military or naval use, they become contraband, according to the law of England. And articles, the growth of the neutral exporting country, are not contraband, though carried in the vessels of another country. 4 Rob. 161, The Apollo. And the benefit of the principle is extended to maritime countries exporting the produce of neighboring interior districts, whose produce those countries are usually employed in exporting, in the ordinary course of their trade. Ib. 354, The Evert. But the law of France and Spain does not consider provisions as contraband. Ordonnance de la Marine, l. 3, tit. 9, des Prises, art. 11. D'Habreu sobre las Presas, part 1, c. 10, p. 136. And Valin states that, both by the law of France and the common law of nations, provisions are contraband only when destined to besieged or blockaded places. But he asserts that naval stores were contraband at the time he wrote (1758) and had been so since the beginning of that century, which they were not formerly. Sur l'Ord. Ib. Pothier, commenting on the same article of the ordinance, observes: "A l'égard des munitions de bouche que des sujets des puissances neutres envoient à nos ennemis, elles ne sont point censées de contrebande, ni par conséquent sujettes à confiscation; sauf dans un seul cas, qui est lorsqu'elles sont envoyées à une place assiégée ou bloquée." De Propriété, No. 104. By the Swedish ordinance of 1715, contraband articles are declared to be those "qui peuvent être employées pour la guerre." The Danish ordinance of 1659 (provided for the subsisting war with Sweden), contains a long list of contraband articles, among which are included naval stores and provisions. The modern conventional law of nations has generally excluded provisions and naval stores from the list of contraband, and in all the treaties made by the United States since they were an in-acts of hostility which subject the property to confiscation.¹ And the carrying of dispatches from the colony to the mother country of the enemy has subjected the party to the like penalty.² And in these cases, the fact that the voyage was to a neutral port was not thought to change the character of the transaction. The principle of these determinations was asserted to be that the party must be deemed to place himself in the service of the hostile state, 392] and *assist in warding off the pressure of the war, or in favoring its offensive projects. Now, we cannot distinguish these cases, in principle, from that before the court. Here is a cargo of provisions exported from the enemy's country, with the avowed purpose of supplying the army of the enemy. Without this destination they would not have been permitted to be exported at all. Can a more important or essential service be performed in favor of the enemy? In what does it differ from the case of a transport in his service? The property, nominally, belongs to individuals, and is freighted, apparently, on private account, but, in reality, for public use, and under a public contract implied from the very permission of exportation. It is vain to contend that the direct effect of the voyage was not to aid the British hostilities against the United States. It might enable the enemy, indirectly, to operate with more vigor and promptitude against us, and increase his disposable force. But it is not the effect of the particular transaction that the law regards, it is the general tendency of such transactions to assist the military operations of the enemy, and the temptations which it presents to deviate from a strict neutrality. Nor do we perceive how the destination, to a neutral port, can vary the application of this rule; it is only doing that indirectly which is prohibited in direct courses. Would it be contended that a neutral might lawfully transport provisions for the British fleet and army while it lay at Bordeaux preparing for an expedition to the United States? Would it be contended that he might 393] lawfully supply a British *fleet stationed on our coast? We presume that two opinions could not be entertained on such questions; and yet, though the cases put are strong, we do not know that the assistance is more material than might be supplied under cover of a neutral destination like the present.

ground that the war of Great Britain against France was a war distinct from that against the United States; and that Swedish subjects had a perfect right to assist the British arms in respect to the former, though not to the latter. Whatever might be the right of the Swedish sovereign, acting under his own authority, we are of opinion that if a Swedish vessel be engaged in the actual service of Great Britain, or in carrying stores for the exclusive use of the British armies, she must, to all intents and purposes, be deemed a British transport. It is perfectly immaterial in what particular enterprise those armies might, at the time, be engaged; for the same important benefits are conferred upon an enemy, who thereby acquires a greater disposable force to bring into action against us. In The Friendship (6 Rob., 420, 426), Sir W. Scott, speaking on this subject, declares: "It signifies nothing whether the men, so conveyed, are to be put into action, on an immediate expedition, or not. The mere shifting of draughts in detachments, and the conveyance of stores from one place to another, is an ordinary employment of a transport vessel, and it is a distinction totally unimportant *whether [394 this or that case may be connected with the immediate active service of the enemy. In removing forces from distant settlements, there may be no intention of immediate action, but still the general importance of having troops conveyed to places where it is convenient that they should be collected, either for present or future use, is what constitutes the object and employment of transport vessels." It is obvious that the learned judge did not deem it material to what places the stores might be destined; and it must be equally immaterial what is the immediate occupation of the enemy's military force. That force is always hostile to us, be it where it may be. To-day it may act against France, to-morrow against us; and the better its commissary department is supplied, the more life and activity is communicated to all its motions. It is not, therefore, in our view, material whether there be another distinct war in which our enemy is engaged or not; it is sufficient that his armies are everywhere our enemies, and every assistance offered to them must, directly, or indirectly, operate to our injury.

On the whole, the court are of opinion that the voyage, in which this vessel was engaged, was illicit, and inconsistent with the duties of neutrality, and that it is a very lenient administration of justice to confine the penalty to a mere denial of freight.³

dependent power, except in the treaties with Great Britain, they are excluded; but the only treaty now subsisting which contains a definition of contraband, is that of 1795 with Spain, which embraces the munitions of war only. The treaty of 1794 with Great Britain declares naval stores, with the exception of unwrought iron and fir planks, to be contraband, and liable to confiscation, and declares that when provisions and other articles, not generally contraband, shall become such according to the existing law of nations, they shall be entitled to pre-emption, with freight to the carrier. By the treaty negotiated in 1807, but not ratified, provisions were omitted in the list of contraband, and tar, and pitch (unless destined to a port of naval equipment) were added to the naval stores excepted in the treaty of 1794.

395*] *MARSHALL, Ch. J. As a principle, which I think new, and which may certainly, in future, be very interesting to the United States, has been decided in this case, I trust I may be excused for stating the reasons which have prevented my concurring in the opinion that has been delivered.

In argument this sentence of the Circuit Court has been sustained on two grounds: 1st. That 396*] the exportation *of grain from Ireland is generally prohibited, and, therefore, that a neutral cannot lawfully engage in it during war. 2d. That the carriage of supplies to the army of the enemy is to take part with him in the war, and, consequently, to become the enemy of the United States so far as to forfeit the right to freight.

The first point has been maintained, on its supposed analogies to certain principles which have been, at different times, avowed by the great maritime and belligerent powers of Europe respecting the colonial and coasting trade, and which are generally known in England, and in this country, by the appellation of the rule of 1756. Without professing to give any opinion on the correctness of those principles, it is sufficient to observe that they do not appear to me to apply to this case. The rule of 1756 prohibits a neutral from engaging in time of war in a trade in which he was prevented from participating in time of peace, because that trade was, by law, exclusively reserved for the vessels of the hostile state. This prohibition stands upon two grounds: 1st. That a trade, such as the coasting or colonial trade, which, by the permanent policy of a nation, is reserved for its own vessels, if opened to neutrals during war, must be opened under the pressure of the arms of the enemy, and in order to obtain relief from that pressure. The neutral who interposes to relieve the belligerent under such circumstances rescues him from the condition to which the arms of his enemy has reduced him, restores to him those resources which have been wrested from him by the 397*] *arms of his adversary, and deprives that adversary of the advantages which successful war has given him. This the opposing belligerent pronounces a departure from neutrality, and an interference in the war to his prejudice, which he will not tolerate. 2d. If the trade be not opened by law, that a neutral employed in a trade thus reserved by the enemy, to his own vessels, identifies himself with that enemy, and by performing functions exclusively appertaining to the enemy character, assumes that character. Neither the one nor the other of these reasons applies to the case under consideration. The trade was not a trade confined to British vessels during peace, and opened to neutrals during war under the pressure created by the arms of the enemy. It was prohibited for political reasons, entirely unconnected with the interests of navigation, and thrown open from motives equally unconnected with maritime strength. Neither did the neutral employed in it engage in a trade then, or at any time, reserved for British vessels, and, therefore, did not identify himself with them. He was not performing functions exclusively appertaining to the enemy, and, consequently, in performing them did not assume that character.

The second point presents a question of much more difficulty. That a neutral carrying supplies to the army of the enemy does, under the mildest interpretation of international law, expose himself to the loss of freight, is a proposition too well settled to be controverted. That it is a general rule, admitting of few, if any, exceptions, is not denied by the *counsel [398 for the appellants. But they contend that this case is withdrawn from that rule by its peculiar circumstances. The late war between the United States and Great Britain was declared at a time when all Europe, including our enemy, was engaged in a war with which ours had no connection, and in which we professed to take no interest. The allies of our enemy, engaged with him in a common war, the most tremendous and the most vitally interesting to the parties that has ever desolated the earth, were our friends. We kept up with them the mutual interchange of good offices, and declared our determination to stand aloof from that cause which was common to them and Great Britain. They, too, considered this war as entirely distinct from that in which they were engaged. Although at a most critical period we had attacked their ally, they did not view it as an act of hostility to them. They did not ascribe it to a wish to affect, in any manner, the war in Europe, but solely to the desire of asserting our violated rights. They seemed almost to consider the Britain who was our enemy, as a different nation from that Britain who was their ally.

How long this extraordinary state of things might have continued it is impossible to say; but it certainly existed when the Commercen was captured. What its effect on that capture ought to be, must depend more on principle than on precedent. It has been said, and truly said, by the counsel for the captors, that we were at war with Great Britain in every part of the world. We were enemies everywhere. Her troops in Spain, or elsewhere, as *well [399 as her troops in America, were our enemies. It was a conflict of nation against nation. This is conceded; and, therefore, the cargo of

Where the owner of the ship is bound, by the obligation of treaties between his own country and the capturing power, to refrain from carrying contraband to the enemy. 3 Rob., 295, The Neutralitet. By the ancient prize law of France, contraband goods were subject to pre-emption only. Ordonnance de 1584, art. 69. The ordinance of 1681 subjected the contraband articles only to confiscation; but by the regulation of 1778 the same penalty was extended to the ship, in case three-fourths of the cargo consisted of contraband articles. The law of Holland confiscates the contraband articles only, but refuses freight; the principle of which is vindicated by Bynkershoek. "Idque longe verissimum est, nam mercedes non debentur, nisi itinere perfecto et, ne perficeretur, hostis jure prohibuit. Deinde publicantur contrabanda vel ex delicto, et ita nihil commiserunt navarchi, quam ipsi mercium vetitarum domini, vel, quod magis est ex re, ex ipsa nimirum transvectione: quomodo enim amico nostro non possumus commercio interdicere cum hoste nostro, possumus tamen prohibere, ne in bello illi prosit in necem nostram. Atque ita, quod publicatur publicabitur citra ullum ullius hominis respectum, et habebitur, ac si divina perisset, extincto sic jure pignoris."

the Commercen, being British property, was condemned as prize of war. But, although this must be conceded, the corollary which is drawn from it, that those who furnish their armies in Spain with provisions, aid them to our prejudice, and, therefore, take part in the war, and are guilty of unneutral conduct, must be examined before it can be admitted. It is not true that every species of aid given to an enemy is an act of hostility which will justify our treating him who gives it, or his vessels, as hostile to us. The history of all Europe, and especially of Switzerland, furnishes many examples of the truth of this proposition. Those examples need not be quoted particularly, because they stand on principles not entirely applicable to this case. It is the peculiarity of this war which requires the adoption of rules peculiar to a new state of things, in adopting which we must examine the principle on which a nation is justified in treating a neutral as an enemy. That a neutral is friendly to our enemy, and continues to interchange good offices with him, can furnish no subject of complaint; for, then, all commerce with one belligerent would be deemed hostile by the other. The effect of commerce is to augment his resources, and enable him the longer to prosecute the war; but this augmentation is produced by an act entirely innocent on the part of the neutral, and manifesting no hostility to the opposing belligerent. It cannot, therefore, be molested by him 400 while the same good offices *are allowed to him, although he may not be enabled to avail himself of them to an equal degree. It would seem, then, that a remote and consequential effect of an act is not sufficient to give it a hostile character; its tendency to aid the enemy in the war must be direct and immediate. It is also necessary that it should be injurious to us; for a mere benefit to another, which is not injurious to us, cannot convert a friend into an enemy.

If these principles be correct, and they are believed to be so, let us apply them to the present case. When hostilities commenced between the United States and Great Britain, that country was carrying on a war with France, in which the great powers of Europe were combined. We did not expect, and certainly had no right to expect, that our declaration of war against one of the allies would, in any manner, affect the operations of their common war in Europe. The armies of Portugal and Spain were united to those of Britain, and unquestionably aided and assisted our enemy, but they did not aid and assist him against us, and, therefore, did not become our enemies. Had any other of the combined powers equipped a military expedition for the purpose of re-inforcing the armies of Britain in any part of Europe, or had a new ally engaged in the war, that would have been no act of hostility against the United States, although it would have aided our enemy. But if a military expedition to the United States had been undertaken, the case would have assumed a different aspect. Such expedition would be hostile to this country, and the power 401 undertaking it would *become our enemy. It would have been an interference operating directly to our prejudice. The declaration of war against Great Britain had, without doubt, a remote and consequential effect on the war in Europe. The force employed against the United States must be subducted from that employed in support of the common cause in Europe, or greater exertions must be made which might sooner exhaust those resources which enabled her to continue her gigantic efforts in their common war. Consequently, the declaration of war by the United States remotely affected the war in Europe, to the advantage of one party and the injury of the other. Yet no one of the allies considered this declaration as taking part in that war, and placing America in the condition of an enemy. But, had the United States employed their force on the peninsula against the British troops, or had they interfered in the operations of the common war, it may well be doubted whether they might not have been rightfully considered as taking part against the allies, and arranging themselves on the side of the common enemy.

In answer to arguments of this tendency, made at the bar, it was said that nations are governed by political considerations, and may choose rather to overlook conduct at which they might justly take offense, than unnecessarily to increase the number of their enemies, or provoke increased hostility; but that courts of justice are bound by the law, and must inflexibly adhere to its mandate. While this is conceded, it is deemed equally true that those acts which will justify the condemnation of a *neu- [*402] tral as an enemy, would also justify the treating his nation as an enemy, if they were performed or defended by the nation. There is a tacit compact that the hostile act of the individual shall not be ascribed to his government; and that, in turn, the government will not protect the individual from being treated as an enemy. But if the government adopts the act of the individual, and supports it by force, the government itself may be rightfully treated as hostile. Thus contraband of war, though belonging to a neutral, is condemned as the property of an enemy, and his government takes no offense at it; but should his government adopt the act, and insist upon the right to carry articles deemed contraband, and support that right, it would furnish just ground of war. The belligerent might choose to overlook this hostile act, but the act would be, in its nature, hostile. The inquiry, then, whether the act in which this individual Swede was employed, would, if performed by his government, have been considered an act of hostility to the United States, and might rightfully be so considered, is material to the decision of the question, whether the act of the individual is to be treated as hostile. Great Britain and Sweden were allies in the war against France. Consequently, the King of Sweden might have ordered his troops to co-operate with those of Britain, in any place, against the common enemy. He might have ordered a re-inforcement to the British army on the peninsula, and this re-inforcement might have been transported by sea. An attempt on the part of the United States to intercept it, because it was *aiding their [*403] enemy, would certainly have been an interference in the war in Europe which would have provoked, and would have justified, the resentment of all the allied powers. It would have been an interference not to be justified by our war with Britain, because those troops were not to be employed against us. If, instead of a re-inforcement of men, a supply of provisions were to be furnished in that part of the allied army which was British, would that alter the case? Could an American squadron intercept a convoy of provisions, or of military stores, of any description, going to an army engaged in a war common to Great Britain and Sweden, and not against the United States? Could this be done without interfering in that war, and taking part in it against all the allies? If it could not, then any supplies furnished by the government of Sweden, promoting the operations of their common war, whether intended for the British or any other division of the allied armies, had a right to pass unmolested by American cruisers. It is not believed that any act which, if performed by the government, would not be deemed an act of hostility, is to be so deemed if performed by an individual. Had the provisions then on board the Commercen been Swedish property, the result of this reasoning is that it would not have been confiscated as prize of war. Being British property, it is confiscable: but the Swede is guilty of no other offense than carrying enemy's property, an offense not enhanced in this particular case by the character of that property. He is, therefore, as much entitled 404 to freight as if his cargo had been of a different description. His trade was not more illicit than the carriage of enemy's goods for common use would have been.

If the cases in which neutrals have been condemned for having on board articles, the transportation of which clothe them with the enemy character, be attentively considered, it is believed that they will not be found to contravene the reasoning which has been urged. To carry dispatches to the government has been considered as an act of such complete hostility as to communicate the hostile character to the vessel carrying them. But this decision was made in a case where the dispatches could only relate to the war between the government of the captors and that to which the dispatches were addressed. They were communications between a colonial government, in danger of being attacked, and the mother country. In a subsequent case, it was determined that a neutral vessel might bear dispatches to a hostile government without assuming the belligerent character, if they were from an ambassador residing in the neutral state. Yet such dispatches might contain intelligence material to the war. But this is a case in which the belligerent right to intercept all communications addressed to the enemy, by the officers of that enemy, is modified and restrained by the neutral right to protect the diplomatic communications which are necessary to the political intercourse between belligerents and neutrals. It is a case in which the right of the belligerent is narrowed and controlled by the positive rights of a neutral; still more reasonably may they be narrowed and controlled by the positive rights of a belligerent engaged in a war in which we have no concern and in which we ought not to interfere. To transport troops, or military persons, belonging to the enemy, from one place to another, has also been determined to subject the vessel to condemnation; but, in those cases, the service in which it was supposed the persons, so conveyed, were to be employed, was against the government of the captors. The transportation of these persons was to aid the views of one belligerent against the other, and was, therefore, to take part in the war against that other. It is an act, the operation of which is direct and immediate.

It may be said that this reasoning would go to the protection of British troops passing to the peninsula, and of British supplies transported in British vessels for their use; that it therefore proves too much, and must, consequently, be unsound.

It is admitted that, pressed to its extreme point, the argument would go this extent, an extent which cannot be maintained; but it does not follow that it is unsound in every stage of its progress. In every case of conflicting rights, each must yield something to the other. The pretensions of neither party can be carried to the extreme. They meet—they check—they limit each other. The precise line which neither can pass, but to which each may advance, is not easily to be found and marked; yet such a line must exist, whatever may be the difficulty of discerning it. To attack an enemy, or to take his property, if either can be done without violating the sovereignty of a friend, 406 is of the very essence of war. None can be offended at the exercise of this right, who may not be offended at the declaration of war itself. The injury which the allies of our enemy, in a war common to them (but in which we are not engaged), sustain, by this occasional interruption, is incidental, while, on our part, it is the exercise of a direct and essential right. But when we attack a friend who is carrying on military operations conjointly with our enemy, but not against us, we are not making direct war, but are using those incidental rights which war gives us, against those direct rights which are exercised by a belligerent not our enemy, and which constitute war itself. In either case it would seem to me that the incidental must yield to the direct and essential right.

Upon this view of the subject, I have at length, not, it is confessed, without difficulty, come to the conclusion that the Commercen being a Swedish vessel, whose nation was engaged in a war, common to Great Britain and Sweden, against France, and to which the United States were not a party, might convey military stores for the use of the British armies engaged in that war, as innocently as she could carry British property of any other description, and is, therefore, as much entitled to freight as she would be had the property belonged to the enemy, but been destined for ordinary use.

LIVINGSTON, J. I concur in the opinion of the Chief Justice. Considering Sweden an ally of Great Britain, in the war which the latter was carrying on in the peninsula, [*407 either the King of Sweden himself might send transports with provisions for the use of the British army, while engaged in any common enterprise, or his subjects might lawfully aid in such transportation, without a violation of their neutral character as it regarded the United States. If the American government had asserted the right of capturing and condemning Swedish vessels, or depriving them of their freight, on the ground on which it has been denied to the Commercen, I am not certain that Sweden would not have thought it a very serious aggression, and would not have had a right to consider it, if persisted in, as an act of hostility.

JOHNSON, J. I also concur in the opinion of the Chief Justice; and I do it without the least doubt or hesitation. Sweden was an ally in the war going on in the peninsula, and her subjects had an indubitable right to transport provisions in aid of their nation, or its allies. The owner, therefore, had a right to his freight; for he did no act inconsistent with our belligerent rights, while in the direct and ordinary exercise of those rights which a state of war conferred on himself.

THE GEORGE, THE BOTHNEA, AND THE JANSTAFF.

In cases of joint or collusive capture, the usual simplicity of the prize proceedings is necessarily departed from; and where, in these cases, there is the least doubt, other evidence than that arising from the captured vessel, or invoked from other prize causes, may be resorted to.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts.

These were British vessels captured and brought in by the private armed vessels the Fly and the Washington, and libeled as prize of war. In each of them the United States interposed a claim, charging that the capture was collusive, and that the whole property ought, on that account, to be forfeited to the United States. In each case the captors applied for permission to make further proof. In that of the George, it was allowed in the District Court, and partially received; but the application to make still further proof, and to introduce into the record testimony already taken, was rejected in the Circuit Court, and was again offered in this court. In the two last cases further proof was refused, both in the district and circuit courts. In all the cases, the vessels and cargoes were condemned to the United States, and from each of these sentences of condemnation the captors appealed to this court.

409*] *The first case was argued by Dexter and G. Sullivan for the appellants and captors, and by the Attorney-General for the United States. The two last by Winder and Harper for the appellants and captors, and by Dexter and Pinkney for the United States.

The first question to be discussed is the propriety of allowing further proof. It is certainly a general rule in prize causes that the decision should be prompt; and should be made, unless some good reason for departing from it exist, on the papers and testimony afforded by the captured vessel, or which can be invoked from the papers of other vessels in possession of the court. This rule ought to be held sacred in that whole description of causes to which the reasons on which it is founded are applicable. The usual controversy in prize causes is between the captors and captured. If the captured vessel be plainly an enemy, immediate condemnation is certain and proper. But the vessel and cargo may be neutral, and may be captured on suspicion. This is a grievous vexation to the neutral, which ought not to be increased by prolonging his detention, in the hope that something may be discovered from some other source, which may justify condemnation. If his papers are all clear, and if the examinations in preparatorio all show his neutrality, he is and ought to be immediately discharged. In a fair transaction this will often be the case. If anything suspicious appears in the papers, which involves the neutrality of the claimant *in doubt, [*410 he must blame himself for the circumstance, and cannot complain of the delay which is necessary for the removal of those doubts. The whole proceedings are calculated for the trial of the question of prize or no prize, and the standing interrogatories on which the preparatory examinations are taken are framed for the purpose of eliciting the truth on that question. They are intended for the controversy between the captors and the captured; intended to draw forth everything within the knowledge of the crew of the prize, but cannot be intended to procure testimony respecting facts not within their knowledge. When the question of prize or no prize is decided in the affirmative, the strong motives for an immediate sentence lose somewhat of their force, and the point to which the testimony in preparatorio is taken, is no longer the question in controversy. If another question arises, for instance, as to the proportions in which the owners and crew of the capturing vessel are entitled, the testimony which will decide this question must be searched for, not among the papers of the prize vessel, or the depositions of her crew, but elsewhere, and liberty must, therefore, be given to adduce this testimony. The case of a joint capture has been mentioned, and we think, correctly, as an analogous case. Where several cruisers claim a share of the prize, extrinsic testimony is admitted to establish their rights. They are not, and ought not to be, confined to the testimony which may be extracted from the crew. And yet the standing interrogatories are, in some degree, adapted to this case. Each individual of the crew is always asked *whether, [*411 at the time of capture, any other vessel was in sight. Notwithstanding this, the claimants to a joint interest in the prize are always permitted to adduce testimony drawn from other sources to establish their claim. The case before the court is one of much greater strength. The captors are charged with direct and positive fraud, which is to strip them of rights claimed under their commissions. Even if exculpatory testimony could be expected from the prize crew, the interrogatories are not calculated to draw it from them. Of course, it will rarely happen that testimony taken for the sole purpose of deciding the question whether the captured vessel ought to be condemned or restored, should furnish sufficient lights for determining whether the capture has been bona fide or collusive. If circumstances of doubtful appearance occur, justice requires that an opportunity to explain those circumstances should be given; and that fraud should never be fixed on an individual until he has been allowed to clear himself from the imputation, if in his power.

Under these impressions, the case must be a strong one, indeed; the collusiveness of the capture must be almost confessed before the court could think a refusal to allow other proof than is furnished by the captured vessel justifiable. In the cases before the court there are certainly many circumstances of great suspicion, but none which do not admit of explanation.

In the case of The George, captured by the privateer Fly, the circumstances relied on to prove the collusiveness of the capture are:

412* 1st. The force of the Fly. 2d. The shipping articles. 3d. The cargo of the George. 4th. The number of her crew. 5th. The place, and other circumstances of her capture. 6th. The sending the mariners on shore, instead of bringing them into the United States.

First. The force of the Fly may probably neither require nor admit of explanation.

Second. The shipping articles unquestionably furnish ground of suspicion. But some light may be thrown on this point by testimony showing whether it was, or was not, common for small cruisers in the Bay of Fundy to give wages to the crew instead of prize money. It may be of still more importance to determine whether each of the crew, like Gilley, who was examined, was to receive twenty dollars, in addition to his wages, for each prize.

Third. Respecting the cargo it is not probable that further testimony can be adduced.

Fourth. Respecting the number of mariners on board the captured vessel, the court would require some further information. On the one part it is asserted that they are insufficient, and on the other that they are sufficient for the alleged voyage. There is no evidence which can incline the court the one way or the other.

Fifth. On the place and other circumstances of capture further information may certainly be given. The George appears to have sailed from St. Johns, New Brunswick, for the Havana, on the 8th, and to have been captured in Long Island harbor, at anchor, on the 13th 413 of January, 1814. The distance *between these places is said to be five hours' sail, with a favorable wind and tide. Where did she linger during this interval? Was she in Etang harbor during any part of the time? Why did she leave that harbor? Did she expect a convoy? Did a convoy sail about that time? Was it usual for vessels to wait for a convoy at the island of Grand Menan? Could a vessel be descried from the sea lying at anchor in Long Island harbor? Satisfactory answers to these questions might certainly throw some light on this part of the case, and better enable the court to form an opinion on it.

Sixth. It may not, perhaps, be easy to account for not bringing in the crew. Yet, it would contribute, in some degree, to the elucidation of the transaction, if the practice in that part of the country could be laid before the court. It might also be of some importance to know whether the sum of $100 was usually paid by government for every merchant seaman brought into the country, whether he was a British subject or the subject of a neutral power.

In the cases of The Janstaff and The Bothnea there are some points to be explained which are common to those cases with the George, and some which are peculiar to themselves.

Of the latter class are the inquiries:

First. Whether it frequently happened that unarmed vessels, without a convoy, sailed from that port, either for New London or for any other port of the United States, or for a foreign port.

*Second. What is the character, and [*414] what the occupation, of the two passengers who were found, one on board the Bothnea, and the other on board the Janstaff? Are they acquainted with the coasts in or about Long Island sound? Are they capable of being supercargoes? How came they at Halifax?

In both cases it will be desirable to know whether any previous acquaintance existed between the captors and the owners of the captured vessels, and whether the captors had had any previous communication with the places from which the captured vessels sailed. In the cases of The Janstaff and Bothnea all the circumstances attending the capture will be important. If, as is not expected, any further or better reason can be given for putting the whole crew on shore, it may throw some light on the cases. Each case depends, in some degree, on the points which have been suggested. They are stated for the purpose of showing that points on which the judgment of the court may, in some degree, depend, are susceptible of explanation, and, therefore, ought to be explained so far as it may be in the power of the parties to explain them. It is not, however, intended to confine them to the particular points which have been stated. Full liberty is given to both parties to adduce further proof on every point in the case.

defendants, for forcibly rescuing a prize, which had been captured and taken possession of by two American privateers. The captured vessel was on her way, under the direction of a prize-master and crew, to the port of Salem for adjudication. The indictment laid the offense as committed upon the high seas. The question made was, whether the Circuit Court has jurisdiction over common law offenses against the United States, on which the judges of that court were divided in opinion.

The Attorney-General stated that he had given to this case an anxious attention; as much so, he hoped, as his public duty, under whatever view of it, rendered necessary. That he had also examined the opinion of the court, delivered at February term, 1813, in the case of The United States v. Hudson and Goodwin. That considering the point as decided in that case, whether with or without argument, on the part of those who had preceded him as the representative *of the government in this court, he desired respectfully to state, without saying more, that it was not his intention to argue it now.

STORY, J. I do not take the question to be settled by that case.

JOHNSON, J. I considered it to be settled by the authority of that case.

WASHINGTON, J. Whenever counsel can be found ready to argue it, I shall devote myself of all prejudice arising from that case.

LIVINGSTON, J. I am disposed to hear an argument on the point. This case was brought up for that purpose, but until the question is re-argued, the case of The United States v. Hudson and Goodwin must be taken as law.

JOHNSON, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Upon the question now before the court a difference of opinion has existed, and still exists, among the members of the court. We should, therefore, have been willing to have heard the question discussed upon solemn argument. But the Attorney-General has declined to argue the cause; and no counsel appears for the defendant. Under these circumstances the court would not choose to review their former decision in the case of The United States v. Hudson and Goodwin, or draw it into *doubt. They *will, therefore, certify an opinion to the Circuit Court in conformity with that decision.

Wheat. 1.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of Georgia. This vessel and the cargo were libeled as prize of war. The ship was claimed by John E. Smith, the supercargo, in behalf of John Meyer, alleged to be a Russian subject residing at St. Petersburg. The cargo consisted of logwood and cotton, 200 bales of which were claimed by Smith, in behalf of Platzman & Gosler, also alleged to be Russian merchants of St. Petersburg. The remainder of the cargo, consisting of 950 bales of cotton, and 58 tons of logwood, were *claimed in behalf of [*418 John Inerarity, a Scotchman, domiciled at Pensacola, and an adopted Spanish subject. The vessel was restored in the District Court, and the cargo condemned, except the logwood, which was restored. Both parties appealed to the Circuit Court, and the cause was then heard and considered; but that court, under the influence of personal considerations, rendered only a pro forma decree, affirming the sentence of the District Court, at the same time expressing a strong opinion that both vessel and cargo were liable to condemnation. The cause had been continued at the last term of this court for further proof, but no further proof was produced at the present term.

The cause was argued by Key and Harper for the appellants and claimants, and by Pinkney and Charlton for the respondents and captors.

JOHNSON, J., delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

This case presents itself in this court under a cloud of circumstances unusually threatening. There is scarcely wanting in it one of those characteristics by which courts of admiralty are led to the detection of neutral fraud. Whether we consider the persons who conduct the voyage, the original character of the vessel, the time and circumstances of the transfer, the trade she has since been engaged in, the funds with which that trade has been transacted, or the manner in which it has been conducted, we find all the hopes and wishes of the adventure centering *in the hostile country. La [*419 French, the master, is a native Dane, a naturalized American citizen, a Russian subject, and finally, domiciled and his family residing in Great Britain, but (as he declares himself) having no particular residence. Smith, the supercargo, is a native Englishman, but a naturalized citizen of the United States. He has resided nearly 30 years in Baltimore, where the war finds him. He sails for Libson; from thence to Great Britain; and is almost immediately, without showing any pretensions to such credit, employed by an opulent house of trade to take charge of this adventure, with a latitude of discretion which could be the result only of long acquaintance, or very strong recommendations. Such men are the proper instruments of belligerent or neutral fraud; they are the avowed panders of the mercantile world; their consciences are in the market. Having no national character or feeling, and but very few qualms of any other kind, their talents and fidelity to their employers, like those of the bravo, are sought out by the projectors of iniquitous adventure. And who are Meyer, and Platzman and Gosler? They are introduced in the bills of the day as very important personages; the one was the owner of the ship, the other of the cargo; but we find them acting a part conspicuous only for its insignificance. They cross the stage and disappear. It is a circumstance which scarcely admits of explanation, that Meyer never exercised a single act of ownership over this vessel. He resides at St. Petersburg, she is lying at Cronstadt. He purchases her, for aught we know, without having 420] ever seen *her, of a person whom nobody knows, and whom nothing connects with the vessel; is introduced by a Mr. Nicholas, of Virginia, to the master, leaves him in command, and, from that time to the present, does not give him one order, nor writes a single letter to him. If we could suppose it possible that there was no correspondence between them from the 31st of July, 1812, when the ship was purchased, to the 22d December, when she was chartered to Platzman & Gosler, at least he would have written at that time and inclosed the master a copy of the charter-party, and a letter of instructions to regulate his conduct in the distant and perilous voyage on which he was about to enter. But we find La French without one scrap of instruction from the supposed owner, and, in all things, yielding implicit obedience to the supposed agent of Platzman & Gosler, whose interests might very well have been in many things inconsistent with those of the charterer. And what is not less remarkable, although he acknowledges that he must have been eighteen months or two years master of the same ship prior to the sale to Meyer, we find nothing about him or the vessel by which we can discover who the former owner was, and when he is asked who executed the bill of sale to Meyer, his reply is, he does not know; thus leading, fairly, to a conclusion that reasons exist now, and existed formerly, for rendering such a correspondence either unnecessary or unsafe to accompany the ship. As to Platzman & Gosler, the same observation is strikingly applicable to them. From the moment they launch their bark upon the ocean she 421] becomes, as to them, *a perfect derelict. Not one anxious inquiry, not one expression of feeling, is communicated by letter to their agent in London. Such, at least, we have a right to infer from the non-production of any such correspondence upon the order for further proof. And, upon the supposition of the fairness of this transaction, the existence of letters to prove it fair was unavoidable; for the letter of the 22d December expressly calls for correspondence prior to that date, and having relation to this adventure. Besides that, as difficulties thickened upon the adventure in Pensacola, bills on bills were drawn upon the British house, and letters on letters sent under cover to them, it would have followed that communications would be made to the Russian house, and bills drawn for re-imbursement. But over all this there rests an ominous silence.

Nor is there any intrinsic skill in the machinery of this transaction. It can neither claim the praise of genius in its invention nor of skillful execution in the adaptation of its parts. The very inception of it is laid in a bungling artifice that would not cheat a novice in the arts of commercial evasion. It bears, on the face of it, the record of its own conviction, and confesses itself to be, what it was intended to be, nothing but a neutral cloak. The correspondents, Simpson & Co., to whom the letter of the 22d of December is addressed, are expressly instructed to attach that letter to the invoice and bill of lading, in order to support the Russian national character. This, of itself, is conclusive to show that this evidence constituted no part of the mercantile transaction *between the parties. [422 For, when was it ever heard of that a letter, which contains in it the whole evidence upon which a correspondent purchases, advances, and negotiates to a great amount, is thus to be thrown to the winds, or returned to the hands of him who is interested in suppressing it? And every step that we advance in the progress of this transaction, we find new light breaking in upon us to make manifest its real characteristics. The letter itself, in which the whole adventure originates, bears, on the face of it, obvious symptoms of that over anxiety which never fails to accompany a conscience ill at ease. In a letter to a man, to whom such facts must have been wholly indifferent, it brings together, into one view, a number of facts to which the English merchants (at least) know that courts of admiralty are in the habit of attaching importance in deciding on questions of fraud or belligerent rights; as, for instance, to show that the ship had been previously engaged in neutral trade, they say: "After the discharge of a cargo of Russian produce at this port." And that it may appear that this adventure had not recently originated, they say: "Our friends, Messrs. A. Glennie, Son & Co., with whom we have some time corresponded on this subject," &c. This letter, which is all-important to the decision of the cause, calls forth some more remarks. It contains a singular congeries of powers, instructions and facts. It is the only evidence we have that the vessel ever was chartered for this voyage. The only article of instructions to Meyer is to be found here; the only evidence of the right of A. Glennie & Co. *to act for [423 Platzman & Gosler, is contained in it. Nor is there anything else that would have directed the house of Simpson & Co. in their transactions, had that house been in existence when the vessel arrived at Pensacola. It may well be asked, would A. Glennie & Co. have been satisfied to part with so important a voucher for their transactions as agents in this large adventure, had there been anything real in it? Or would so many persons have been satisfied to stake their fortunes on this itinerant document, which was to give its light and pass on, perhaps never to return again? But if it did not bear upon the face of it such palpable marks of its fictitious character, the conduct of the several persons who affected to be governed by it would sufficiently show that it was a paper of no authority. It is to be remarked that on some points this letter of the 22d of December, in which alone Platzman & Gosler appear in a tangible form, is explicit and positive. On others, it yields unbounded discretion to A. Glennie & Co. to instruct Simpson & Co., to whom it is directed, in his conduct in that agency. With regard to two things, it yields no discretion: First, as to the article which is to be purchased, which is expressly limited to cotton. Secondly, as to the homeward destination of the ship and cargo, which is exclusively to Gottenburgh. Yet we find that on the 22d of February and the 3d of March, 1813, A. Glennie & Co. give Smith instructions authorizing a deviation from the orders of their principal, not only as to the articles of which the cargo might consist, but as [424] to the voyage from New Orleans, *empowering him even to charter the vessel, and limiting him in the purchase of cotton to the price of eight cents, when Platzman & Gosler prescribe no limits, and, in fine, taking the power, both as to vessel and cargo, out of the hands of Simpson & Co., to whom the letter of Platzman & Gosler is directed, and placing the adventure altogether under the control of Smith, a man whom they appoint, for aught we know, without any authority from their principal, and whose presence was altogether unnecessary, under the supposition that Platzman & Gosler had really addressed themselves to Simpson & Co., to load the vessel on their account. But this is not all; in every step of this transaction, the parties betray a consciousness of the necessity of artifice, and in every attempt to resort to it, betray more of a disposition than a talent for fraud. Well aware that it is necessary to keep up a correspondence with the supposed neutral, Smith resorts to a method in which he supposes he may covertly correspond with the English house, while he keeps up the appearance of corresponding with the neutral claimant. We find a most minute detail of all his transactions, and the events of the voyage contained in a series of letters directed to Platzman & Gosler, but uniformly transmitted open, and under cover to the persons really to be informed—the hostile house. This is a shallow artifice. The belligerent must be fatuous who could be duped by it. And, unfortunately for the claimants, the letters, on the face of them, contain evidence to prove for whom they were really intended. Strike out [425] the names of *Platzman & Gosler, and insert that of A. Glennie & Co., and they will be found to be written with a view to satisfy several passages in his general letter of instructions, of the 2d of February, from A. Glennie & Co.

This affected correspondence with Platzman & Gosler commences on the 24th of May, 1813, and in the letter of that date, and that of the 5th of June following, there are very striking proofs of the nature and views of that correspondence. In the letter of the 25th of December, 1813, which may be called the magna charta of this adventure, it will be recollected Platzman & Gosler are made to say, that as they live in so remote a place as St. Petersburg, Simpson must receive his instructions about the cargo of cotton altogether from A. Glennie & Co.; and in the letters of the 2d of February and 5th of March, above referred to, Smith receives his instructions altogether from A. Glennie & Co., and yet, when he writes to Platzman & Gosler on the 24th of May, and announces his intended voyage to Liverpool (in express violation of their orders), he adds: "There I shall hope to receive your instructions about the disposal of the cargo." This, to the London house of A. Glennie & Co., was perfectly intelligible. It will also be recollected that in the letters from A. Glennie & Co., of the 2d of February, Smith is expressly instructed to communicate all necessary information, so as to govern them in making insurance; and yet in these letters to Platzman & Gosler he affectedly observes that he sends them open to A. Glennie & Co., in order to direct their conduct *in case Platzman & Gosler should have instructed them to make insurance. When to all these considerations we add that this adventure, in fact, originates in a hostile country, and never appears to look to any other termination, and that the funds on which it was projected were altogether English, we are satisfied that the ship, and the 200 bales of cotton, laden professedly on account of Platzman & Gosler, are not owned as claimed. With regard to the ship some additional reasons might be urged; but the foregoing, as applying to that whole claim, we deem sufficient.

With regard to the claim of Inerarity, the question there rests between positive swearing and irreconcilable circumstances. And it is a melancholy truth, that forces itself upon the observation of everyone who is conversant with courts of admiralty, that positive oaths are too often the most unsatisfactory evidence that can be resorted to. A species of casuistry or moral sophistry seems to have acquired too great an ascendancy over the witnesses who sometimes appear in those courts.

With regard to the logwood, nothing can be said against it, except that we find it in bad company. There is no evidence in the case which can induce a belief that it belonged to anyone but Inerarity. Not so with the cotton; except in his own oath, and in the invoice, he is nowhere recognized, among the acting parties, as owner of this cargo. The evidence of an invoice on such a subject is literally reduced to nothing in the prize courts; and his own affidavit will be considered in due time. We will inquire into *the circumstances which [427] involve him in suspicion, and see how these circumstances are explained.

It is in evidence that on the arrival of Smith at Pensacola, and his ascertaining the impracticability of loading the ship on account of his owners, at the limited price, Inerarity himself advised him, as he says, in his letter of the 24th of May, to go to New Orleans for the purpose of endeavoring to obtain freight. From this it is evident that at that time he had no intention to embark in a shipment of cotton. The opportunity of securing this vessel at such a time would otherwise have been eagerly caught at. On going to New Orleans, Smith falls in with Milne, who finally ships the whole of this parcel of cotton through Inerarity.

The bills of lading and invoice are made out to Inerarity, but Milne transmits the cotton to him, not generally, but expressly to be laden on board this ship. In all this transaction, Milne is the real dux facti. He procures the cargo, for which Smith pays him a commission; he transmits the cotton; Inerarity never appears but as the agent of Milne. And when Smith speaks of the shipper, which he often does in his letters to La French, he speaks of him as Inerarity's friend.

But it is contended that, by this expression, we are to understand Inerarity himself; that he was the neutral Spaniard spoken of as the shipper in Smith's letters to Platzman & Gosler, and as no other shipper appears in the case but Inerarity's friend, and Inerarity himself, they must mean the same person. This idea is ingeniously taken up from an expression *in Smith's answer of the 12th October, [428] to Inerarity's letter of the 6th, relative to the

ed to admit of discussion. But to this rule there are many exceptions. If the neutral be guilty of fraudulent or unneutral conduct, or has interposed himself to assist the enemy in carrying on the war, he is justly deemed to have forfeited his title to freight. Hence, the carrying of contraband goods to the enemy; the engaging in the coasting or colonial trade of the enemy; the spoliation of papers, and the fraudulent suppression of enemy interests, have been held to affect the neutral with the forfeiture of freight, and in cases of a more flagrant character, such as carrying dispatches or hostile military passengers, an engagement in the transport service of the enemy, and a breach of blockade, the penalty of confiscation of the vessel has also been inflicted.¹ By the modern 388] law of nations, provisions are not, in general, deemed contraband; but they may become so, although the property of a neutral, on account of the particular situation of the war, or on account of their destination.² If destined for the ordinary use of life in the enemy's country they are not, in general, contraband; but it is otherwise if destined for military use. Hence, if destined for the army or navy of the enemy, or for his ports of naval or military equipment, they are deemed contraband.³ Another exception from being treated as contraband is, where the provisions are the growth of the neutral exporting country. But if they be the growth of the enemy's country, and more especially if the property of his subjects, and destined for enemy's use, there does not seem any good reason for the exemption; for, as Sir William Scott has observed, in such case the party has not only gone out of his way for the supply of the enemy, but he has assisted him by taking off his surplus commodities. But it is argued that the doctrine of contraband cannot apply to the present case, because the destination was to a neutral country; and it is certainly true that goods destined for the use of a neutral country can never be deemed contraband, whatever may be their character, or however well adapted to warlike purposes. But if such goods are destined for the direct and *avowed use of the enemy's army or [389 navy, we should be glad to see an authority which countenances this exemption from forfeiture, even though the property of a neutral. Suppose, in time of war, a British fleet were lying in a neutral port, would it be lawful for a neutral to carry provisions or munitions of war thither, avowedly for the exclusive supply of such fleet? Would it not be a direct interposition in the war, and an essential aid to the enemy in his hostile preparations? In such a case the goods, even if belonging to a neutral, would have had the taint of contraband in its most offensive character, on account of their destination; and the mere interposition of a neutral port would not protect them from forfeiture.⁵ Strictly speaking, however, this is *not a question of contraband; for that [390 can arise only when the property belongs to a neutral, *and here the property belong- [391 ed to an enemy, and, therefore, was liable, at all events, to condemnation. But was the voyage lawful, and such as a neutral could, with good faith, and without a forfeiture, engage in? It has been solemnly adjudged that being engaged in the transport service, or in the conveyance of military persons in his employ, are Grotius, de J. B. ac P. 1, 3, c. 1, s. 5; Vattel, 1, 3, c. 7, s. 112. Among the latter class are included naval stores and provisions; though Vattel considers naval stores as always contraband, whilst he holds that provisions only become so under peculiar circumstances. "Les choses qui sont d'un usage particulier pour la guerre, et dont on empêche le transport chez l'ennemi s'appellent marchandises de contrebande. Telles sont les armes, les munitions de guerre, les bois, et tout ce qui sert à la construction, et à l'armement des vaisseaux de guerre, les chevaux, et les vivres mêmes en certaines occasions, ou l'on espère de réduire l'ennemi par la faim." But Bynkershoek reasons against admitting into the list of contraband, articles of promiscuous use, and the materials out of which warlike articles are formed. 2 J. Pub. 1, c. 10. He, however, states that materials for building ships may be prohibited under certain circumstances. "Quandoque tamen accidit, ut et navium materia prohibeatur, si hostis ea quam maxime indigeat, et absque ea commode bellum gerere haud possit. Quum Ordines Generales in s. 2, edicti contra Lysitanos Dec. 31, 1657, his, quae communi populorum usu contrabanda censentur, Lysitanos juvari vetuissent, specialiter addunt in s. 3, ejusdem edicti, quia nihil nisi mari a Lysitanos metuebant, ne quis etiam navium materiam his advehere vellet, palam sic navium a contrabandis distincta, sed ob specialem rationem addita. Ob eandem causam navium materia conjungitur cum instrumentis belli in s. 2, d. Edicti contra Anglos Dec. 5, 1652, et in Edicto Ordinum Generalium contra Francos 9, Mart. 1689. Sed sunt hae exceptiones, quae regulam confirmant." So also of provisions, they are not, in general, contraband; but if the produce of an enemy's country, and not destined for the ordinary sustenance of human life, but for military or naval use, they become contraband, according to the law of England. And articles, the growth of the neutral exporting country, are not contraband, though carried in the vessels of another country. 4 Rob. 161, The Apollo. And the benefit of the principle is extended to maritime countries exporting the produce of neighboring interior districts, whose produce those countries are usually employed in exporting, in the ordinary course of their trade. Ib. 354, The Evert. But the law of France and Spain does not consider provisions as contraband. Ordonnance de la Marine, 13, tit. 9, des Prises, art. 11. D'Habreu sobre las Presas, part 1, c. 10, p. 136. And Valin states that, both by the law of France and the common law of nations, provisions are contraband only when destined to besieged or blockaded places. But he asserts that naval stores were contraband at the time he wrote (1758) and had been so since the beginning of that century, which they were not formerly. Sur l'Ord. Ib. Pothier, commenting on the same article of the ordinance, observes: "A l'égard des munitions de bouche que des sujets des puissances neutres envoient à nos ennemis, elles ne sont point censées de contrebande, ni par conséquent sujettes à confiscation; sauf dans un seul cas, qui est lorsqu'elles sont envoyées à une place assiégée ou bloquée." De Propriété, No. 104. By the Swedish ordinance of 1715, contraband articles are declared to be those "qui peuvent être employées pour la guerre." The Danish ordinance of 1659 (provided for the subsisting war with Sweden), contains a long list of contraband articles, among which are included naval stores and provisions. The modern conventional law of nations has generally excluded provisions and naval stores from the list of contraband, and in all the treaties made by the United States since they were an in-acts of hostility which subject the property to confiscation.¹ And the carrying of dispatches from the colony to the mother country of the enemy has subjected the party to the like penalty.² And in these cases, the fact that the voyage was to a neutral port was not thought to change the character of the transaction. The principle of these determinations was asserted to be that the party must be deemed to place himself in the service of the hostile state, 392] and *assist in warding off the pressure of the war, or in favoring its offensive projects. Now, we cannot distinguish these cases, in principle, from that before the court. Here is a cargo of provisions exported from the enemy's country, with the avowed purpose of supplying the army of the enemy. Without this destination they would not have been permitted to be exported at all. Can a more important or essential service be performed in favor of the enemy? In what does it differ from the case of a transport in his service? The property, nominally, belongs to individuals, and is freighted, apparently, on private account, but, in reality, for public use, and under a public contract implied from the very permission of exportation. It is vain to contend that the direct effect of the voyage was not to aid the British hostilities against the United States. It might enable the enemy, indirectly, to operate with more vigor and promptitude against us, and increase his disposable force. But it is not the effect of the particular transaction that the law regards, it is the general tendency of such transactions to assist the military operations of the enemy, and the temptations which it presents to deviate from a strict neutrality. Nor do we perceive how the destination, to a neutral port, can vary the application of this rule; it is only doing that indirectly which is prohibited in direct courses. Would it be contended that a neutral might lawfully transport provisions for the British fleet and army while it lay at Bordeaux preparing for an expedition to the United States? Would it be contended that he might 393] lawfully supply a British *fleet stationed on our coast? We presume that two opinions could not be entertained on such questions; and yet, though the cases put are strong, we do not know that the assistance is more material than might be supplied under cover of a neutral destination like the present.

An attempt has been made to distinguish this case from the ordinary cases of employment in the transport service of the enemy, upon the ground that the war of Great Britain against France was a war distinct from that against the United States; and that Swedish subjects had a perfect right to assist the British arms in respect to the former, though not to the latter. Whatever might be the right of the Swedish sovereign, acting under his own authority, we are of opinion that if a Swedish vessel be engaged in the actual service of Great Britain, or in carrying stores for the exclusive use of the British armies, she must, to all intents and purposes, be deemed a British transport. It is perfectly immaterial in what particular enterprise those armies might, at the time, be engaged; for the same important benefits are conferred upon an enemy, who thereby acquires a greater disposable force to bring into action against us. In The Friendship (6 Rob., 420, 426), Sir W. Scott, speaking on this subject, declares: "It signifies nothing whether the men, so conveyed, are to be put into action, on an immediate expedition, or not. The mere shifting of draughts in detachments, and the conveyance of stores from one place to another, is an ordinary employment of a transport vessel, and it is a distinction totally unimportant *whether [394 this or that case may be connected with the immediate active service of the enemy. In removing forces from distant settlements, there may be no intention of immediate action, but still the general importance of having troops conveyed to places where it is convenient that they should be collected, either for present or future use, is what constitutes the object and employment of transport vessels." It is obvious that the learned judge did not deem it material to what places the stores might be destined; and it must be equally immaterial what is the immediate occupation of the enemy's military force. That force is always hostile to us, be it where it may be. To-day it may act against France, to-morrow against us; and the better its commissary department is supplied, the more life and activity is communicated to all its motions. It is not, therefore, in our view, material whether there be another distinct war in which our enemy is engaged or not; it is sufficient that his armies are everywhere our enemies, and every assistance offered to them must, directly, or indirectly, operate to our injury.

On the whole, the court are of opinion that the voyage, in which this vessel was engaged, was illicit, and inconsistent with the duties of neutrality, and that it is a very lenient administration of justice to confine the penalty to a mere denial of freight.³

dependent power, except in the treaties with Great Britain, they are excluded; but the only treaty now subsisting which contains a definition of contraband, is that of 1795 with Spain, which embraces the munitions of war only. The treaty of 1794 with Great Britain declares naval stores, with the exception of unwrought iron and fir planks, to be contraband, and liable to confiscation, and declares that when provisions and other articles, not generally contraband, shall become such according to the existing law of nations, they shall be entitled to pre-emption, with freight to the carrier. By the treaty negotiated in 1807, but not ratified, provisions were omitted in the list of contraband, and tar, and pitch (unless destined to a port of naval equipment) were added to the naval stores excepted in the treaty of 1794.

3.—As to the penalty for the carrying of contraband, see 3 Rob. 182, note (a). Freight and expenses are almost always refused by the British prize courts to a carrier of contraband. There is but one case in the books of an exception to this rule, which was of sail cloth carried to Amsterdam, the contraband being in a small quantity amongst a variety of other articles. 3 Rob., 91, The Neptunus. ed to admit of discussion. But to this rule there are many exceptions. If the neutral be guilty of fraudulent or unneutral conduct, or has interposed himself to assist the enemy in carrying on the war, he is justly deemed to have forfeited his title to freight. Hence, the carrying of contraband goods to the enemy; the engaging in the coasting or colonial trade of the enemy; the spoliation of papers, and the fraudulent suppression of enemy interests, have been held to affect the neutral with the forfeiture of freight, and in cases of a more flagrant character, such as carrying dispatches or hostile military passengers, an engagement in the transport service of the enemy, and a breach of blockade, the penalty of confiscation of the vessel has also been inflicted.¹ By the modern 388 law of nations, provisions are not, in general, deemed contraband; but they may become so, although the property of a neutral, on account of the particular situation of the war, or on account of their destination.² If destined for the ordinary use of life in the enemy's country they are not, in general, contraband; but it is otherwise if destined for military use. Hence, if destined for the army or navy of the enemy, or for his ports of naval or military equipment, they are deemed contraband.³ Another exception from being treated as contraband is, where the provisions are the growth of the neutral exporting country. But if they be the growth of the enemy's country, and more especially if the property of his subjects, and destined for enemy's use, there does not seem any good reason for the exemption; for, as Sir William Scott has observed, in such case the party has not only gone out of his way for the supply of the enemy, but he has assisted him by taking off his surplus commodities. But it is argued that the doctrine of contraband cannot apply to the present case, because the destination was to a neutral country; and it is certainly true that goods destined for the use of a neutral country can never be deemed contraband, whatever may be their character, or how ever well adapted to warlike purposes. But if such goods are destined for the direct and avowed use of the enemy's army or [*38' navy, we should be glad to see an authority which countenances this exemption from forfeiture, even though the property of a neutral. Suppose, in time of war, a British fleet was lying in a neutral port, would it be lawful for a neutral to carry provisions or munitions of war thither, avowedly for the exclusive supply of such fleet? Would it not be a direct aid to the enemy in his hostile preparations? In such case the goods, even if belonging to a neutral, would have had the taint of contraband; of most offensive character, on account of their destination; and the mere interposition of a neutral port would not protect them from forfeiture.⁵ Strictly speaking, however, it is not a question of contraband; for that can arise only when the property belongs to a neutral, and here the property belonged to an enemy, and, therefore, was liable in all events, to condemnation. But was it lawful, and such as a neutral could do in good faith, and without a forfeiture, to engage in the transport service, or in the conveyance of military persons in his em,

5.—Articles which are exclusively useful for warlike purposes, are always contraband, when destined for the enemy; those of promiscuous use, in war and in peace, only become so under particular circumstances. Grotius, de J. B. ac P. l. 3, c. 1, s. 5; Vattel, l. 3, c. 7, s. 112. Among the latter class are included naval stores and provisions; though Vattel considers naval stores as always contraband, whilst he holds that provisions only become so under peculiar circumstances. "Les choses qui sont d'un usage particulier pour la guerre, et dont on empêche le transport chez l'ennemi s'appellent marchandises de contrebande. Telles sont les armes, les munitions de guerre, les bois, et tout ce qui sert à la construction, et à l'armement des vaisseaux de guerre, les chevaux, et les vivres mêmes en certaines occasions, ou l'on espère de réduire l'ennemi par la faim." But Bynkershoek reasons against admitting into the list of contraband, articles of promiscuous use, and the materials out of which warlike articles are formed. 2 J. Pub. l. 1, c. 10. He, however, states that materials for building ships may be prohibited under certain circumstances. "Quandoque tamen accidit, ut et navium materia prohibeatur, si hostis ea quam maxime indigeat, et absque ea commode bellum gerere haud possit. Quum Ordines Generales in s. 2, edicti contra Lysitanos Dec. 31, 1657, his, quae communis populorum usu contrabanda consentur, Lysitanos juvari vetuissent, specialiter addunt in s. 3, ejusdem edicti, quia nihil nisi mari a Lysitanis metuebant, ne quis etiam navium materiam his advehere vellet, palam sic navium a contrabandis distincta, sed ob specialem rationem addita. Ob eandem causam navium materia conjungitur cum instrumentis belli in s. 2, d. Edicti contra Dec. 5, 1652, et in Edicto Ordinum contra Francos 9, Mart. 1689. Sed sunt rationes, quae regulam confirmant." So provisions, they are not, in general, contraband, if the produce of an enemy's country, destined for the ordinary sustenance of life, but for military or naval use, they are contraband, according to the law of Europe. Articles, the growth of the neutral exporting country, are not contraband, though carried on the vessels of another country. 4 Rob. 161. And the benefit of the principle is maritime countries exporting the produce of their interior districts, whose ports and countries are usually employed in the ordinary course of their trade. Evert. But the law of France and Holland consider provisions as contraband. de la Marine, l. 3, tit. 9, des Prises, brevé sobre las Presas, part 1, c. 10. Valin states that, both by the law of nations, provisions are contraband only when destined to besiege places. But he asserts that naval stores are contraband at the time he wrote (1758) so since the beginning of that century were not formerly. Sur'l' Ord. II mentioning on the same article of the law, serves: "A l'égard des munitions de guerre, des puissances neutres envoyées, elles ne sont point censées contrabandes, par conséquent sujettes à confiscation, dans un seul cas, qui est lorsqu'elles sont destinées à une place assiégée ou bloquée." 104. By the Swedish ordinance of 1659 (provided for the subsistence of the army), contains a long list of contraband, among which are included naval stores. The modern conventions generally excluded provisions from the list of contraband, and this was made by the United States since justed. On the one hand, the general government must cease to exist whenever it loses the power of protecting itself in the exercise of its constitutional powers. Force, which acts upon the physical powers of man, or judicial process, which addresses itself to his moral principles or his fears, are the only means to which governments can resort in the exercise of their authority. The former is happily unknown to the genius of our constitution, except as far as it shall be sanctioned by the latter; but let the latter be obstructed in its progress by an opposition which it cannot overcome or put by, and the resort must be to the former, or government is no more.

On the other hand, so firmly am I persuaded that the American people can no longer enjoy the blessings of a free government, whenever the state sovereignties shall be prostrated at the feet of the general government, nor the proud consciousness of equality and security, any longer than the independence of judicial power shall be maintained consecrated and intangible, that I could borrow the language of a celebrated orator, and exclaim: "I rejoice that Virginia has resisted."

Yet here I must claim the privilege of ex-
364*] pressing *my regret that the opposition of the high and truly respected tribunal of that state had not been marked with a little more moderation. The only point necessary to be decided in the case then before them was, "whether they were bound to obey the mandate emanating from this court." But in the judgment entered on their minutes, they have affirmed that the case was, in this court, coram non judice, or, in other words, that this court had not jurisdiction over it.

This is assuming a truly alarming latitude of judicial power. Where is it to end? It is an acknowledged principle of, I believe, every court in the world, that not only the decisions, but everything done under the judicial process of courts, not having jurisdiction, are, ipso facto, void. Are, then, the judgments of this court to be reviewed in every court of the Union? and is every recovery of money, every change of property, that has taken place under our process, to be considered as null, void, and tortious?

We pretend not to more infallibility than other courts composed of the same frail materials which compose this. It would be the height of affectation to close our minds upon the recollection that we have been extracted from the same seminaries in which originated the learned men who preside over the state tribunals. But there is one claim which we can with confidence assert in our own name upon those tribunals—the profound, uniform, and unaffected respect which this court has always exhibited for state decisions, give us strong pretensions to judicial comity. And another claim I may assert, in the name of the American people; in this court, every state in the 365] Union is represented; we are constituted by the voice of the Union, and when decisions take place, which nothing but a spirit to give ground and harmonize can reconcile, ours is the superior claim upon the comity of the state tribunals. It is the nature of the human mind to press a favorite hypothesis too far, but magnanimity will always be ready to sacrifice the pride of opinion to public welfare.

In the case before us, the collision has been, on our part, wholly unsolicited. The exercise of this appellate jurisdiction over the state decisions has long been acquiesced in, and when the writ of error, in this case, was allowed by the president of the Court of Appeals of Virginia, we were sanctioned in supposing that we were to meet with the same acquiescence there. Had that court refused to grant the writ in the first instance, or had the question of jurisdiction, or on the mode of exercising jurisdiction, been made here originally, we should have been put on our guard, and might have so modeled the process of the court as to strip it of the offensive form of a mandate. In this case it might have been brought down to what probably the 25th section of the judiciary act meant it should be, to wit, an alternative judgment, either that the state court may finally proceed, at its option, to carry into effect the judgment of this court, or, if it declined doing so, that then this court would proceed itself to execute it. The language, sense, and operation of the 25th section on this subject, merit particular attention. In the preceding section, which has relation to causes brought up by writ of error from the circuit courts *of the [366 United States, this court is instructed not to issue executions, but to send a special mandate to the Circuit Court to award execution thereupon. In case of the Circuit Court's refusal to obey such mandate, there could be no doubt as to the ulterior measures; compulsory process might, unquestionably, be resorted to. Nor, indeed, was there any reason to suppose that they ever would refuse; and, therefore, there is no provision made for authorizing this court to execute its own judgment in cases of that description. But not so in cases brought up from the state courts; the framers of that law plainly foresaw that the state courts might refuse; and not being willing to leave ground for the implication, that compulsory process must be resorted to, because no specific provision was made, they have provided the means, by authorizing this court, in case of reversal of the state decision, to execute its own judgment. In case of reversal only was this necessary; for, in case of affirmance, this collision could not arise. It is true that the words of this section are, that this court may, in their discretion, proceed to execute its own judgment. But these words were very properly put in, that it might not be made imperative upon this court to proceed indiscriminately in this way; as it could only be necessary in case of the refusal of the state courts; and this idea is fully confirmed by the words of the 13th section, which restrict this court in issuing the writ of mandamus, so as to confine it expressly to those courts which are constituted by the United States.

*In this point of view the legislature [*367 is completely vindicated from all intention to violate the independence of the state judiciaries. Nor can this court, with any more correctness, have imputed to it similar intentions. The form of the mandate issued in this case is that known to appellate tribunals, and used in the ordinary cases of writs of error from the courts of the United States. It will, perhaps, not be too much, in such cases, to expect of those who are conversant in the forms, fictions, and technicality of the law, not to give the process of courts too literal a construction. They should be considered with a view to the ends they are intended to answer, and the law and practice in which they originate. In this view, the mandate was no more than a mode of submitting to that court the option which the 25th section holds out to them.

Had the decision of the court of Virginia been confined to the point of their legal obligation to carry the judgment of this court into effect, I should have thought it unnecessary to make any further observations in this cause. But we are called upon to vindicate our general revising power, and its due exercise in this particular case.

Here, that I may not be charged with arguing upon a hypothetical case, it is necessary to ascertain what the real question is which this court is now called to decide on.

In doing this, it is necessary to do what, although, in the abstract, of very questionable propriety, appears to be generally acquiesced in, to wit, to review the case as it originally came 368 up to this court *on the former writ of error. The cause, then, came up upon a case stated between the parties, and under the practice of that state, having the effect of a special verdict. The case stated brings into view the treaty of peace with Great Britain, and then proceeds to present the various laws of Virginia, and the facts upon which the parties found their respective titles. It then presents no particular question, but refers generally to the law arising out of the case. The original decision was obtained prior to the treaty of 1794, but before the case was adjudicated in this court, the treaty of 1794 had been concluded.

The difficulties of the case arise under the construction of the 25th section above alluded to, which, as far as it relates to this case, is in these words: "A final judgment or decree in any suit, in the highest court of law or equity of a state in which a decision in the suit could be had," "where is drawn in question the construction of any clause of the constitution or of a treaty," "and the decision is against the title set up or claimed by either party under such clause, may be re-examined and reversed, or affirmed." "But no other error shall be assigned or regarded as a ground of reversal in any such case as aforesaid, than such as appears on the face of the record, and immediately respects the before-mentioned questions of validity or construction of the said treaties," &c.

The first point decided under this state of the case was, that the judgment being a part of the record, if that judgment was not such as, upon that case, it ought to have been, it was an error 369 apparent on the *face of the record. But it was contended that the case there stated presented a number of points upon which the decision below may have been founded, and that it did not, therefore, necessarily appear to have been an error immediately respecting a question on the construction of a treaty. But the court held, that as the reference was general to the law arising out of the case, if one question arose, which called for the construction of a treaty, and the decision negatived the right set up under it, this court will reverse that decision, and that it is the duty of the party who would avoid the inconvenience of this principle, so to mould the case as to obviate the ambiguity. And under this point arises the question whether this court can inquire into the title of the party, or whether they are so restricted in their judicial powers as to be confined to decide on the operation of a treaty upon a title previously ascertained to exist.

If there is any one point in the case on which an opinion may be given with confidence, it is this, whether we consider the letter of the statute, or the spirit, intent, or meaning, of the constitution and of the legislature, as expressed in the 27th section, it is equally clear that the title is the primary object to which the attention of the court is called in every such case. The words are, "and the decision be against the title," so set up, not against the construction of the treaty contended for by the party setting up the title. And how could it be otherwise? The title may exist, notwithstanding the decision of the state courts to the contrary; and in that case the *party is entitled to the [*370] benefits intended to be secured by the treaty. The decision to his prejudice may have been the result of those very errors, partialities, or defects in state jurisprudence against which the constitution intended to protect the individual. And if the contrary doctrine be assumed, what is the consequence? This court may then be called upon to decide on a mere hypothetical case—to give a construction to a treaty without first deciding whether there was any interest on which that treaty, whatever be its proper construction, would operate. This difficulty was felt, and weighed in the case of Smith and the State of Maryland, and that decision was founded upon the idea that this court was not thus restricted.

But another difficulty presented itself: The treaty of 1794 had become the supreme law of the land since the judgment rendered in the court below. The defendant, who was at that time an alien, had now become confirmed in his rights under that treaty. This would have been no objection to the correctness of the original judgment. Were we, then, at liberty to notice that treaty in rendering the judgment of this court?

Having dissented from the opinion of this court in the original case, on the question of title, this difficulty did not present itself in my way in the view I then took of the case. But the majority of this court determined that, as a public law, the treaty was a part of the law of every case depending in this court; that, as such, it was not necessary that it should be spread upon the record, and that it was obligatory upon *this court, in rendering judgment [*371] upon this writ of error, notwithstanding the original judgment may have been otherwise unimpeachable. And to this opinion I yielded my hearty consent; for it cannot be maintained that this court is bound to give a judgment unlawful at the time of rendering it, in consideration that the same judgment would have been lawful at any prior time. What judgment can now be lawfully rendered between the parties is the question to which the attention of the court is called. And if the law which sanctioned the original judgment expire, pending an appeal, this court has repeatedly reversed the judgment below, although rendered whilst the law existed. So, too, if the plaintiff in error die, pending suit, and his land descend on an alien, it cannot be contended that this court will maintain the suit in right of the judgment, in favor of his ancestor, notwithstanding his present disability.

It must here be recollected that this is an action of ejectment. If the term formerly declared upon expires pending the action, the court will permit the plaintiff to amend, by extending the term. Why? Because, although the right may have been in him at the commencement of the suit, it has ceased before judgment, and without this amendment he could not have judgment. But suppose the suit were really instituted to obtain possession of a leasehold, and the lease expire before judgment, would the court permit the party to amend in opposition to the right of the case? On the contrary, if the term formerly declared on were more extensive than the lease in which the legal title was founded, could they give judgment for more than costs? It must be recollected that, under this judgment, a writ of restitution is the fruit of the law. This, in its very nature, has relation to, and must be founded upon, a present existing right at the time of judgment. And whatever be the cause which takes this right away, the remedy must, in the reason and nature of things, fall with it.

When all these incidental points are disposed of, we find the question finally reduced to this:

Does the judicial power of the United States extend to the revision of decisions of state courts, in cases arising under treaties? But, in order to generalize the question, and present it in the true form in which it presents itself in this case, we will inquire whether the constitution sanctions the exercise of a revising power over the decisions of state tribunals in those cases to which the judicial power of the United States extends.

And here it appears to me that the great difficulty is on the other side. That the real doubt is, whether the state tribunals can constitutionally exercise jurisdiction in any of the cases to which the judicial power of the United States extends.

Some cession of judicial power is contemplated by the third article of the constitution: that which is ceded can no longer be retained. In one of the circuit courts of the United States, it has been decided (with what correctness I will not say) that the cession of a power to pass an uniform act of bankruptcy, although not acted 373 on by the United States, deprives the states of the power of passing laws to that effect. With regard to the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, it would be difficult to prove that the states could resume it, if the United States should abolish the courts vested with that jurisdiction; yet, it is blended with the other cases of jurisdiction, in the second section of the third article, and ceded in the same words. But it is contended that the second section of the third article contains no express cession of jurisdiction; that it only vests a power in Congress to assume jurisdiction to the extent therein expressed. And under this head arose the discussion on the construction proper to be given to that article.

On this part of the case I shall not pause long. The rules of construction, where the nature of the instrument is ascertained, are familiar to everyone. To me the constitution appears, in every line of it, to be a contract, which, in legal language, may be denominated tripartite. The parties are the people, the states, and the United States. It is returning in a circle to contend that it professes to be the exclusive act of the people, for what have the people done but to form this compact? That the states are recognized as parties to it is evident from various passages, and particularly that in which the United States guaranty to each state a republican form of government.

The security and happiness of the whole was the object, and, to prevent dissention and collision, each surrendered those powers which might make them dangerous to each other. Well aware of the sensitive irritability [*374] of sovereign states, where their wills or interests clash, they placed themselves, with regard to each other, on the footing of sovereigns upon the ocean; where power is mutually conceded to act upon the individual, but the national vessel must remain unviolated. And to remove all ground for jealousy and complaint, they relinquish the privilege of being any longer the exclusive arbiters of their own justice, where the rights of others come in question, or the great interests of the whole may be affected by those feelings, partialities, or prejudices, which they meant to put down forever.

Nor shall I enter into a minute discussion on the meaning of the language on this section. I have seldom found much good result from hypercritical severity, in examining the distinct force of words. Language is essentially defective in precision; more so than those are aware of who are not in the habit of subjecting it to philological analysis. In the case before us, for instance, a rigid construction might be made, which would annihilate the powers intended to be ceded. The words are, "shall extend to;" now, that which extends to, does not necessarily include in, so that the circle may enlarge until it reaches the objects that limit it, and yet not take them in. But the plain and obvious sense and meaning of the word shall, in this sentence, is in the future sense, and has nothing imperative in it. The language of the framers of the constitution is: "We are about forming a general government—when that government is formed, its powers shall extend," &c. I therefore see nothing imperative in this clause, and certainly it would [*375] have been very unnecessary to use the word in that sense; for, as there was no controlling power constituted, it would only, if used in an imperative sense, have imposed a moral obligation to act. But the same result arises from using it in a future sense, and the constitution everywhere assumes, as a postulate, that wherever power is given it will be used, or, at least, used as far as the interests of the American people require it, if not from the natural proneness of man to the exercise of power, at least from a sense of duty, and the obligation of an oath.

Nor can I see any difference in the effect of the words used in this section, as to the scope of the jurisdiction of the United States courts over the cases of the first and second description, comprised in that section. "Shall extend to controversies," appears to me as comprehensive in effect as "shall extend to all cases."

Wheat. 1.

For, if the judicial power extend "to controversies between citizen and alien," &c., to what controversies of that description does it not extend? If no case can be pointed out which is excepted, it then extends to all controversies.

But I will assume the construction as a sound one, that the cession of power to the general government means no more than that they may assume the exercise of it whenever they think it advisable. It is clear that Congress have hitherto acted under that impression, and my own opinion is in favor of its correctness. But does it not then follow that the jurisdiction of the state court, within the range ceded to the general government, is permitted, and 376 may be withdrawn whenever Congress think proper to do so? As it is a principle that every one may renounce a right introduced for his benefit, we will admit that as Congress have not assumed such jurisdiction, the state courts may, constitutionally, exercise jurisdiction in such cases. Yet, surely, the general power to withdraw the exercise of it includes in it the right to modify, limit, and restrain that exercise. "This is my domain, put not your foot upon it; if you do, you are subject to my laws, I have a right to exclude you altogether; I have, then, a right to prescribe the terms of your admission to a participation. As long as you conform to my laws, participate in peace, but I reserve to myself the right of judging how far your acts are conformable to my laws." Analogy, then, to the ordinary exercise of sovereign authority, would sustain the exercise of this controlling or revising power.

But it is argued that a power to assume jurisdiction to the constitutional extent, does not necessarily carry with it a right to exercise appellate power over the state tribunals.

This is a momentous question, and one on which I shall reserve myself uncommitted for each particular case as it shall occur. It is enough, at present, to have shown that Congress has not asserted, and this court has not attempted, to exercise that kind of authority in personam over the state courts which would place them in the relation of an inferior responsible body without their own acquiescence. And I have too much confidence in the state tribunals to believe that a case ever will occur 377 in which it will be necessary for the general government to assume a controlling power over these tribunals. But is it difficult to suppose a case which will call loudly for some remedy or restraint? Suppose a foreign minister, or an officer, acting regularly under authority from the United States, seized to-day, tried to-morrow, and hurried the next day to execution. Such cases may occur, and have occurred, in other countries. The angry vindictive passions of men have too often made their way into judicial tribunals, and we cannot hope forever to escape their baleful influence. In the case supposed, there ought to be a power somewhere to restrain or punish, or the Union must be dissolved. At present the uncontrollable exercise of criminal jurisdiction is most securely confided to the state tribunals. The courts of the United States are vested with no power to scrutinize into the proceedings of the state courts in criminal cases; on the contrary, the general government has, in more than one instance, exhibited their confidence, by a wish to vest them with the execution of their own penal law. And extreme, indeed, I flatter myself, must be the case in which the general government could ever be induced to assert this right. If ever such a case should occur, it will be time enough to decide upon their constitutional power to do so.

But we know that by the 3d article of the constitution, judicial power, to a certain extent, is vested in the general government, and that by the same instrument power is given to pass all laws necessary to carry into effect the provisions of the constitution. At present it is only necessary to vindicate the laws which [*378] they have passed affecting civil cases pending in state tribunals.

In legislating on this subject, Congress, in the true spirit of the constitution, have proposed to secure to everyone the full benefit of the constitution, without forcing anyone necessarily into the courts of the United States. With this view, in one class of cases, they have not taken away absolutely from the state courts all the cases to which their judicial power extends, but left it to the plaintiff to bring his action there originally, if he choose, or to the defendant to force the plaintiff into the courts of the United States where they have jurisdiction, and the former has instituted his suit in the state courts. In this case they have not made it legal for the defendant to plead to the jurisdiction; the effect of which would be to put an end to the plaintiff's suit, and oblige him, probably at great risk or expense, to institute a new action; but the act has given him a right to obtain an order for a removal, on a petition to the state court, upon which the cause, with all its existing advantages, is transferred to the Circuit Court of the United States. This, I presume, can be subject to no objection; as the legislature has an unquestionable right to make the ground of removal a ground of plea to the jurisdiction, and the court must then do no more than it is now called upon to do, to wit, give an order or a judgment, or call it what we will, in favor of that defendant. And so far from asserting the inferiority of the state tribunal, this act is rather that of a superior, inasmuch as the Circuit Court of the United States becomes bound, by that order, to take jurisdiction of [*379] the case. This method, so much more unlikely to affect official delicacy than that which is resorted to in the other class of cases, might, perhaps, have been more happily applied to all the cases which the legislature thought it advisable to remove from the state courts. But the other class of cases, in which the present is included, was proposed to be provided for in a different manner. And here, again, the legislature of the Union evince their confidence in the state tribunals; for they do not attempt to give original cognizance to their own circuit courts of such cases, or to remove them by petition and order; but still believing that their decisions will be generally satisfactory, a writ of error is not given immediately as a question within the jurisdiction of the United States shall occur, but only in case the decision shall finally, in the court of the last resort, be against the title set up under the constitution, treaty, &c.

In this act I can see nothing which amounts to an assertion of the inferiority or dependence of the state tribunals. The presiding judge of the State Court is himself authorized to issue the writ of error, if he will, and thus give jurisdiction to the Supreme Court; and if he thinks proper to decline it, no compulsory process is provided by law to oblige him. The party who imagines himself aggrieved is then at liberty to apply to a judge of the United States, who issues the writ of error, which (whatever the form) is, in substance, no more than a mode of compelling the opposite party to appear before this court, and maintain the legality of his judgment obtained before the 380 state tribunal. An exemplification of a record is the common property of everyone who chooses to apply and pay for it, and thus the case and the parties are brought before us; and so far is the court itself from being brought under the revising power of this court that nothing but the case, as presented by the record and pleadings of the parties, is considered, and the opinions of the court are never resorted to unless for the purpose of assisting this court in forming their own opinions.

The absolute necessity that there was for Congress to exercise something of a revising power over cases and parties in the state courts, will appear from this consideration.

Suppose the whole extent of the judicial power of the United States vested in their own courts, yet such a provision would not answer all the ends of the constitution, for two reasons:

1st. Although the plaintiff may, in such case, have the full benefit of the constitution extended to him, yet the defendant would not; as the plaintiff might force him into the court of the state at his election.

2d. Supposing it possible so to legislate as to give the courts of the United States original jurisdiction in all cases arising under the constitution, laws, &c., in the words of the 2d section of the 3d article (a point on which I have some doubt, and which in time might, perhaps, under some quo minus fiction, or a willing construction, greatly accumulate the jurisdiction of those courts), yet a very large class of cases would remain unprovided for. Incidental questions would often arise, and as a court of 381 competent jurisdiction in the principal case must decide all such questions, whatever laws they arise under, endless might be the diversity of decisions throughout the Union upon the constitution, treaties and laws, of the United States; a subject on which the tranquillity of the Union, internally and externally, may materially depend.

I should feel the more hesitation in adopting the opinions which I express in this case were I not firmly convinced that they are practical, and may be acted upon without compromising the harmony of the Union, or bringing humility upon the state tribunals. God forbid that the judicial power in these states should ever, for a moment, even in its humblest departments, feel a doubt of its own independence. Whilst adjudicating on a subject which the laws of the country assign finally to the revising power of another tribunal, it can feel no such doubt. An anxiety to do justice is ever relieved by the knowledge that what we do is not final between the parties. And no sense of dependence can be felt from the knowledge that the parties, not the court, may be summoned before another tribunal. With this view, by means of laws, avoiding judgments obtained in the state courts in cases over which Congress has constitutionally assumed jurisdiction, and inflicting penalties on parties who shall contumaciously persist in infringing the constitutional rights of others—under a liberal extension of the writ of injunction and the habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, I flatter myself that the full extent of the constitutional revising power may be secured to the United States, and the *benefits of it to the individual, without [382 ever resorting to compulsory or restrictive process upon the state tribunals; a right which, I repeat again, Congress has not asserted; nor has this court asserted, nor does there appear any necessity for asserting.

The remaining points in the case being mere questions of practice, I shall make no remarks upon them.

Judgment affirmed.

THE COMMERCEN. LINDGREN, Claimant.

Provisions, neutral property, but the growth of the enemy's country, and destined for the supply of the enemy's military or naval forces, are contraband.

Provisions, neutral property, and the growth of a neutral country, destined for the general supply of human life in the enemy's country, are not contraband.

Freight is never due to the neutral carrier of contraband.

Quære, in what cases the vehicle of contraband is confiscable.

A neutral ship, laden with provisions, enemy's property, and the growth of the enemy's country, specially permitted to be exported for the supply of his forces, is not entitled to freight.

It makes no difference in such a case, that the enemy is carrying on a distinct war, in conjunction with his allies, who are friends of the captor's country, and that the provisions are intended for the supply of his troops engaged in that war, and that the ship in which they are transported belongs to subjects of one of those allies.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts. This was a case of a Swedish *vessel captured on the 16th [383 of April, 1814, by the private armed schooner Lawrence, on a voyage from Limerick, in Ireland, to Bilbao, in Spain. The cargo consisted of barley and oats, the property of British subjects, the exportation of which is generally prohibited by the British government; and, as well by the official papers of the custom-house as by the private letters of the shippers, it appears to have been shipped under the special permission of the government, for the sole use of His Britannic Majesty's forces then in Spain. Bonds were accordingly given for the fulfillment of this object. At the hearing in the District Court of Maine, the cargo was condemned as enemy's property, and the vessel restored with an allowance, among other things, of the freight for the voyage, according to the stipulation of the charter-party. The captors appealed from so much of the sentence as decreed freight to the neutral ship; and, upon the appeal to the Circuit Court of Massachusetts, the decree, as to freight, was reversed, and from this last sentence an appeal was prosecuted to this court.

Key, for the appellant and claimants. 1. The general principle of law allows freight to the neutral carrier of enemy's property. It is incumbent upon the captors to show that this case forms an exception to the rule, which they can only do by alleging this to be an unlawful interposition in the war between the United States and Great Britain; but an interposition in the Peninsular war, was not necessarily an interposition in the American war. Were it 384] *so, it would follow that the Spaniards and Swedes might not trade with the United States, they being the allies of Great Britain; as the prize courts of England decide, that the subjects of an ally cannot lawfully trade with the common enemy. Bynkershoek puts the case of two powers allied during a truce, but before enemies:¹ What would be the situation of neutrals? If they came to the assistance of either, they might be liable to be treated as enemies by the other. In the present instance, if the British forces had been so situated as that they might operate against the United States as well as France, it would alter the case. But remote and uncertain consequences cannot be held to affect the conduct of neutrals with illegality. 2. There is no proof or presumption that the master knew the special destination of the cargo. His act cannot be unlawful, unless done knowingly and willfully, as in the case of carrying enemy's dispatches, where Sir William Scott at first went entirely on the ground of the master's privity; afterwards he adopted a rule more strict and severe; but still knowledge was held to be necessary, and presumed wherever there was a want of extraordinary diligence on the part of the master. It is conceded that the onus is on the claimant to show his ignorance of the contents of the papers concerning the cargo, which, if the present testimony is not sufficient, may be done upon further proof. 385] STORY, J.* Ignorance of the master was not pretended in the court below.

Dexter, for the respondents and captors. The rule that the neutral carrier of enemy's property is entitled to freight, is a mitigated rule, and Bynkershoek argues with much force against its reasonableness.² But the master, in the present case, is not entitled to the benefit of it, having, by his conduct, made himself an enemy, pro hac vice. The principle; as to the nature of the Spanish war, was settled when the court determined that to carry goods to Lisbon, under a British license, was cause of confiscation. Can a party in a similar predicament be entitled to freight? Can a neutral stand on any better ground than a citizen? Either the British troops in the peninsula were enemies or friends. If enemies, this is an interposition which cannot be permitted to neutrals. Being at war, the British fleets and armies were hostile in every quarter of the globe. Where shall the line be drawn to mark when they became our enemies? At what period from the time of their landing in Portugal, until their crossing the Pyrenees, and embarking at Bordeaux for the United States? It is impossible to aid the operations of our enemy in any part of the world without strengthening his means of annoying us. The very men fed by this trade came here to fight us on our own soil, and to destroy our capital. It is said that this involves the consequence that we were at war *with [386 Spain and Portugal; but it depends upon the councils of every country to judge what acts of hostility shall render it expedient to make war; it depended on us to be at war with the allies of our declared enemy. It is a general rule that it is not unlawful to carry provisions to a neutral country; but if the enemy be there, and the articles are destined for his use, it is unlawful. The whole evidence shows that the master knew he was carrying provisions for the supply of the British forces, and his ignorance of the law is immaterial. But even if it were material, the inflated rate of freight shows that he was conscious of the risk he run.

Harper, in reply. The principle contended for by the captors is stricti juris, and extreme in its application to this particular case, where there is nothing like moral guilt in the conduct of the master, who did not intend to interfere in our distinct war. There is no adjudged case that comes up to this; and freight is refused from analogy to the general principle established by the British prize courts as to neutral interposition in the war. But an interference in the coasting and colonial, or other privileged trade of the enemy, and relief to him, is a direct assistance, and the rule cannot justly be extended to a remote and consequential aid not contemplated by the party. The license cases determined by this court, went on the ground of an adoption of the enemy character, and an incorporation with enemy interests; the case of The Liverpool Packet, determined by the same learned judge who tried this cause, shows the distinction *between this and the license [387 cases.³ The rule of the war of 1756, even supposing it to be well established, does not apply to the relative situation of Great Britain and the United States. The former had hung out no signals of depression and defeat in the peninsular war, and required no neutral aid as a relief from the pressure of her enemies.⁴

The single point now in controversy in this cause is, whether the ship is entitled to the freight for the voyage. The general rule that the neutral carrier of enemy's property is entitled to his freight, is now too firmly established to admit of discussion. But to this rule there are many exceptions. If the neutral be guilty of fraudulent or unneutral conduct, or has interposed himself to assist the enemy in carrying on the war, he is justly deemed to have forfeited his title to freight. Hence, the carrying of contraband goods to the enemy; the engaging in the coasting or colonial trade of the enemy; the spoliation of papers, and the fraudulent suppression of enemy interests, have been held to affect the neutral with the forfeiture of freight, and in cases of a more flagrant character, such as carrying dispatches or hostile military passengers, an engagement in the transport service of the enemy, and a breach of blockade, the penalty of confiscation of the vessel has also been inflicted.¹ By the modern 388 law of nations, provisions *are not, in general, deemed contraband; but they may become so, although the property of a neutral, on account of the particular situation of the war, or on account of their destination.² If destined for the ordinary use of life in the enemy's country they are not, in general, contraband; but it is otherwise if destined for military use. Hence, if destined for the army or navy of the enemy, or for his ports of naval or military equipment, they are deemed contraband.³ Another exception from being treated as contraband is, where the provisions are the growth of the neutral exporting country. But if they be the growth of the enemy's country, and more especially if the property of his subjects, and destined for enemy's use, there does not seem any good reason for the exemption; for, as Sir William Scott has observed, in such case the party has not only gone out of his way for the supply of the enemy, but he has assisted him by taking off his surplus commodities.⁴ But it is argued that the doctrine of contraband cannot apply to the present case, because the destination was to a neutral country; and it is certainly true that goods destined for the use of a neutral country can never be deemed contraband, whatever may be their character, or how-ever well adapted to warlike purposes. But if such goods are destined for the direct and *avowed use of the enemy's army or 389 navy, we should be glad to see an authority which countenances this exemption from forfeiture, even though the property of a neutral. Suppose, in time of war, a British fleet were lying in a neutral port, would it be lawful for a neutral to carry provisions or munitions of war thither, avowedly for the exclusive supply of such fleet? Would it not be a direct interposition in the war, and an essential aid to the enemy in his hostile preparations? In such a case the goods, even if belonging to a neutral, would have had the taint of contraband in its most offensive character, on account of their destination; and the mere interposition of a neutral port would not protect them from forfeiture.⁵ Strictly speaking, however, this is *not a question of contraband; for that 390 can arise only when the property belongs to a neutral, *and here the property belong- 391 ed to an enemy, and, therefore, was liable, at all events, to condemnation. But was the voyage lawful, and such as a neutral could, with good faith, and without a forfeiture, engage in? It has been solemnly adjudged that being engaged in the transport service, or in the conveyance of military persons in his employ, are

5.—Articles which are exclusively useful for warlike purposes, are always contraband, when destined for the enemy; those of promiscuous use, in war and in peace, only become so under particular circumstances. Grotius, de J. B. ac P. l. 3, c. 1, s. 5; Vattel, l. 3, c. 7, s. 112. Among the latter class are included naval stores and provisions; though Vattel considers naval stores as always contraband, whilst he holds that provisions only become so under peculiar circumstances. "Les choses qui sont d'un usage particulier pour la guerre, et dont on empêche le transport chez l'ennemi s'appellent marchandises de contrebande. Telles sont les armes, les munitions de guerre, les bois, et tout ce qui sert à la construction, et à l'armement des vaisseaux de guerre, les chevaux, et les vivres mêmes en certaines occasions, ou l'on espère de réduire l'ennemi par la faim." But Bynkershoek reasons against admitting into the list of contraband, articles of promiscuous use, and the materials out of which warlike articles are formed. 2 J. Pub. l. 1, c. 10. He, however, states that materials for building ships may be prohibited under certain circumstances. "Quandoque tamen accidit, ut et navium materia prohibeatur, si hostis ea quam maxime indigent, et absque ea commodè bellum gerere haud possit. Quum Ordines Generales in s. 2, edicti contra Lysitanos Dec. 31, 1657, his, quae communi populorum usu contrabanda censentur, Lysitanos juvari vetuissent, specialiter addunt in s. 3, ejusdem edicti, quia nihil nisi mari a Lysitanos metuebant, ne quis etiam navium materiam his advehere vellet, palam sic navium a contrabandis distincta, sed ob specialem rationem addita. Ob eandem causam navium materia conjungitur cum instrumentis belli in s. 2, d. Edicti contra Anglos Dec. 5, 1652, et in Edicto Ordinum Generalium contra Francos 9, Mart. 1689. Sed sunt haec exceptiones, quae regulam confirmant." So also of provisions, they are not, in general, contraband; but if the produce of an enemy's country, and not destined for the ordinary sustenance of human life, but for military or naval use, they become contraband, according to the law of England. And articles, the growth of the neutral exporting country, are not contraband, though carried in the vessels of another country. 4 Rob. 161, The Apollo. And the benefit of the principle is extended to maritime countries exporting the produce of neighboring interior districts, whose produce those countries are usually employed in exporting, in the ordinary course of their trade. Ib. 354, The Evert. But the law of France and Spain does not consider provisions as contraband. Ordonnance de la Marine, l. 3, tit. 9, des Prises, art. 11. D'Habreu sobre las Presas, part 1, c. 10, p. 136. And Valin states that, both by the law of France and the common law of nations, provisions are contraband only when destined to besieged or blockaded places. But he asserts that naval stores were contraband at the time he wrote (1758) and had been so since the beginning of that century, which they were not formerly. Surl' Ord. Ib. Pothier, commenting on the same article of the ordinance, observes: "A l'égard des munitions de bouche que des sujets des puissances neutres envoient à nos ennemis, elles ne sont point censées de contrebande, ni par conséquent sujettes à confiscation; sauf dans un seul cas, qui est lorsqu'elles sont envoyées à une place assiégée ou bloquée." De Propriété, No. 104. By the Swedish ordinance of 1715, contraband articles are declared to be those "qui peuvent être employées pour la guerre." The Danish ordinance of 1659 (provided for the subsisting war with Sweden), contains a long list of contraband articles, among which are included naval stores and provisions. The modern conventional law of nations has generally excluded provisions and naval stores from the list of contraband, and in all the treaties made by the United States since they were an in-acts of hostility which subject the property to confiscation.¹ And the carrying of dispatches from the colony to the mother country of the enemy has subjected the party to the like penalty.² And in these cases, the fact that the voyage was to a neutral port was not thought to change the character of the transaction. The principle of these determinations was asserted to be that the party must be deemed to place himself in the service of the hostile state, 392] and *assist in warding off the pressure of the war, or in favoring its offensive projects. Now, we cannot distinguish these cases, in principle, from that before the court. Here is a cargo of provisions exported from the enemy's country, with the avowed purpose of supplying the army of the enemy. Without this destination they would not have been permitted to be exported at all. Can a more important or essential service be performed in favor of the enemy? In what does it differ from the case of a transport in his service? The property, nominally, belongs to individuals, and is freighted, apparently, on private account, but, in reality, for public use, and under a public contract implied from the very permission of exportation. It is vain to contend that the direct effect of the voyage was not to aid the British hostilities against the United States. It might enable the enemy, indirectly, to operate with more vigor and promptitude against us, and increase his disposable force. But it is not the effect of the particular transaction that the law regards, it is the general tendency of such transactions to assist the military operations of the enemy, and the temptations which it presents to deviate from a strict neutrality. Nor do we perceive how the destination, to a neutral port, can vary the application of this rule; it is only doing that indirectly which is prohibited in direct courses. Would it be contended that a neutral might lawfully transport provisions for the British fleet and army while it lay at Bordeaux preparing for an expedition to the United States? Would it be contended that he might 393] lawfully supply a British *fleet stationed on our coast? We presume that two opinions could not be entertained on such questions; and yet, though the cases put are strong, we do not know that the assistance is more material than might be supplied under cover of a neutral destination like the present.

An attempt has been made to distinguish this case from the ordinary cases of employment in the transport service of the enemy, upon the ground that the war of Great Britain against France was a war distinct from that against the United States; and that Swedish subjects had a perfect right to assist the British arms in respect to the former, though not to the latter. Whatever might be the right of the Swedish sovereign, acting under his own authority, we are of opinion that if a Swedish vessel be engaged in the actual service of Great Britain, or in carrying stores for the exclusive use of the British armies, she must, to all intents and purposes, be deemed a British transport. It is perfectly immaterial in what particular enterprise those armies might, at the time, be engaged; for the same important benefits are conferred upon an enemy, who thereby acquires a greater disposable force to bring into action against us. In The Friendship (6 Rob., 420, 426), Sir W. Scott, speaking on this subject, declares: "It signifies nothing whether the men, so conveyed, are to be put into action, on an immediate expedition, or not. The mere shifting of draughts in detachments, and the conveyance of stores from one place to another, is an ordinary employment of a transport vessel, and it is a distinction totally unimportant *whether [394 this or that case may be connected with the immediate active service of the enemy. In removing forces from distant settlements, there may be no intention of immediate action, but still the general importance of having troops conveyed to places where it is convenient that they should be collected, either for present or future use, is what constitutes the object and employment of transport vessels." It is obvious that the learned judge did not deem it material to what places the stores might be destined; and it must be equally immaterial what is the immediate occupation of the enemy's military force. That force is always hostile to us, be it where it may be. To-day it may act against France, to-morrow against us; and the better its commissary department is supplied, the more life and activity is communicated to all its motions. It is not, therefore, in our view, material whether there be another distinct war in which our enemy is engaged or not; it is sufficient that his armies are everywhere our enemies, and every assistance offered to them must, directly, or indirectly, operate to our injury.

On the whole, the court are of opinion that the voyage, in which this vessel was engaged, was illicit, and inconsistent with the duties of neutrality, and that it is a very lenient administration of justice to confine the penalty to a mere denial of freight.³

dependent power, except in the treaties with Great Britain, they are excluded; but the only treaty now subsisting which contains a definition of contraband, is that of 1795 with Spain, which embraces the munitions of war only. The treaty of 1794 with Great Britain declares naval stores, with the exception of unwrought iron and fir planks, to be contraband, and liable to confiscation, and declares that when provisions and other articles, not generally contraband, shall become such according to the existing law of nations, they shall be entitled to pre-emption, with freight to the carrier. By the treaty negotiated in 1807, but not ratified, provisions were omitted in the list of contraband, and tar, and pitch (unless destined to a part of naval equipment) were added to the naval stores excepted in the treaty of 1794.

Tennessee was a part of that state, passed an act establishing the town of Nashville, and vesting 200 acres of land in trustees, to be laid off in lots, and sold, and conveyed in the manner prescribed by the act. On the 1st of July, 1784, subsequent to the passage of the act establishing the town, the trustees executed a deed regularly conveying the lot, for a moiety of which this suit was brought to Abednigo Lewellin. On the 1st of April, 1810, Shadrack Lewellin, heir at law of Abednigo, who had then attained his full age of twenty-one years, for seven years and upwards, executed a deed conveying the land in controversy to Francis May; after which, and previous to the institution of this suit, Francis May conveyed the same land to the lessor of the plaintiff. The defendant produced a deed dated the 2d of February, 1793, executed by a certain Josiah Love, and purporting to convey the land in controversy to William T. Lewis. It appeared in evidence that Lewis had purchased the land fairly, and paid a valuable consideration for it, and that at the time no person was in possession of it. Immediately after this conveyance, Lewis entered into, and took full possession of, the premises, made valuable improvements thereon, and continued so possessed until the 478*] 14th of February, 1810, when he sold and conveyed the same to William Easton, the defendant, who entered into and took possession, and continued peaceably possessed thereof, until the 12th of November, 1810, when this suit was instituted. Upon this testimony, the defendant's counsel moved the court to instruct the jury that the defendant was protected in his possession of the premises by the laws of the land, and that by virtue of the said laws the plaintiff was barred from recovering the said parcel of ground and premises. On this question the judges were divided in opinion, which question and division have been certified to this court as prescribed by law.

The evidence is not so stated on the record as to present any point for the consideration of this court, other than the question whether a possession of seven years is, in this case, a bar to the plaintiff's action. This question depends on the construction of an act of the legislature of Tennessee, passed in the year 1797, to explain an act of the legislature of North Carolina, passed in the year 1715.

The act of 1715, after affirming, in the first and second sections, certain irregular deeds, previously made, under which possession had been held for seven years, enacts, in the third section, "that no person, or persons, or their heirs, which hereafter shall have any right, or title, to any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, shall thereunto enter or make claim, but within seven years after his, her, or their right or title 479*] shall descend or accrue; and in *default thereof such person or persons so not entering or making default shall be utterly excluded and disabled from any entry or claim thereafter to be made." The fourth section contains the usual savings in favor of infants, &c., who are authorized within three years after their disabilities shall cease "to commence his or her suit, or make his or her entry." Persons beyond sea are allowed eight years after their return; "but that all possessions held without suing such claim as aforesaid, shall be a perpetual bar against all and all manner of persons whatever, that the expectation of heirs may not, in a short time, leave much land unpossessed, and titles so perplexed that no man will know from whom to take or buy land."

The judges and lawyers of the state of North Carolina have been much divided on the construction of this act; some maintaining that, like other acts of limitation, it protects mere naked possession; others, that the first and second sections (which are retrospective) have such an influence on the third and fourth (which are prospective) as to limit their operation to a possession acquired and held by color of title. This court is relieved from an investigation of these doubts by a case decided in the Supreme Court of North Carolina, in which it was finally determined that the act of 1715 afforded protection to those only who held by color of title. This contest was maintained as strenuously in Tennessee after its separation from North Carolina as in the present state. Anterior to the decision of the Supreme Court of North Carolina, which has been mentioned, *the legislature passed an act to settle [*480 "the true construction of the existing laws respecting seven years' possession," in which it is enacted, "that in all cases wherever any person, or persons, shall have had seven years' peaceable possession of any land, by virtue of a grant, or deed of conveyance founded upon a grant, and no legal claim by suit in law, by such, set up to said land, within the above term, that then, and in that case, the person, or persons, so holding possession as aforesaid, shall be entitled to hold possession in preference to all other claimants, such quantity of land as shall be specified in his, her, or their said grant, or deed of conveyance, founded on a grant as aforesaid." The act then proceeds to bar the claim of those who shall neglect, for the term of seven years, to avail themselves of any title they may have. As not unfrequently happens, this explanatory law generated as many doubts as the law it was intended to explain. On the one part it was contended, that being designed for the sole purpose of removing all uncertainty respecting the construction of the act of 1715, its provisions ought to be limited to its avowed object, and a doubt had never existed whether it was necessary for a person in possession to show more than a color of title, a deed acquired in good faith, in order to protect himself under that act; so, nothing farther ought to be required in order to enable him to avail himself of the act of 1797. That if it should be necessary to trace a title up to a grant, the act of 1797, instead of quieting possession, would, in process of time, strip a very long possession of that protecting *quality which the [*481 policy of all other countries bestowed upon it; that the act of 1797 was obviously drawn with so much carelessness as, in some of its parts, to exclude the possibility of a literal construction; and, for this reason, a more liberal construction would be admissible in order to effect its intent. It was therefore insisted not to be necessary for the defendant, holding possession under a bona fide conveyance of lands which had been actually granted, to deduce his title from the grant; but that it was sufficient to show that the land had been granted, and that he held a peaceable possession of seven years under a deed. On the other part it was contended, that on this point there is no ambiguity in the words of the act. The seven years' possession to be available, must be "by virtue of a grant, or of a deed founded on a grant." It is as essential that the deed should be founded on a grant as that a deed should exist. A possession of seven years does no more in the one case than in the other bar a legal title. The words of the act being perfectly clear, they must be understood in their natural sense. When confined to different deeds, founded on the same patent, or to deeds founded on different patents, for the same land, although some cases of fair possession may be excluded from their operation, yet they will apply to the great mass of cases arising in the country.

This question, too, has, at length, been decided in the Supreme Court of the state. Subsequent to the division of opinion on this question, in the Circuit Court, two cases have been 482 decided in the Supreme Court for the state of Tennessee, which have settled the construction of the act of 1797. It has been decided that a possession of seven years is a bar only when held "under a grant, or a deed founded on a grant." The deed must be connected with the grant. This court concurs in that opinion. A deed cannot be "founded on a grant" which gives a title not derived in law or equity from that grant; and the words founded on a grant are too important to be discarded. The act of assembly vesting lands in the trustees of the town of Nashville, is a grant of those lands, and as the defendant shows no title under the trustees, nor under any other grant, his possession of seven years cannot protect his title, nor bar that of the plaintiff. And this is to be certified to the Circuit Court for the District of West Tennessee.

[LOCAL LAW.]

ROSS AND MORRISON v. REED.

Where the plaintiff in ejectment claimed title to lands in the state of Tennessee, under a grant from said state, dated the 26th of April, 1809, founded on an entry made in the entry-taker's office, of Washington county, dated the 2d of January, 1779, in the name of J. M'Dowell, on which a warrant issued on the 17th of May, 1779, to the plaintiff, as the assignee of J. M'Dowell, and the defendants claimed under a grant from the state of North Carolina, dated 483 the 9th of August, 1787, it was determined that the prior entry might be attached to a junior grant so as to overreach an elder grant; and that a survey having been made, and a grant issued upon M'Dowell's entry, in the name of the plaintiff, calling him assignee of M'Dowell, was prima facie evidence that the entry was the plaintiff's property; and that a warrant is sufficiently certain to be sustained, if the objects called for are identified by the testimony, or unless the calls would equally well suit more than one place.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of East Tennessee.

the court below, claimed title under a grant from the state of Tennessee, bearing date the 26th day of April, 1809, founded on an entry made in the entry-taker's office of Washington county, No. 975, dated on the 2d day of January, 1779, in the name of John M'Dowell, for 500 acres of land, on which a warrant issued on the 17th day of May, 1779. The defendants in the court below, now plaintiffs in error, claim under a grant from the state of North Carolina to John Henderson, dated the 9th of August, 1787, and a deed of conveyance from John Henderson to the defendant, Ross, duly executed and registered. Morrison held as tenant under Ross.

At the trial of the cause, a bill of exceptions was taken by the defendants, in which was stated a transcript taken from the book procured from the office of the Secretary of State of the United States, which contains reports of the lands entered in Sullivan and Washington counties; also a copy of the warrant issued to John M'Dowell for 500 acres of land, both of which are certified by the clerk to the commissioner of East Tennessee. Also the grants under which each party claims*, the [*484] deed of conveyance from Henderson to Ross, together with the viva voce testimony of the witnesses produced. It then proceeds to state "that the defendants contended: 1st. That having the eldest grant, the plaintiff could not recover, unless he had shown a prior entry, which the law would consider special for the place now claimed, and produced satisfactory evidence that the right was vested in him. That as no proof had been given that Reed had ever purchased or paid any consideration for M'Dowell's entry, he could not, in virtue of that entry, entitle himself to a verdict. That the mere statement in the survey and grant that Reed was assignee of M'Dowell, was no evidence whatever of that fact. 2d. That if such proof had been given, still he could not recover, because the proof shows that the objects called for in the entry existed at two places, some distance from each other; and, therefore, the entry was ambiguous and doubtful. But the court charged and instructed the jury that the circumstance of a survey having been made, and a grant issued upon M'Dowell's entry, in the name of Reed, calling him assignee of M'Dowell, was prima facie evidence that the entry was the property of Reed. And that it was true if the calls in an entry would equally well suit more than one place, it would not be considered special for either place; but it was for the jury to determine, from the evidence whether the place spoken of on the south side of Holston would as well suit the calls of the entry as the one on the north side; and that, except for James King's testimony, he had hardly ever* heard an entry [*485] better established than the one now under consideration."

There was a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and the cause was brought up to this court by writ of error.

TODD, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is now objected by the plaintiffs in error that the transcript first mentioned contains nothing but a naked designation of number, date, person's name, and number of acres, but no description of the land whatever; not even specifying the county where situate.

To this objection it may be answered, that it is a fact, which will appear from the reports of cases decided in the courts of Tennessee, that the books containing entries for land in the counties of Sullivan and Washington have been lost or destroyed. It is also a fact that the original of the transcript under consideration was directed, by a statute of Tennessee, to be procured and deposited in the commissioner's office; and copies therefrom, certified by the clerk, are declared to be evidence in the courts of that state; but a conclusive answer is furnished by an examination of the bill of exceptions; it was not objected to in the court below.

The same answers may also be given to the objection taken to the copy of the warrant.

Under the laws of North Carolina for appropriating the vacant lands, an entry is made with the entry-taker before a warrant issues; 486*] the warrant describes *the land specified in the entry; the special or locative calls for appropriation of the land can be seen and examined as well from a view of the warrant as from the entry. In consequence of various frauds respecting warrants, they were by law to be submitted to a board of commissioners, and if decided to be valid, the original was deposited with the commissioner, and copies, certified by the clerk, were to be received in evidence. The copy of the warrant, in this case, corresponds with these regulations, and was properly received, nor was it objected to in the court below.

The practice in the courts of Tennessee, of attaching a prior entry to a junior grant, to overreach an elder grant in an action of ejectment, was brought into the view of, and recognized by, this court, in the case of Polk v. Hill et al.; it is, therefore, not now to be departed from.

The location in this case, upon the face of the warrant, appears to be sufficiently certain to be sustained, if the objects called for are identified by the testimony, or unless the calls would equally well suit more than one place. These were questions properly submitted to the jury; there was, therefore, no error in the charge and instruction given on this point. Nor was there error in the residue of the instruction. It is a general principle to presume that public officers act correctly until the contrary be shown. It must, therefore, be presumed that the officer, when he surveyed M'Dowell's entry, in Reed's name, had sufficient evidence produced to *satisfy [*487 him that Reed was the owner of it, and this presumption is increased by the act of another officer in issuing the grant; these circumstances furnished prima facie evidence, at least, that he was the owner.

Judgement affirmed.

[NOTE I.]

Extract from the Preface to Bibb's Reports of Cases in the Court of Appeals of Kentucky.

"The rules of landed property in Kentucky are, in an eminent degree, the creatures of the court—a species of judicial legislation. The disputes between claimants under the laws of Virginia have grown, principally, out of two requisitions in the statute of 1779. The one requiring of those claiming rights of settlement, or of pre-emption, to obtain certificates from the commissioners appointed for that purpose, mentioning the cause of the claim, the number of acres, and "describing, as near as may be, the particular location;" the other, requiring the holders of land warrants to lodge them with the surveyor, and in a book to be kept for that purpose, to "direct the location thereof so specially and precisely as that others may be enabled, with certainty, to locate warrants on the adjacent residuum." The text was short and novel; the commentary was left to the direction of the judges. The ancient depositories of the law gave but little light to guide the exercise of this discretion. The rules for construction of deeds gave some aid; but this was far short of what was wanted. For a time, unfettered by precedent, undirected by rule, each decision was but fact—multiplication of facts gave precedents, and precedents have grown into doctrine. The 490 statute requires, first, a description *of the particular tract, specially and precisely; that is to say, that the description shall apply, certainly, to one identical tract, and not uncertainly, or equally to two, or divers. Next, that this description shall enable others to find and know the identical tract intended. The statute intends the entry in the surveyor's book to be notice to all persons of the appropriation. The question arising out of the entry is, does it contain that description which was sufficient to operate as notice of an appropriation of a particular tract? This question is analyzed into the identity and notoriety of the objects referred to in the location. That is to say, the entry must contain proper allusion and reference to known and certain objects, which shall serve as indices to the particular tract of land intended to be appropriated.

"Identity is absolutely necessary in the investigation of every question of meum et tuum. The propriety of making identity one subject of inquiry in testing entries needs no explanation. But in deciding upon what description is sufficient to give identity, or individuality to the location, various rules have been established, whereby entries, apparently admitting of diversity of figures, have been helped, and rendered identical by construction. A location, "to include his cabin," in matters of fact, admits of divers surveys, each of which may inclose the cabin, and yet have not an acre in common. If the locator could take any one of these circumjacent tracts, as whim or fancy may direct, it is evident that, until this choice was made known by some act posterior to his entry, others could not know the adjacent residuum, nor appropriate it with certainty. But as matter of law, the courts have established as a rule, in such cases, that the survey shall be in a square, with lines due north or south, east and west, the cabin at the intersection of the diagonals. Thus (the quantity being expressed), when the particular cabin is ascertained, the location is reduced to mathematical certainty, appropriate to one precise identical tract. This is one example, among many, of which you will read in these reports.

"The identity of the tract, being ascertained, the inquiry is, whether the description was, at the date of the location, with the surveyor, sufficient to enable others to find and know it.

*"This branch of the subject has [491 called forth many decisions, and embraces the doctrine of notoriety, so frequently recurring in questions upon conflicting claims.

"This rule is, that the location must contain such expressions and allusions to objects, natural or artificial, as would enable others, using reasonable diligence of inquiry, to ascertain the particular tract intended to be appropriated. A reference to obscure objects, known to the locator only, without proper directions for finding them, could not satisfy the requisitions of the statute, although the figure of the land could be precisely described, if the beginning could be ascertained. For such reference to obscure objects, although it might enable the locator himself to appropriate the adjacent residuum, would not enable others to do it. This required reference to known objects, by their known appellations, or other distinguishing characteristics, is essential to every geographical description, and is founded in the very constitution of language, as the medium of communicating the ideas of one man to another. The geographer must draw his equator, and establish and make known his first meridian, before he can describe, intelligibly, the relative positions of the different parts of the earth, and of the countries he describes. The surveyor must have his first positions, from whence to take his bearings and distances, his latitude and departure. In language, the sign and the thing signified by articulate sounds must be agreed upon, and mutually made known, before men can converse intelligibly one with another. The substances must be pointed out, and the names repeated, before the child, or the foreigner, understands what we mean by land, water, and cabin. There is no natural connection between words and the ideas they are intended to stand for, otherwise there would be but one language among all men. But sounds, as the representatives of ideas, are of mere arbitrary imposition; therefore, language is properly defined 'a system of articulate sounds, significant by compact.' This compact is established by common consent, use, and custom, in every country. It is this established use, custom, and common consent, which makes names, words, and terms, mark and signify particular ideas. All men, therefore, who speak intelligibly *to others, must use words which stand for ideas, and employ those words according to their common use and acceptance in the language of the country. A man who would use three to signify eight would deceive his hearers. He who would speak to others of substances and objects by sounds never before used to signify those things, without any explanation to make known his meaning, would be guilty of an abuse of language, by uttering empty sounds, and nothing else. From known ideas, the mind may be conducted to the knowledge of things new, and before unknown. But from things unknown to attempt to describe things more unknown, so far from helping us to knowledge, serves only the more to perplex and bewilder the mind. A locator using words which stand for ideas in his own mind, but which do not convey the same ideas, or no certain ideas, to the mind of others, has not complied with the requisitions of the statute. Should he allude to a water-course only by a name unheard of by others, and arbitrarily imposed by himself, he does not write intelligibly to others. So, 'to include a tree in a forest, whereon he has marked the initials of his name,' may identify the land in his own mind, but does not communicate to others a competent idea of the intended appropriation. Locators must have reference to objects known to others by their usual names, or by terms in common use and acceptance, describe and make known the objects intended.

"Notoriety is either absolute or relative. Absolute, as where the object is known so generally that, according to the usual courtesies and intercourse among men, the presumption is irresistible that anyone using ordinary inquiry might have been conducted to the place, as Lexington, Bryant's Station, the Lower Blue Licks, &c. Relative, as where the particular object is not actually known, but is ascertainable by reasonable diligence—as one mile east of the Lower Blue Licks, &c.

"As the record in the books of entries is to have the effect of general notice to all holders of warrants, the entry must contain apt reference to objects known to the generality of persons acquainted in the neighborhood of the intended appropriation. Neither will the proof that the particular conflicting claimant had knowledge of the appropriation intended suffice to *help out an entry in a contro- [*493] versy with him, as is adjudged in several cases, and, as I think, very properly. 1st. That would be to make the entry valid as to some, and invalid as to others, as is more fully explained in Craig v. Pelham, Pr. Dec. 286-7. 2d. That would be to test the entry, not by the record, but by matters out of the scope of the record. 3d. It would put men's estates upon a tenure too slender and uncertain, without any sufficient safeguard against the perjury or mistakes of a solitary witness; whereas, evidence of notoriety being an appeal to general understanding and knowledge of the people of the neighborhood, is capable of being rebutted and disproved, if untrue, by calling upon other men who had equal opportunities of information on the subject. 4th. To admit proof that a particular person understood the entry, would be to test the signification and propriety of the language of the entry, not by the standard of general use and common acceptance, but by the particular ideas of two individuals.

"Notoriety must have been co-existent with the entry. The location, when made, if valid is to stand for notice of appropriation from that time. Words conveying to others no precise idea of appropriation, at the time used, because they were not conformable to objects then in existence; or, because the names and terms employed had not then been annexed, in common use and understanding of the neighborhood, to any individual object, being signs without anything signified, cannot, without abuse of language and of truth, be made to apply to after-made objects or after-acquired names. 'A enters for 400 acres, to include his cabin.' At the time he had no cabin, and, therefore, his entry was null, appropriating no land. One year afterwards A builds a cabin. Ought he to be permitted to hold land around it by virtue of his entry before the fact? If so, A has had one year to make his choice of the country. To suffer him to hold by relation to the time of his entry would be a fraud upon intermediate purchasers. To suffer him to hold against after purchasers, would be: 1st. To make the same entry valid and invalid; good against some persons, and null as to others, of which enough has been said before. 2d. To refer his claim, not to the truth of the recorded entry, but to mere occupancy. 3d. To make an act not valid in the *beginning, grow valid [*494] and legal in the lapse, which is contrary to a maxim in law. 'Quod ab initio non valet, in tractu temporis non conualescit.'" (Noy's Max. 9.) In illustration of the maxim, Noy putteth the case of A 'remainder limited to A, the son of A. B having no such son, and afterwards a son is born to him, whose name is A, during the particular estate,' the remainder is void, whether the entry alluded to objects not then existing, or employed names, or terms, not then standing for signs of the existing objects, or signs of ideas among the generality of those acquainted in the neighborhood, the reason is the same for denying validity to the entry by means of after notoriety. To test the entry by any other standard than the significance, or insignificance, of the words at its date, would produce an inconsistency and shifting of locations. Objects lose their old names, and acquire new ones. Names of streams are transposed in the progress of time, and of the settlement of the country. Upon the doctrine that after notoriety should apply to a previous entry, the identity and validity of entries would be referred, not to one uniform standard expressed in the face of each entry, but to perplexed and different standards, according to the dates of the entries happening to conflict. Thus the date of a subsequent conflicting entry would make a part of a prior entry, and affect its validity or invalidity."

[NOTE II.]

ON THE PRACTICE IN PRIZE CAUSES.

[IN SOME of the district courts of the United States (to which courts the exclusive jurisdiction in the first instance belongs) *great irregularities have crept into the practice in prize causes. These irregularities have been censured at the bar, and occasionally noticed, with expressions of regret, by the Supreme Court. It is hoped, therefore, that an attempt to sketch an outline of the regular practice of prize courts, in some of the more important particulars, may not be without use to the profession. This outline will be principally copied from the rules of the British courts, which, as far as cases have arisen to which they could apply, have been recognized and enforced by the Supreme Court of the United States; and, for the most part, are conformable with the prize practice of France, and other European countries, as will appear by a reference to the laws and treaties quoted in the margin. The letter of Sir William Scott and Sir John Nicholl, to Mr. Jay, written in September, 1794, which is printed in the appendix to Chitty's Law of Nations (American edition), and Wheaton on Captures, affords, as far as it goes, a very satisfactory and luminous view of the subject. Something more in detail, however, may be desirable to those who are not familiar with the admiralty practice.

As soon as a vessel or other thing captured as prize arrives in our ports, notice should be given thereof by the captors to the district judge, or to the commissioners appointed by him, that the examinations of the captured crew, who are brought in, may be regularly taken in writing, upon oath, in answer to the standing interrogatories. These are usually prepared under the direction of the district judge, and should contain sifting inquiries upon all points which can affect the question of prize. The standing interrogatories used in the English High Court of Admiralty (1 Rob., 381) have been drawn up with great care, precision and accuracy, and are an excellent model for other courts. They were generally adopted during the late war by the district judges in the principal states, with a few additions, and scarcely any variations. The examinations upon these interrogatories are rarely taken by the district judge in person, for in almost all the principal ports within his district he appoints standing commissioners for prize proceedings, upon whom this duty devolves.

It is also the duty of the prize-master to deliver up to the district judge all the papers and documents found on board, *and, at [*496 the same time, to make an affidavit that they are delivered up as taken, without fraud, addition, subduction, or embezzlement.¹

In general, the master and principal officers, and some of the crew of the captured vessel, should be brought in for examination. This is a settled rule of the prize courts, and was, during the late war, enforced by the express instructions of the president. The examination must be confined to persons on board at the time of the capture, unless the special permission of the court is obtained for the examination of others. (6 Rob., 185, The Eliza and Katy; 4 Rob., 43, 57, The Henrick and Maria.)² In order to guard as much as possible against [497] frauds *and misstatements from after

U. S., Book 4.

2.—Thus, in a treaty of amity and commerce between Charles VIII., King of France, and Henry VII., of England, concluded at Boulogne, the 24th of May, 1497, and which may be considered as evidence of the prize practice of Europe at that period, is contained the following article: "Simili quoque juramento solemniter prestando promittent, quod de qualibet præda, captura, manublis, sive spoliis, adducent duos aut tres viros in capto navi præcipuum locum obtinentes, ut magistrum, submagistrum, patronum, aut hujusmodi conditionis, quos Admiralo, Vice-Admiralo, aut eorum officialis exhibebunt, ut per eodem, aut eorum alterum, debite examinetur ubi super quibus, et qualiter, navis sive bona capta sint; nec facient aut contrivances, the examinations should take place as soon as possible after the arrival of the vessel, and the witnesses are not allowed to have communications with, or to be instructed by, counsel. The captors should also introduce all their witnesses in succession; for if the commissioners have taken the depositions of some of the crew, and transmitted them to the judge, they will not be at liberty, without a special order, to examine others who are afterwards brought by the captors before them. (2 Rob., 243, The Speculation.) On the other hand, an equal strictness is held over the conduct of the claimants. If they keep back any one of the captured crew for two or three days after the vessel comes into port, and then offer him, together with papers in his possession, the commissioners will be justified in not examining him. (1 Rob., 331. And see 4 Rob., 381, The William and Mary.) The ship's papers and other documents, found on board, which are not 498 delivered up to the district judge, or the commissioners, before, or at the time of, the examinations, will not be admitted as evidence. (Ibid.)

Although the examinations are to be on standing interrogatories, without the instructions of counsel, yet the witnesses are produced in the presence of the agents of the parties, before the commissioners, whose duty it is to superintend the regularity of the proceedings, and protect the witnesses from surprise or misrepresentation. When the deposition is taken, each sheet is afterwards read over to the witness, and separately signed by him. (5 Rob., 286, The Apollo.) And the commissioners should be careful that the various answers are taken fully and perfectly, so as to meet the stress of every question, and should not suffer the witness to evade a sifting inquiry, by vague and obscure statements. If the witness refuse to answer at all, or to answer fully, the commissioners are to certify the fact to the court, and, in addition to the other penal consequences to the owners of the ship and cargo from a suppression of evidence, he will be liable to close imprisonment for the contempt. The witnesses should be examined separately, and not in presence of each other, so as to prevent any fraudulent concert between them.

As soon as the examinations are completed, they are to be sealed up and directed to the proper District Court, together with all the ship's papers, which have not been already lodged by the captors in the registry of the court.

It is upon the ship's papers, and depositions thus taken and transmitted, that the cause is, in the first instance, to be heard and tried. (1 Rob., 1, The Vigilantia.)¹ This is not a mere *matter of practice or form: it is of the 499 very essence of the administration of prize law; and it is a great mistake to admit the common law notions, in respect to evidence, to prevail in proceedings which have no analogy to those at common law. In some few of the district courts it was not unusual, during the late war, to allow the witnesses to be examined, orally, at the bar of the court long after their preparatory examinations had been taken, and full opportunities had been given to enable the parties to shape any new defense, or explain away any asserted facts. This was, unquestionably, a great irregularity, and, in many instances, must have been attended with great public mischiefs. By the law of prize, the evidence to acquit or condemn must, in the first instance, come from the papers and crew of the captured vessel. The captors are not, unless under peculiar circumstances, entitled to adduce any extrinsic testimony. It is, therefore, of the last importance to preserve the most rigid exactness as to the admission of evidence, since temptations would otherwise be held out to the captured crew to defeat the just rights of the captors by subsequent contrivances, explanations, and frauds. There can be no honest reason why the whole truth should not be told by the captured persons at the first examination; and if they then prevaricate, or suppress important facts, it must be from motives which would materially impair the credibility of their subsequent statements. Where the justice of the case requires the admission of new evidence, that may always be obtained, except where, by the rules of law, or the misconduct of the parties, the right to further proof has been forfeited. But whether such further proof be necessary or admissible can never be ascertained until the cause has been fully heard upon the facts, and the law arising out of the facts already in evidence. And in the Supreme Court, during the whole of the late war, no further proof was ever admitted until the cause had been first heard upon the original evidence, although various applications were made to procure a relaxation of the rule. We shall have occasion hereafter to state some of the cases in which further proof is allowed or denied.

500*] *If a person wishes to procure the restitution of any property captured as prize, it is necessary that he should, after the prize libel is filed, and at, or before, the return of the monition thereon, or time assigned for the trial, enter his claim for such property before the proper court. And if the captors omit, or unreasonably delay to institute prize proceedings, any person claiming an interest in the captured property may obtain a monition against them, citing them to proceed to adjudication; which, if they omit to do, or show cause why the property should be condemned, it will be restored to the claimants proving an interest therein. And the same process is often resorted to where the property is lost or destroyed, through the fault or negligence of the captors, in order to obtain a compensation in damages for the unjust seizure and detention. (1 Rob., 93, The Betsey; 1 Rob., 181, The Mentor; 3 Rob., 239, The Huldah; Ib., 129, The Der Mohr; Ib., 212, The George; 4 Rob., 215, The William; 6 Rob., 48, The Susanna.) The claim should be made by the parties interested, if present, or, in their absence, by the master of the ship, or some agent of the owners. A mere stranger will not be permitted to interpose a claim merely to speculate on the chances of an acquittal.¹ The claim must be accompanied with an affidavit stating briefly the facts respecting the claim and its verity. This affidavit should be sworn to by the parties themselves if they are within the jurisdiction. But if they are absent from the country, or at a very great distance from the place where the court is held, the affidavit may be sworn to by an agent. Before a claim is made, and affidavit put in (which should always be special if the case stands on peculiar grounds), it is not permitted to the parties to examine the ship's papers, and the preparatory examinations in order to shape their claims; for 501*] this might lead to great abuses. *But if it be necessary to ascertain the particulars of a claim, the court will, upon a special application, suffer so many of the papers to be examined as directly relate to such claim; but a sufficient reason is always expected to be shown on affidavit to sustain such an application. (3 Rob., 233, The Port Mary.) It is a general rule that no claim is to be admitted which stands in entire opposition to the ship's papers and to the preparatory examinations. (5 Rob., 15, 19, The Vrouw Anna Catharina; 6 Rob., 1, La Flora.) But this only applies to cases arising during the war, and not to cases arising before the war. (5 Rob., 15, The Anna Catharina.) And it is not so inflexible as to exclude the interest of a citizen, or subject, where there is an absolute necessity to simulate papers, as in the case of a trade with the enemy licensed by the state. (6 Rob., 1, La Flora.) It is also a general principle that no citizen, or subject, can be admitted to claim in a prize court where the transaction in which he is engaged is in violation of the municipal laws of his own country. (2 Rob., 77, The Walsingham Packet; 4 Rob., 262, note, The Etrusco; 5 Rob., 23, The Cornelius and Maria; Ib., 251, The Abby; 6 Rob., 341, The Recovery.) Nor can a person be admitted to claim where the trade in which he is taken is forbidden by the law of nature, and by the municipal law of his own country, and that where the court is sitting. (Edinb. Review, vol. 16, No. 21, p. 426, The Amedie.) Nor can an enemy interpose a claim unless under the protection of a flag of truce, a cartel, license, pass, treaty, or some other act of the public authority suspending his hostile character. (1 Rob., 196, The Hoop.) And, even in the case where the capture has been made in violation of the territorial jurisdiction of a neutral country, the claim for restitution must be made, not by the enemy proprietor, but the neutral government. (5 Rob., 15, The Vrouw Anna Catharina; 3 Rob., 162, note.)

Where no claim is interposed, it is not now usual to condemn the goods for want of a claim, until a year and a day has elapsed from the time of the return of the monition, except in cases where there is a strong presumption, and reasonable proof, that the property actually belongs to an enemy. (1 Rob., 26, 29, The Stadt Embden. And see 4 Rob., 43, The Henrick and Maria, Coll. Mar. 88, note.) But after a year *and a day has elapsed, [502 condemnation goes of course, if there be no claim interposed.²

After a claim is once put in, it is not amendable of course; but if an amendment is wanted to correct the generality of the original claim, it will not be allowed unless a proper case is made out, and sufficient reasons given for the omission in the first instance. (3 Rob., 109, The Graaf Bernstoff. And see 3 Rob., 179, The Sally.)

It often happens that persons whose property has been captured apply to the court for a delivery upon bail, and under a mistaken notion that such a delivery, after an appraisement, was a matter of course, or was to be governed by the same rules as are prescribed in the case of municipal forfeitures under the act of the 2d of March, 1799, c. 128. Some of the district courts have allowed such applications before any hearing of the cause; and parties have thereby, sometimes, fraudulently obtained possession of goods at an under-valuation, where their title was totally defective, or grossly illegal. It is a settled rule of the prize court not to deliver a cargo on bail before the cause has been fully heard, unless by the consent of all parties; and if any inconvenience should result from this rule, as if the property be perishable, it may easily be avoided by an interlocutory sale. (3 Rob., 178, The Copenhagen.) After the hearing, if the claimant obtain a decree in his favor, or an order for further proof, the court will listen to an application for a delivery on bail; but if his claim be rejected, or be affected with the imputation of fraudulent 503 or unlawful conduct, *the application will not be allowed notwithstanding an appeal is interposed. Where there is a decree of condemnation the captors are, in general, entitled to a delivery of the property, or the proceeds thereof, upon bail.

On an appeal to the Circuit Court, the property follows the appeal into that court, and is no longer subject to the interlocutory orders of the District Court. It is otherwise with regard to the Supreme Court, whose decrees are always remanded to the Circuit Court for execution; and, therefore, the property always remains in the custody of the latter. In cases of delivery on bail, a stipulation, according to the course of the admiralty, and not a bond, should be taken. 504

*Where further proof is admissible, it may, in the discretion of the court, be by affidavits and other papers introduced without any formal allegations, or by way of plea and proof, where formal allegations are made by each party in the nature of special pleadings; and it may be opened to the claimants only, or to the captors as well as claimants. Upon a simple order for further proof, the captors are not entitled to adduce any new evidence, unless by the special direction of the court; but upon plea and proof, both parties are at liberty to introduce new evidence to support their respective allegations, and the points put in issue. (1 Rob., 313, The Adriana.)

The court is in no case concluded by the original evidence, but may order further proof on a doubt arising from any cause or quarter (6 Rob., 351, The Romeo); and it will sometimes direct it where suspicion is produced by extrinsic evidence. (Ib.) But this is rarely done, unless there be something in the original evidence which lays a suggestion for prosecuting the inquiry further. (3 Rob., 330, The Sarah.) And where the case is perfectly clear, and not liable to any just suspicion, the disposition of the court leans strongly against the introduction of extraneous matter, and against permitting the captors to enter upon further inquiry. (6 Rob., 351, The Romeo.)

The most ordinary cases of further proof are where the cause appears doubtful upon the original papers, and the answers to the standing interrogatories; and, in such cases, if the parties have conducted themselves with good faith, and the error or deficiency may be referred to honest ignorance or mistake, the court will indulge them with time to supply the defects by the introduction of new evidence. But further proof is, in no case, a matter of right, and rests in the sound discretion of the court. Further proof is in all cases necessary where the master does not swear to, or give any account of the property. (2 Rob., 1, The Eenroom. Ib., 121, The Juno; 4 Rob., 201, The Convenientia.) Where the shipment, though stated to be on neutral account, is not stated to be on account of any particular person. (4 Rob., 79, The Jonge Pieter.) Where the ship has been purchased in the enemy's country. (1 Rob., 122, The Welvaart.) Where there has been any loss or suppression of material papers (2 Rob., 361, The Polly); *and, indeed, in [*505] all cases where the defects of the papers, the conduct of the parties, the nature of the voyage, or the original evidence, in general, induces any doubt of the proprietary interest, the legality of the trade, or the integrity of the transactions. But it is not in every case where further proof is necessary that the parties will be permitted to introduce it; for the privilege may be forfeited by fraud or gross misconduct. And, in cases where further proof is necessary, if it is not allowed, the penal consequences are as fatal as if the property were originally hostile, since a condemnation certainly follows the denial. (1 Rob., 122, The Welvaart; Ib., 124, The Juffrow Anna; 3 Rob., 109, The Graaf Bernstoff; 2 Rob., 1, The Eenroom.) Further proof is never allowed to the claimants where fraudulent papers have been used. (1 Rob., 122, The Welvaart; Ib., 124, The Juffrow Anna; Ib., 126, The Juffrow Elbrecht.) Where there has been a spoliation of papers. (2 Rob., 104, The Rising Sun.) Where there has been a fraudulent covering or suppression of an enemy's interest. (3 Rob., 109, The Graaf Bernstoff.)¹ Where there is a false destination, and false papers. (3 Rob., 122, The Nancy; 6 Rob., 79, The Mars.) Nor in general, where the case appears incapable of fair explanation. (1 Rob., 163, The Vroo Hermina.) Or where 506*] there has been gross prevarication, or an attempt to impose spurious claims upon the court, or such a want of good faith as shows that the parties cannot safely be trusted with an order for further proof.

If, upon further proof ordered, no proof is adduced, or the proof be defective, or the parties refuse to swear, or swear evasively, it is deemed conclusive evidence of hostile interests, or of such misconduct as authorizes condemnation. And it is a general rule of the prize court that the onus probandi that the property is neutral rests upon the claimant; and if he fails to show it, condemnation ensues. (6 Rob., 77, The Walsingham Packet; Ib. 343, The Rosalie and Betty; 4 Rob., 283, The Countess of Lauderdale.)

In cases where further proof is admitted on behalf of the captors they may introduce papers taken on board of another ship, if they are properly verified by affidavit. (6 Rob., 351, The Romeo; 1 Rob., 340, The Maria.) And they may also invoke papers from another prize cause. (6 Rob., 350, The Romeo; 3 Rob., 330, The Sarah; 4 Rob., 166, The Vrienschap.) It has even been permitted to the captors to invoke the depositions of the claimant, given in another cause, to prove his domicile at the first hearing, and without an order for further proof. (4 Rob., 166, The Vrienschap.) And upon an order for further proof, the affidavits of the captors, as to facts within their own knowledge, are admissible evidence. (1 Rob., 340, The Maria; 6 Rob., 13, The Resolution.)

It is time to draw this note to a close, and in so doing, it is proper to inform the reader that, although authorities are cited to support some of the positions they will not always be found to support them in their full extent. Much of what is stated, as the general practice of prize courts, is to be gathered from lights scattered here and there in the books, and more frequently and accurately by attendance on the arguments of prize causes, where the points are discussed by counsel, or ruled incidentally by the court.

[*NOTE III.]

ON THE RULE OF THE WAR OF 1756.

The rule commonly called the rule of 1756, has acquired this denomination from its having been first judicially applied by the courts of prize in the war of that period. The French (then at war with Great Britain), finding the trade with their colonies almost entirely cut off by the maritime superiority of the British, relaxed their monopoly of that trade, and allowed the Dutch (then neutral) to carry on the trade between the mother country and her colonies, under special licenses, or passes, granted to Dutch ships for this special purpose, excluding, at the same time, all other neutrals from the same trade. Many Dutch vessels so employed were captured by the British cruisers, and, together with their cargoes, were condemned by the prize courts, upon the just and true principle that by such employment they were, in effect, incorporated into the French navigation, having adopted the character and trade of the enemy, and identified themselves with his interests and purposes. They were, in the opinion of these courts, to be considered like transports in the enemy's service, and hence liable to capture and condemnation, upon the same principle as property condemned by way of penalty for resistance to search, for breach of blockade, for carrying military persons or dispatches, or as contraband of war. In all these cases the property is considered, pro hac vice, as enemy's property, as so completely identified with his interests as to acquire a hostile character. So, where a neutral is engaged in a trade which is exclusively confined to the subjects of a country, in peace and in war, and is interdicted to all others, and cannot be avowedly carried on in the name of a foreigner, such a trade is considered so entirely national that it must follow the hostile situation of the country.¹ There is all *the difference between this [*508 principle and the modern British doctrine, which interdicts to neutrals, during war, all trade not open to them in time of peace, that there is between the granting by the enemy of special licenses to the subjects of the belligerent state, protecting their property from capture in a particular trade, which the policy of the enemy induces him to tolerate, and a general exemption

the colony to the mother country, where the trade is limited to native subjects, by the fundamental regulations of the state; and the national character is required to be established by oath, as in the case of the Spanish Register ships.

of such trade from capture. The former is clearly cause of confiscation, whilst the latter has no such effect.¹ The rule of the war of 1756 was founded upon the former principle, and likewise upon a construction of the treaties between Great Britain and Holland, in which, the former power contended, was conceded to the latter a freedom of commerce only as to her accustomed trade in time of peace. The rule lay dormant through the war of the American revolution; but was afterwards revived during the war of the French revolution, and extended to the prohibition of all neutral traffic whatsoever with the colonies, and upon the coasts of an enemy.

That this is a correct representation of the nature, origin, and subsequent application, of this celebrated rule of the British prize courts, will appear from its history.

It cannot be pretended that its origin can be traced, in judicial records, to an earlier source than that war from which it derives its name. It has, indeed, been attempted to seek, by the aid of historical lights, for earlier instances of the application of the rule. But it is evident that the property of the pretended neutrals, who, according to M. Arnold, were employed by the French administration to carry on the colonial trade during the war which ended with the peace of Utrecht, and that of 1744,² must have been condemned as enemy's property; because, 509*] *with all the advantages possessed by the advocates for the British doctrine of access to the records of the proceedings of the prize courts during those wars, no trace can be found in them of condemnations under the rule as applicable to the colonial trade, and because that trade was expressly adjudged to be lawful, by the Lords of Appeal, during the war of 1744.³ It has also been asserted that the treaty of 1668, renewed in 1674, between Great Britain and Holland, relaxed the primitive rigor of the law of nations in this particular, and that this relaxation was gradually extended by similar treaties to other nations.⁴ But this treaty was contended by Great Britain to be a declaration of the original and pre-existing law of nations on this subject; and the explanatory article signed on the 30th of December, 1675, was itself declaratory of the meaning of the treaty, and was drawn up at the request of the British minister, Sir William Temple.⁵ It is true, it contains a proviso, "that this declaration shall not be alleged by either party for matters which happened before the late peace, February, 1673-4." But, before that peace, the two parties were at war with one another, and could not claim the rights of neutrality against each other, and previous to that war they were at peace with all the world; so that this reservation could not imply that vessels had been recently drawn into judgment on a different understanding of the principle. Nor does the letter of Sir Leoline Jenkins, of the 6th of February, 1667, imply that at that time a vessel carrying enemy's goods between ports of an enemy was held liable to condemnation. It is admitted that the preceding letter of the Swedish resident adverted only to the circumstance of the vessel's having carried enemy's goods on her outward voyage as the ground on which she was seized on her return voyage; and it will be seen, by quoting the whole of Sir Leoline Jenkins's letter, that he does not lay any stress whatever on the circumstance of the former voyage being a coasting voyage: "The question which I am, in obedience to His Majesty's most gracious *pleasure, to answer unto, being [*510 a matter of fact, I thought it my duty not to rely wholly on my own memory or observation, but further to inquire of Sir Robert Wiseman, His Majesty's Advocate-General, Sir William Turner, His Royal Highness, the Lord High Admiral's Advocate; Mr. Alexander Check, His Majesty's Proctor; Mr. Roger How, principal actuary and register in the High Court of Admiralty in England, whether they, or any of them, had observed, or could call to mind, that, in the late war against the Dutch, any one ship, otherwise free, as belonging to some of His Majesty's allies, having carried goods belonging to His Majesty's enemies, from one enemy's port to another, and being seized after it had discharged the said goods, laden with the proceeds of that freight which it had carried, and received of the enemy upon the account of the ship's owners, had been adjudged prize to His Majesty; they all unanimously resolved that they had not observed, nor could call to mind, that any such judgment or condemnation ever passed in the said court; and to this, their testimony, I must, as far as my experience reaches, concur; and if my opinion be, as it seems to be, required, I do not, with submission to better judgment, know anything, either in the statutes of this realm or in His Majesty's declarations upon occasion of the late war, nor yet in the laws and customs of the seas, that can (supposing the property of the said proceeds to be bona fide vested in the ship-owners of His Majesty's allies) give sufficient ground for a condemnation in this case. And the said advocates, upon the debate I had with them, did declare themselves positively of the same opinion. Written with my hand this 6th day of February, 1667." So that there does not appear to be any doubt respecting the legality of the former voyage, but only whether the vessel with a return cargo, being the proceeds of the freight received from the enemy on the former voyage, could be condemned on the return voyage; which question was answered in the negative, provided the property had bona fide vested in the neutral ship-owners. Before the treaty of 1674 was concluded, foreign vessels were freely admitted into the coasting trade of France; and when Louis XIV. was making efforts to *es- [*511 tablish a nursery of seamen for his navy, and Colbert, under the influence of the commercial system of political economy, was endeavoring to appropriate to his own country some portion of the benefits of the carrying trade, which had been before almost entirely conducted, even from one French port to another, by the Dutch, they did not exclude foreign vessels from the coasting trade, but only imposed a tonnage of fifty sous upon the Dutch, and a crown upon Spanish and Flemish vessels.¹ A like discriminating duty was imposed upon foreign vessels entering French ports, in whatever commerce they might be engaged; so that there was as much reason to conclude that the whole trade of France was exclusively appropriated to her own shipping in time of peace as that the coasting trade was thus appropriated. This renders it the more improbable that the trade from one enemy's port to another should have been considered unlawful by the British prize courts, until the principle of adoption, or naturalization was applied, in the war of 1756, to the trade between the mother country and her colonies, from which neutrals were, in fact, excluded in time of peace. Neither that principle nor the more modern doctrine which confines the neutral to his accustomed peace trade could be applied to a commerce which the neutral might carry on in peace or war, upon payment of alien tonnage duties. According to Lord Liverpool, this discriminating duty of 50 sous was suspended during the war of 1756, in order to ward off the effects of the British superiority at sea;² and this might afford a pretext for applying the rule during that war to the coasting trade of France, as it would raise a presumption of enemy's interests in the foreign shipping, thus adopted into his navigation, with all the privileges of French-built ships. But such a presumption could never arise from neutral vessels entering the coasting trade, under the disadvantage of the discriminating duty; nor could the doctrine which confines the neutral to his accustomed peace trade be applied, *since it is admitted by Sir William Scott, in the case of The Immanuel, that the neutral has a right to push his accustomed trade to the utmost extent of which it is capable, but not to enter a new trade from which he was before wholly excluded.³

It is incredible that the freight only should have been forfeited in the wars of 1744, 1756 and 1778, as a mitigation of the primitive strictness of the rule, when we know that vessels engaged in the colonial trade, in the war of 1756, were confiscated, together with their cargoes; 513 and the Veranderen, taken on *a voyage from Bourdeaux to Dunkirk, 1778, and the Prosperite from Nantz to Dunkirk, 1779, could not have been restored by Sir James Marriott upon the ground of a relaxation, but restitution must have been decreed, upon the principle of a total abandonment of the rule, since the one was a vessel belonging to Prussia, and the other to Lubeck, with neither of which states Great Britain had, at that time, any treaty regarding this matter.

It is true that, before the war of 1756, attempts were made to prohibit, by mere proclamation, all trade with an enemy. Thus, beside the earlier attempts of this nature,⁴ by the convention concluded at London on the 22d of August, 1689, between England and Holland, wherein the contracting parties say, "that, having declared war against the Most Christian King, it behooves them to do as much damage as possible to the common enemy, in order to bring him to agree to such conditions as may restore the repose of Christendom; and that, for this end, it was necessary to interrupt all trade and commerce with the subjects of the said king," it was agreed between them, "that they would take any vessel, whatever king or state it may belong to, that shall be found sailing into, or out of, the ports of France, and condemn both vessel and merchandise as legal prize; and that this resolution should be notified to all neutral states." Lord Liverpool and Mr. Ward, among the strongest advocates for the maritime claims of Great Britain, condemn, in the most unequivocal manner, this pretension, on her part.⁵ The French regulation of the 23d July, 1704, seems to have been intended to counteract these measures of the English and Dutch, during the war which followed the English revolution in 1688, and, we may suppose, were revived during the subsequent war concerning the Spanish succession. Although Louis XIV., in the preamble to this ordinance, studiously negatives the idea of its being intended *as a measure of retaliation, yet this [514 profession is powerfully contrasted with the provisions actually contained in the body of the edict, prohibiting all neutral trade in articles the growth or manufacture of the enemy's country, except in the direct voyage from the enemy's ports to a port of the neutral country to which the vessel belongs.⁶

During the long period of tranquility which followed the peace of Utrecht, interrupted only

3.—"I do not mean to say that in the accidents of a war the property of neutrals may not be variously entangled and endangered. In the nature of human connections it is hardly possible that inconveniences of this kind should be altogether avoided. Some neutrals will be unjustly engaged in covering the goods of the enemy, and others will be unjustly suspected of doing it; these inconveniences are more than balanced by the enlargement of their commerce; the trade of the belligerents is usually interrupted in a great degree, and falls, in the same degree, into the lap of neutrals. But without reference to accidents of the one kind or the other, the general rule is, that the neutral has a right to carry on, in time of war, his accustomed trade, to the utmost extent of which that accustomed trade is capable. Very different is the case of a trade which the neutral has never possessed; which he holds by no title of use and habit in times of peace, and which, in fact, can obtain in war, by no other title than by the success of the one belligerent against the other, and at the expense of that very belligerent under whose success he sets up his title; and such I take to be the colonial trade, generally speaking." 2 Rob. 198. The truth is, France never had a navigation act similar to the English, and absolutely excluding foreign shipping from her coasting and carrying trade, until the revolution, when the decree of the 21st of September, 1793, entitled "Acte de Navigation," was passed, which is alluded to by Sir W. Scott in the case of The Emanuel, 1 Rob. 206, as if it had been a re-enactment of the ancient laws of France. This was, besides, limited to the coasting trade; as it only extended to the transportation of goods of French production or manufacture, and not to the trade from port to port, in commodities of foreign growth or fabric; which last has been confounded by the British prize courts in the same indiscriminate rule of condemnation with the coasting trade, properly so called.

by the very short war of 1719, no occasion could be afforded to administer the principles of prize law; and, as we have seen, no traces of the existence of the rule in question can be found previous to that epoch, although the colonial system of Europe had, long before, been established, and its maritime nations all participated in the commerce of the East and West Indies.

The judicial history of the rule, during the subsequent wars, is so admirably traced in a Memorial to Congress from the merchants of Baltimore, &c., a paper drawn up, in 1806, by Mr. Pinkney, that the subject cannot be better illustrated than by the following extract:

"In the war of 1744, in which Great Britain had the power, if she had thought fit to exert it, to exclude the neutral states from the colony trade of France and Spain, her High Court of Appeals decided that the trade was lawful, and released such vessels as had been found engaged in it.

"In the war which soon followed the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, Great Britain is supposed to have first acted upon the pretension that such a trade was unlawful, as being shut against neutrals in peace. And it is certain that, during the whole of that war her courts of prize did condemn all neutral vessels taken in the prosecution of that trade, together with their cargoes, whether French or neutral. These condemnations, however, proceeded upon peculiar grounds. In the seven years' war, France did not throw open to neutrals the traffic of her colonies. She established no free ports in the east, or in the west, with which foreign vessels could be permitted to trade, either generally or occasionally, as such. Her first practice was simply to grant special licenses to particular neutral vessels, principally Dutch, and commonly chartered by Frenchmen, to make, under the usual restrictions, particular trading voyages to the colonies. These licenses 515 furnished the British courts with a peculiar reason for condemning vessels sailing under them, viz., 'that they became, in virtue of them, the adopted or naturalized vessels of France.'

"As soon as it was known that this effect was imputed to these licenses, they were discontinued, or pretended to be so; but the discontinuance, whether real or supposed, produced no change in the conduct of Great Britain; for neutral vessels, employed in this trade, were captured and condemned as before. The grounds upon which they continued to be so captured and condemned may best be collected from reasons subjoined to the printed cases, in the prize causes, decided by the High Court of Admiralty, (in which Sir Thomas Salisbury, at that time, presided,) and by the lords commissioners of appeals, between 1757 and 1760.

"In the case of The America, (which was a Dutch ship, bound from St. Domingo to Holland, with the produce of that island, belonging to French subjects, by whom the vessel had been chartered,) the reason stated in the printed case is, 'that the ship must be looked upon as a French ship (coming from St. Domingo), for by the laws of France no foreign ship can trade in the French West Indies.'

"In the case of The Snip, the reason assigned by Sir George Hayes, and Mr. Pratt, afterwards

Lord Camden, is, 'for that The Snip (though once the property of Dutchmen), being employed in carrying provisions to, and goods from, a French colony, thereby became a French ship, and as such was justly condemned.'

"It is obvious that the reason in the case of The America proceeds upon a presumption that as the trade was, by the standing laws of France, even up to that moment confined to French ships, any ship found employed in it must be a French ship. The reason in the other case does not rest upon this idle presumption, but takes another ground; for it states, that by the reason of the trade in which the vessel was employed she became a French vessel.

"It is manifest that this is no other than the first idea of adoption or naturalization, accommodated to the change attempted to be introduced into the state of things, by the actual or pretended discontinuance of the special licenses. What, then, is the amount of the doctrine of the seven years' war, in the utmost extent which it is possible to ascribe to it? It is, in substance, no more than this, that as France did not, at any period of that war, abandon, or in any degree suspend, the principle of colonial monopoly, or the system arising out of it, a neutral vessel found in the prosecution of the trade, which, according to that principle and that system, still continuing in force, could only be a French trade, and open to French vessels, either became, or was legally to be presumed to be, a French vessel. It cannot be [*516] necessary to show that this doctrine differs essentially from the principle of the present day; but, even if it were otherwise, the practice of that war, whatever it might be, was undoubtedly contrary to that of the war of 1744, and, as contrasted with it, will not be considered, by those who have at all attended to the history of these two periods, as entitled to any peculiar veneration. The effects of that practice were almost wholly confined to the Dutch, who had rendered themselves extremely obnoxious to Great Britain, by the selfish and pusillanimous policy, as it was falsely called, which enabled them, during the seven years' war, to profit of the troubles of the rest of Europe.

"In the war of 1744 the neutrality of the Dutch, while it continued, had in it nothing of complacency to France; they furnished, from the commencement of hostilities, on account of the pragmatic sanction, succors to the confederates; declared openly, after a time, in favor of the Queen of Hungary; and, finally, determined upon, and prepared for, war by sea and land. Great Britain, of course, had no inducement, in that war, to hunt after any hostile principle, by the operation of which the trade of the Dutch might be harassed, or the advantage of their neutral position, while it lasted, defeated. In the war of 1756 she had this inducement in its utmost strength. Independent of the commercial rivalry existing between the two nations, the Dutch had excited the undisguised resentment of Great Britain, by declining to furnish against France the succors stipulated by treaty; by constantly supplying France with naval and warlike stores, through the medium of a trade, systematically pursued by the people, and countenanced by the government; by granting to France, early in 1757, a free passage through Namur and Maestricht, for the provisions, ammunition, and artillery, belonging to the army, destined to act against the territories of Prussia, in the neighborhood of the Low Countries; and by the indifference with which they saw Nieuport and Ostend surrendered into the hands of France, by the court of Vienna, which Great Britain represented to be contrary to the Barrier treaty, and the treaty of the Utrecht. Without entering into the sufficiency of these grounds of dissatisfaction, which undoubtedly had a great influence on the conduct of Great Britain towards the Dutch, from 1757 until the peace of 1763, it is manifest that this very dissatisfaction, little short of a disposition to open war, and frequently on the eve of producing it, takes away, in a considerable degree, from the authority of any practice to which it may be supposed to have led, as tending to establish a rule of the public law of Europe. It may not be improper to observe, too, that the station occupied by Great Britain, in the seven years' war (as proud a one as any country ever did occupy), compared with 517*] that of the other European powers, was not exactly calculated to make the measures which her resentments against Holland, or her views against France, might dictate, peculiarly respectful to the general rights of neutrals. In the north, Russia and Sweden were engaged in the confederacy against Prussia, and were, of course, entitled to no consideration in this respect. The government of Sweden was, besides, weak and impotent. Denmark, it is true, took no part in the war; but she did not suffer by the practice in question. Besides, all these powers combined would have been as nothing against the naval strength of Great Britain in 1758. As to Spain, she could have no concern in the question, and, at length, became involved in the war on the side of France. Upon the whole, in the war of 1756 Great Britain had the power to be unjust, and irresistible temptations to abuse it. In that of 1744 her power was, perhaps, equally great, but everything was favorable to equity and moderation. The example afforded on this subject, therefore, by the first war, has far better titles to respect than that furnished by the last.

"In the American war, the practice and decisions on this point followed those of the war of 1744.

"The question first came before the Lords of Appeal in January 1782, in the Danish cases of The Tiger, Copenhagen, and others, captured in October, 1780, and condemned at St. Kitts, in December following. The grounds on which the captors relied for condemnation, in The Tiger, as set forth at the end of the respondent's printed case, were, 'for that the ship having been trading to Cape François, where none but French ships are allowed to carry on any traffic, and having been laden, at the time of the capture, with the produce of the French part of the island of St. Domingo, put on board at Cape François, and both ship and cargo taken confessedly coming from thence, must, (pursuant to precedents in the like cases in the last war) to all intents and purposes, be deemed a ship and goods belonging to the French, or at least adopted and naturalized as such.'

"In The Copenhagen, the captor's reasons are thus given:

Wheat. 1.

"1st. Because it is allowed that the ship was destined, with her cargo, to the island of Guadaloupe, and no other place.'

"2d. Because it is contrary to the established rule of general law to admit any neutral ship to go to, and trade at, a port belonging to a colony of the enemy, to which such neutral ship could not have freely traded in time of peace.'

"On the 22d of January, 1782, these causes came on for hearing before the Lords of Appeal, who decreed restitution in all of them; thus, in the most solemn and explicit manner, disavowing and rejecting the pretended rules of the law of nations, upon which the captors *relied; the first of which was literally [*518 borrowed from the doctrine of the war of 1756, and the last of which is that very rule on which Great Britain now relies.

"It is true that, in these cases, the judgment of the lords was pronounced upon one shape only of the colony trade of France, as carried on by neutrals; that is to say, a trade between the colony of France and that of the country of the neutral shipper. But, as no distinction was supposed to exist, in point of principle, between the different modifications of the trade, and as the judgment went upon general grounds applicable to the entire subject, we shall not be thought to overrate its effect and extent, when we represent it as a complete rejection, both of the doctrine of the seven years' war and of that modern principle by which it has been attempted to replace it. But, at any rate, the subsequent decrees of the same high tribunal did go that length. Without enumerating the cases, of various descriptions, involving the legality of the trade in all its modes, which were favorably adjudged by the Lords of Appeal, after the American peace, it will be sufficient to mention the case of The Vervagting, decided by them in 1785 and 1786. This was the case of a Danish ship, laden with a cargo of dry goods and provisions, with which she was bound on a voyage from Marseilles to Martinique and Cape François, where she was to take in, for Europe, a return cargo of West India produce. The ship was not proceeded against; but the cargo, which was claimed for merchants of Ostend, was condemned as enemy's property (as in truth it was), by the vice-admiralty of Antigua, subject to the payment of freight pro rata itineris, or, rather, for the whole of the outward voyage. On appeal, as to the cargo, the Lords of Appeal, on the 8th of March, 1785, reversed the condemnation, and ordered further proof of the property to be produced within three months. On the 28th March, 1786, no further proof having been exhibited, and the proctor for the claimants declaring that he should exhibit none, the lords condemned the cargo, and, on the same day, reversed the decree below, giving freight, pro rata itineris (from which the neutral master had appealed), and decreed freight generally, and the costs of the appeal.

"It is impossible that a judicial opinion could go more conclusively to the whole question on the colony trade than this; for it not only disavows the pretended illegality of neutral interpositions in that trade, even directly between France and her colonies (the most exceptionable form, it is said, in which that interposition could present itself); it not only denies that property engaged in such a trade is, on that account, liable to confiscation (inasmuch as, after having reversed *the condemnation of the cargo pronounced below, it proceeds afterwards to condemn it, merely for want of further proof as to the property), but it holds that the trade is so unquestionably lawful to neutrals as not even to put in jeopardy the claim to freight for that part of the voyage which had not yet begun, and which the party had not yet put himself in a situation to begin. The force of this, and the other British decisions produced by the American war, will not be avoided by suggesting that there was anything peculiarly favorable in the time when, or the manner in which, France opened her colony trade to neutrals on that occasion. Something of that sort, however, has been said. We find the following language in a very learned opinion on this point: 'It is certainly true that in the last war (the American war) many decisions took place which then pronounced that such a trade between France and her colonies was not considered as an unneutral commerce; but under what circumstances? It was understood that France, in opening her colonies during the war, declared that this was not done with a temporary view, relative to the war, but on a general permanent purpose of altering her colonial system, and of admitting foreign vessels, universally, and at all times, to a participation of that commerce; taking that to be the fact (however suspicious its commencement might be, during the actual existence of a war), there was no ground to say that neutrals were not carrying on a commerce as ordinary as any other in which they could be engaged; and, therefore, in the case of The Verragting, and in many other succeeding cases, the lords decreed payment of freight to the neutral ship-owner. It is fit to be remembered, on this occasion, that the conduct of France evinced how little dependence can be placed upon explanations of measures adopted during the pressure of war; for, hardly was the ratification of the peace signed when she returned to her ancient system of colonial monopoly.'

"We answer to all this, that, to refer the decision of the lords, in The Verragting, and other succeeding cases, to the reason here assigned, is to accuse that high tribunal of acting upon a confidence which has no example in a singularly incredible declaration (if, indeed, such a declaration was ever made), after the utter falsehood of it had been, as this learned opinion does itself inform us, unequivocally and notoriously ascertained.

"We have seen that The Verragting was decided by the lords in 1785 and 1786, at least two years after France had, as we are told, 'returned to her ancient system of colonial monopoly,' and when, of course, the supposed assertion of an intended permanent abandonment *of that system could not be permitted to produce any legal consequence.

"We answer, further, that if this alleged declaration was in fact made (and we must be allowed to say that we have found no trace of it out of the opinion above recited), it never was put into such a formal and authentic shape as to be the fair subject of judicial notice.

"It is not contained in the French arrears of that day, where only it would be proper to look for it, and we are not referred to any other document proceeding from the government of France, in which it is said to appear. There does not, in a word, seem to have been anything which an enlightened tribunal could be supposed capable of considering as a pledge on the part of France, that she had resolved upon, or even meditated, the extravagant change in her colonial system which she is said, in this opinion, to have been understood to announce to the world. But even if the declaration in question was actually made, and that, too, with all possible solemnity, still it would be difficult to persuade any thinking man that the sincerity of such a declaration was, in any degree, confided in; or that any person, in any country, could regard it in any other light than as a mere artifice that could give no right which would not equally well exist without it. Upon the whole, it is manifestly impracticable to rest the decisions of the Lords of Appeal, in and after the American war, upon any dependence placed on this declaration, of which there is no evidence that it ever was made—which, it is certain, was not authentically or formally made—which, however made, was not, and could not be, believed at any time, far less in 1785 and 1786, when its falsehood had been unquestionably proved by the public and undisguised conduct of its supposed authors, in direct opposition to it. That Sir James Marriott, who sat in the High Court of Admiralty of Great Britain during the greater part of the late war, did not consider these decisions as standing upon this ground, is evident; for, notwithstanding that in the year 1756 he was the most zealous, and, perhaps, able advocate for the condemnation of the Dutch ships engaged in the colony trade of France, yet, upon the breaking out of the late war, he relied upon the decisions in the American war as authoritatively settling the legality of that trade, and decreed accordingly.

"If, as a more plausible answer to these decisions (considered in the light of authorities) than that which we have just examined, it should be said that they ought rather to be viewed as reluctant sacrifices to policy, or even to necessity, under circumstances of particular difficulty and peril, than as an expression of the deliberate opinion of the Lords of Appeal, or the government of Great Britain, on the matter *of right, it might, perhaps, be sufficient to reply, that if the armed neutrality coupled with the situation of Great Britain as a party to the war, did in any degree compel these decisions, we might also expect to find, at the same era, some relaxation on the part of that country relative to the doctrine of contraband, upon which the convention of the armed neutrality contained the most direct stipulations which the northern powers were particularly interested to enforce. Yet such was not the fact. But, in addition to this, and other considerations of a similar description, it is natural to inquire why it happened, that if the Lords of Appeal were satisfied that Great Britain possessed the right in question, they recorded, and gave to the world, a series of decisions against it, founded, not upon British orders of council, gratuitously relaxing what was still asserted to be the strict right, as in the late war, but upon general principles of public law. However prudence might have required (although there is no reason to believe it did require) an abstinence, on the part of Great Britain, from the extreme exercise of the right she had been supposed to claim, still it could not be necessary to give, to the mere forbearance of a claim, the stamp and character of a formal admission, that the claim itself was illegal and unjust. In the late war, as often as the British government wished to concede and relax, from whatever motive, on the subject of the colony trade of her opponents, an order of council was resorted to, setting forth the nature of the concession, or relaxation, upon which the courts of prize were afterwards to found their sentences; and, undoubtedly, sentences so passed cannot, in any fair reasoning, be considered as deciding more than that the order of council is obligatory on the courts whose sentences they are. But, the decrees of the Lords of Appeal, in and after the American war, are not of this description, since there existed no order of council on the subject of them; and, of course, they are, and ought to be, of the highest weight and authority against Great Britain, on the questions involved in, and adjudged by them."

In confirmation of the preceding authorities, adduced from the decisions of the British prize courts during the wars of 1744, 1756 and 1778, the following cases may be added from the adjudications of the common law tribunals:

The first is that of Berens v. Rucker, ruled by Lord Mansfield at the sittings after Trinity Term, 1761.¹ This was an action on a policy of insurance on a Dutch ship, called the Tyd, [522] and its cargo, at and from St. Eustatius to Amsterdam, warranted a Dutch ship, and the goods Dutch property, and not laden in any French port in the West Indies. The cargo was worth £12,000, and insured at a premium of 15 guineas per cent., which was inflated to this high rate on account of the number of captures made by the British, of neutral vessels, on suspicion of illicit trade, and the detention of those vessels by the proceedings in the courts of admiralty. In May, 1758, the ship was at St. Eustatius, taking in her cargo, which consisted of sugar and indigo, and other French commodities, which were put on board her, partly out of barks from sea, and partly from the shore of the island. On the 18th of June, 1758, she sailed on her voyage to Amsterdam; on the 27th she was taken by a British privateer, and carried into Portsmouth, in England. On the 1st of August the seamen were examined on the standing interrogatories, and the master entered his claim in the High Court of Admiralty. In October the claimants were cited to specify what part of the goods were taken from the shore of St. Eustatius, and what from the barks. Citation was continued, from court to court, till February, 1759, when an interlocutory decree was pronounced for the contumacy of the claimants in not specifying, and that, therefore, the goods should be presumed French property. There was an appeal to the lords, but as many cases stood before it, as the market was very high, and as the cargo was, in part, perishable, the agent of the owners agreed with the captors to give them £800 and costs, in order to obtain a reversal of the sentence. The reversal was had by consent, and in order to give costs to the captors, it was decreed, by consent, that there was probable cause for seizure, and, thereupon, costs were decreed to the captors, and the cargo was restored to the claimants. The ship, when restored, proceeded to Amsterdam; and, after her arrival there, the chamber of insurances, in that city, settled the average of the plaintiff towards the loss and expenses occasioned by the capture, detention, and litigation, and for this sum the action was brought.

"Lord Mansfield. The first question is, whether this was a just capture. Both sentences are out of the case, being done, and undone, by consent. The capture was certainly unjust. *The pretense was, that part [*523] of this cargo was put on board off St. Eustatius, out of barks supposed to come from the French islands, and not loaded immediately from the shore. This is now a settled point by the Lords of Appeal, to be the same thing as if they had been landed on the Dutch shore, and then put on board afterwards; in which case there is no color for seizure. The rule is, that if a neutral ship trade to a French colony, with all the privileges of a French ship, and is thus adopted and naturalized, it must be looked upon as a French ship, and is liable to be taken. Not so if she have only French produce on board, without taking it in at a French port, for it may be purchased of neutrals.

"The second question is, whether the owners have acted bona fide and uprightly, as men acting for themselves, and upon a reasonable footing, so as to make the expenses of this compromise a loss to be borne by the insurers. The order of the judge of the admiralty to specify was illegal, contrary to the marine law and the act of parliament, which is only declaratory of the marine law; because, if they had specified, it could be of no consequence, according to the rule I before mentioned. The captors were, however, in possession of a sentence, though an unjust one; and a court of appeal cannot, or seldom does, upon a reversal, give costs or damages which have accrued subsequent to the original sentence; for these damages arise from the fault of the judge, not of the parties. Under all these circumstances, the owners did wisely to offer a compromise. The cargo was worth £12,000; the appeal was hazardous; the delay certain. The Dutch deputy in England negotiated the compromise; the chamber of commerce, at Amsterdam, ratified it, and thought it reasonable. Had the whole sentence been totally reversed, the costs must have sat heavy on the owners. I, therefore, think the insurers liable to answer this average loss, which was submitted to, in order to avoid a total one."²

Such was the definition of the rule, as given by a judge who, according to Blackstone, attended the commission of appeals, *and [*524] conducted its decisions during the war of 1756, and "whose masterly acquaintance with the law of nations was known and revered by every state in Europe."³

The next case is that of Brymer v. Atkyns, determined in the Court of Common Pleas, Hilary Term, 1789, in which Lord Loughborough uses the following words: "But during the prosecution of the war which ensued in the year 1758, great complaints were made by neutral powers of the misconduct of English privateers in the channel, in seizing their merchantmen; and a question had also arisen, between the subjects of Holland and the officers of the British navy, upon the extent of the treaties of commerce between this country and the Dutch republic; the Dutch claiming a right to carry to the French all such goods as were not specifically enumerated under the title of contraband; while, on the part of the British navy it was contended that free ships only made free goods as to such course of trade as was carried on in time of peace; that the Dutch being excluded from the French Islands in the West Indies in time of peace, and only admitted in time of war to cover their trade, their ships ought to be considered as adopted French, and were, therefore, lawful prize."¹

The next adjudication which may be advantageously cited, to illustrate the history of the rule, is the case of The Katharina, determined in the House of Lords on the 2d of May, 1788.² This was a Dutch ship, which sailed from the Texel on the 31st of August, 1779, bound to Curacao, where she arrived on the 18th of November following, with a cargo of linen goods, and some articles of provisions, and thence sailed for Cape François, in the island of St. Domingo, where the cargo was sold, a return cargo of colonial produce taken on board, and the ship sailed for Amsterdam on the 17th of April, 1780. On the 22d of May she was captured by a British privateer, and carried into Scotland, where the ship and cargo were, on the 22d of September, 1780, condemned as lawful prize, by the judge admiral. An appeal was entered to the Court of Session, where the [525*] sentence was affirmed, and the claimants appealed to the House of Lords, who reversed the decrees of the courts below, and ordered the value of the ship and cargo to be paid to the claimants.

It has been alleged that this case was determined by the House of Lords, as it is said the parallel case of The Tiger must have been by the Lords of Appeal, upon the ground of the existence of a French edict, dated the 31st of July, 1779, opening the colonial trade to neutrals.³ But, as we have seen, this could not possibly have been the foundation for the decree of restitution in the case of The Tiger. 1st. Because no such edict can be found in any collection of French arretes, and it is acknowledged that the search for it had been fruitless.⁴ 2d. Because the edict has been supposed to have been issued flagrante bello; and a trade opened in time of war to neutrals could not be considered as an accustomed trade in the view of the prize courts. 3d. Because it is admitted that France returned to her ancient colonial system after the peace of 1783, and yet the Lords of Appeal persisted in decreeing restitution of neutral property taken during the war. 4th. Because the supposed edict of the 31st July, 1779, is not recited in the printed case of The Tiger; but, on the contrary, a special ordinance, of a preceding date, is relied upon by the claimants in that case as opening to foreigners the ports of St. Domingo. The objection also applies to this ordinance, that, beside its being issued immediately upon the commencement of hostilities, it was the mere local act of a colonial governor, and still less likely to be regarded by the Lords of Appeal as indicative of a permanent change in the colonial system of France than the supposed more general edict of the 31st July, 1779.

If, then, the opening of the French colonies to neutrals could not have formed the basis on which restitution was decreed by the Lords of Appeal, in the case of The Tiger, was it the real ground of the reversal, by the House of Lords, of the decree of condemnation in the case of The Katharina?

*When the grounds of a judicial de- [526] cision are stated by a court, it is not only superfluous, but manifestly tends to lead the inquirer astray who is seeking for the real grounds of such decision, to look for it in the arguments of the parties. It was, indeed, argued by the counsel for the claimants, in The Katharina, that the French edict, of the 31st July, 1779, excepted that case from the general rule which had been enforced in the preceding war; whilst, on the other hand, the captor's counsel denied that any reliance could be placed on the sincerity and permanence of the supposed change in the colonial system of France. It was, also, contended by the claimants' counsel, that the ship was exempted from capture under the general immunity of the Dutch treaty of 1674; whilst, on the contrary, the counsel for the captors maintained that she was liable to condemnation for carrying provisions on her outward voyage, contrary to the same treaty. But the only points even glanced at by the learned lord who moved for the reversal in the House of Lords, were: 1st. The want of jurisdiction in the court below. 2d. The discontinuance, during the war of the American revolution, of the principle of the war of 1756.

As to the first point, there seems to be no doubt that, by the articles of union between England and Scotland, the Court of Admiralty, in Scotland, was preserved in its ancient jurisdiction, which, unquestionably, extended to prize causes, and no subsequent act of the British parliament has made any change in this respect. The appeal is to the Court of Sessions, and thence to the House of Lords.⁵

The second point, on which the decree of the House of Lords was founded is, "because the principle on which the courts below had proceeded, although adhered to in the war which ended in 1763, had been departed from in that which terminated in 1782."

Hence it is manifest that the decree of the House of Lords, in this case, can only be referred to an actual abandonment of the rule of the war of 1756. And such is the effect of this adjudication as understood by the reporter himself, who, in his marginal note to the case, says, in the very words of the claimants' coun- [527

sel: "It is now established, by repeated determinations, that neither ships nor cargoes, the property of subjects of neutral powers, either going to trade at, or coming from, the French West India Islands, with cargoes purchased there, are liable to capture." There is, then, no occasion to advert to the printed reasons of the parties in order to rest this decree upon a supposed exception to the rule which is not stated by the tribunal itself.

Yet they may be quoted as a confirmation of what has been before asserted respecting the origin and nature of the rule. Thus it was stated by the claimants' counsel (of whom Sir William Scott, then at the bar, was one), "That it was now established that neither ships or cargoes, the property of subjects of neutral powers, either going to trade at, or coming from, the French West India Islands, with cargoes purchased there, are liable to capture; for in many recent instances, particularly The Tiger, a Danish ship, with a cargo purchased at Cape François, proceeding to St. Thomas; The Copenhagen, a Danish ship, from St. Thomas to Guadaloupe; The Jonge Jan, a Dutch ship, with a cargo taken in at Port-au-Prince, and bound to Curacoa; and, likewise, in the case of The Sloop Nancy, and six other Danish vessels, with cargoes taken in at Guadaloupe, in the year 1780, and bound therewith to the island of St. Thomas, under convoy of a Danish frigate; all which were captured by British cruisers, and condemned in the vice-admiralty courts, in the British West Indies. The lords commissioners of appeal reversed the sentences of condemnation, and restored the ships and cargoes."¹

To which it was answered by the captor's counsel, "That the subjects of all other nations being absolutely prohibited to trade to, or from, the French West India Islands, by the fundamental laws of France, the ship in question, coming directly from St. Domingo, with a cargo taken in there (be the property whose it might), must be considered as French, and, as such, both ship and cargo were lawful prize, agreeably to many decisions in the courts of admiralty, and by the Lords of Appeal last war, 528*] *founded upon the clearest principles. But it is objected that, by an edict of the French king, dated in July, 1779, the trade to his colonies was laid open to all neutral states. To this it is answered, that during the last war, Dutch ships, engaged in this fraudulent trade, obtained special licenses from the French government; but these were constantly disregarded, when urged, as obviating the allegation of their being engaged in a trade open only to French subjects, and even were taken as conclusive evidence of their being adopted French ships. During the present war, it is said a general license has been given, which cannot vary the case when the views and consequences are precisely the same. The opening a trade to the colonies of France, flagrante bello, is a transaction to the prejudice of Great Britain, and a mere devise and cover for fraud. A Dutchman, who trades under a privilege of this kind, is not in the ordinary situation of a neutral subject, continuing his own commerce with the warring nations as in time of peace; he is, to all intents and purposes, carrying on the trade of France, being admitted to a participation, ad hunc effectum, in the exclusive rights of a French subject; and, as the government of France considers such persons as temporary subjects, to the effect of being allowed to trade with the French West Indies, the subjects of Great Britain, on the other hand, must, according to every principle of justice and sound reasoning, be entitled to consider them in the same light, and to seize, as lawful prize, both ships and cargoes employed in this extraordinary commerce. No person can possibly believe that the license will be continued by France after the peace. It has been shown, in a variety of instances, that the Dutch do not understand that it will; and, till such a license has been granted, or continued in time of profound peace, no regard can be paid to it when issued in time of war."²

But this doctrine of the captor's counsel was rejected by the House of Lords in the case of The Katharina, as it had before been in the cases of The Tiger and The Copenhagen, by the Lords of Appeal; and thus we have the conjoint authority of the two highest *tribunals in [*529 the British empire, to confirm the abandonment of this rule during the war of the American revolution.

We come now to the first war of the French revolution, and here we have the testimony of Sir William Scott, to show that his predecessor, in the High Court of Admiralty (Sir James Marriott), adhered, at the commencement of that war, to the practice which had been settled in the war of 1778, and, accordingly, decreed freight to neutral vessels employed in the coasting trade of the enemy. In the case of *The Emanuel*³ (April 9th, 1799), Sir William Scott says, "with respect to authorities, it has been much argued, that in three cases during this war the Court of Admiralty has decreed payment of freight to vessels so employed; and I believe that such cases did pass under an intimation of the opinion of the very learned person who preceded me, in which the parties acquiesced, without resorting to the authority of a higher tribunal. But a case before the lords seems to convey a different opinion upon this subject of the coasting trade of the enemy—the case of The Mercurius, in which freight was refused."

Here it is to be remembered that this case of The Mercurius was determined, by the lords of appeal, on the 7th of March, 1795, and, therefore, can be no authority as to the practice at an earlier period of the war, or as to the law at the same period, which was understood by Sir James Marriott and the learned counsel who acquiesced in his decisions, without an appeal, still to subsist as settled by the lords during the preceding war, and adhered to, by them, down to the year 1786. Even Sir William Scott himself, long after the case of The Mercurius was decided by the lords, seems to have regarded the rule, in respect to the coasting trade, as merely creating a presumption of enemy interests, and not as affording a substantive ground of condemnation. Thus, in the case of *The Welvaart*⁴ (January 8th, 1799), he says: "Besides, this vessel appears to have been engaged in the coasting trade of France. The court has never gone so far as to say, that pursuing one voyage of that kind would be sufficient to fix a hostile 530 character; but, in *my opinion a habit of such trading would. Such a voyage must, however, raise a strong degree of suspicion against a neutral claim, and the plunging, at once, into a trade so highly dangerous, creates a presumption that there is an enemy proprietor lurking behind the cover of a neutral name." So, also, in the case of *The Speculation*¹ (December 16th, 1799), the king's advocate (Sir John Nicholl) stated, "That the ship appeared to have been carrying on the coasting trade of France; a trade not only generally forbidden, but expressly prohibited to neutral ships, by the ordinances of France, which have issued during this war, that she would, therefore, come under the character of an adopted French ship." Whilst, on the other hand, the claimants' counsel (Dr. Laurence) answered, that "It has not been held, in the present war, that the mere circumstances of being engaged in the coasting trade of the enemy does amount to that adoption, which will subject the property to condemnation." Sir William Scott, in his judgment, says: "This is a case of a ship taken on a voyage from one French port to another, which is certainly a sufficient justification of the capture; because the very circumstance of being engaged in conducting the trade of the enemy, from one port to another, will justly subject the vessel to inquiry; and, perhaps, in some future case, the court may have occasion to consider how far the regulations that have been alluded to, and the acting upon them (which it may be proper to consider at the same time), may not make such a trade liable to be considered as a case of adoption."

We may, therefore, consider it as proved, that the rule was suffered to slumber from the beginning of the war of the American revolution until it was awakened, with increased activity, by the orders in council of the 6th of November, 1793, instructing the public and private ships of war of Great Britain to "stop and detain all vessels laden with goods, the produce of any colony belonging to France, or carrying provisions, or other supplies, for the use of any such colony, and to bring the same, with their cargoes, to legal adjudication in our courts of admiralty."

might properly be considered as evidence of what the British government deemed to be law, if this inference were not somewhat weakened by the circumstances that they were secretly issued, precipitately repealed, and full indemnification was made for the captures under them. On the 8th January, 1794, the following instruction was substituted: "That they shall bring in, for lawful adjudication, all vessels, with their cargoes, that are loaded with goods, the produce of the French West India Islands, and coming directly from any port of the said islands, to any port in Europe." And, on the 25th of January, 1798, this order was also revoked, and the following was issued: "That they should bring in, for lawful adjudication, all vessels, with their cargoes, that are laden with goods the produce of any island, or settlement, belonging to France, Spain, or the United provinces, and coming directly from any port of the said islands, or settlements, to any port in Europe, not being a port of this kingdom, nor a port of that country to which such ships, being neutral ships, shall belong."

We have seen that, up to the time when this last order was issued, the prize courts had never, of their own authority, revived the rule which they had invented in the war of 1756, and laid aside in that of the American revolution. But when it was once more called into life, by the instructions of the executive government, they gradually enlarged the sphere of its activity beyond the text of those [532 instructions, either upon the principle of affecting the return voyage, with the penalty of contraband, contrary to Sir William Scott's own previous opinions,³ or, upon the principle of a continuity of the voyage which had been repudiated by the Lords of Appeal in the war of 1756, even where the colonial produce was transhipped in a neutral port, from barks, in which it was brought from enemy's ports, and not from the shore. Upon one or the other of these assumptions the rule was applied to cut off the exportation of the produce of the enemy's colonies from neutral countries, where it had been imported, unless it had become incorporated into the general stock of national commodities⁴ according to the fluctuating rules prescribed to break the continuity of voyage. On the renewal of the war, after the peace of the Amiens, the following order was issued, dated on the 24th of June, 1803: "In consideration of the present state of commerce, we are pleased hereby to direct the commanders of our ships of war, and privateers, not to seize any neutral vessel which shall be carrying on trade directly between the colonies of the enemy, and the neutral country to which the vessel belongs, and laden with the property of the inhabitants of such neutral country; provided, that such neutral vessel shall not be supplying, nor shall, on the outward voyage, have supplied the enemy with any articles contraband of war, and shall not be trading with any blockaded port." This instruction is substantially the same with that of 1798, except that it adopts the innovation of the prize courts, affecting the return voyage, with the penalty of contraband carried outward. Under it, the same course of decisions took place, by which the noxious qualities of the rule were much enlarged, and its wide-spreading desolation threatened to interrupt the amicable relations between the United States and Great Britain; when the order in council, of the 16th of May, 1806, was issued, blockading the coasts from the river Elbe to Brest, inclusive, except that neutral vessels, 533] *coming directly from the ports of their own country, were allowed to enter, and depart, from the blockaded ports, with cargoes not enemy's property, nor contraband, but were not permitted to trade from port to port. This order was supposed to have been drawn up with a view to the colonial trade; but it does not appear to have been considered by the prize courts as containing any relaxation of the principles they had established respecting that trade, and the whole question was at length merged in the orders in council of the 7th of January, and the 11th of November, 1807; by the first of which, all neutral trade, from one enemy's port, or from a port where the British flag was excluded, to another such port, and by the latter (among other provisions) the exportation of the produce of the enemy's colonies, from a neutral country to any other country than Great Britain, was prohibited. These orders were issued in retaliation of the Berlin decree of the French emperor, and on the 26th of April, 1809, they were relaxed as to the European blockade, but extended to the total prohibition of all neutral trade with the colonies of France and Holland.

It would unreasonably swell this note to enlarge upon this part of the subject. These edicts were condemned by the universal voice of the impartial world; they were condemned by the past example of the powers who issued them; they were condemned by the authority of the jurists whom Europe revered in better times as the oracles of public law.¹ It is pretended, by a superficial writer on the law of nations, that Sir William Scott decided the case of The Nuyade (4 Rob., 251), upon the principle of retaliating the injustice of an enemy on a neutral power, who passively submits to that injustice.² *Sir William Scott did no [*534 such thing; all that he determined, in that case, was, that Portugal and Great Britain, being allied by ancient treaties, the casus fœderis between them had arisen by the passive submission of Portugal to the hostile attacks of France, which involved Portugal, nolens volens, as an ally, in the war against France, and, consequently, rendered the property of a Portuguese merchant taken in trade with the common enemy, liable to condemnation in the British prize courts. It cannot be pretended that the neutral states, whose commerce was affected by the Berlin decree, had participated in the injustice of France, by passively submitting to that measure; since the orders in council were issued before sufficient time had elapsed to ascertain what would be the conduct either of France or of those states in respect to the decree. Nor can the order of the 7th of January, 1807, be justified as an original and abstract measure;³ because the trade from the port of one enemy to the port of another was always held lawful by the British tribunals. "This sort of traffic, from one of his (the enemy's) ports to the ports of another country, has always been open, and is, in its own nature, subject to the uses of all mankind, who are not in a state of hostility with him. The Dane has a perfect right, in time of profound peace, to trade between Holland and France, to the utmost advantage he can make of such a navigation; and there is no ground upon which any of its advantages can be withheld from him in time of war."⁴ It is needless, however, to enlarge upon the topics which might be urged against this train of innovations, by which first the trade from neutral countries to the colonies, and from port to port, of the enemy, and then all neutral traffic whatever, with him, was prohibited. It deserves notice, however, that Great Britain and France appropriated to themselves, by means of free ports or licenses, the very commerce they were prohibiting to neutrals, and to their allies, under the pretext of its aiding their enemy in the war.

REPORTS OF THE DECISIONS
OF THE
Supreme Court of the United States.
FEBRUARY TERM, 1817.

1*] *[CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.]

SLOCUM v. MAYBERRY ET AL.

The courts of the United States have exclusive jurisdiction of all seizures made on land or water, for a breach of the laws of the United States; and any intervention of a state authority which, by taking the thing seized out of the hands of the United States officer, might obstruct the exercise of this jurisdiction, is unlawful.

In such a case, the court of the United States, having cognizance of the seizure, may enforce a redelivery of the thing, by attachment, or other summary process.

The question under such a seizure, whether a forfeiture has been actually incurred, belongs exclusively to the courts of the United States, and it depends upon the final decree of such courts whether the seizure is to be deemed rightful or tortious.

If the seizing officer refuse to institute proceedings to ascertain the forfeiture, the District Court may, upon application of the aggrieved party, compel the officer to proceed to adjudication, or to abandon the seizure.

And if the seizure be finally adjudged wrongful, and without probable cause, the party may proceed, at his election, by a suit at common law, or in the Instance Court of Admiralty, for damages for the illegal act.

But the common law remedy in such a case must be sought for in the state courts, the courts of the United States having no jurisdiction to decide on the conduct of their officers, in the execution of their laws, in suits at common law, until the case shall have passed through the state courts.

Where a seizure was made, under the eleventh section of the embargo act of April, 1808, it was determined that no power is given by law to detain the cargo if separated from the vessel, and that the owner had a right to take the cargo out of the vessel, and to dispose of it in any way not prohibited by law; and in case of its detention, to bring an action of replevin therefor in the state court.

ERROR on a judgment rendered by the Supreme Court for the state of Rhode Island.

John Slocum, the plaintiff in error, was surveyor of the customs for the port of Newport, in Rhode Island, and under the directions of the collector had seized the Venus, lying in that port with a cargo ostensibly bound to some other port in the United States. The defendants in error, who were owners of the cargo, brought their writ of replevin in the state court of Rhode Island for the restoration of the property. The defendant pleaded that the Venus was laden in the night, not under the inspection of the proper revenue officers; and that the collector of the port, suspecting an intention to violate the embargo laws, had directed him to seize and detain her till the opinion of the President should be known [*3] on the case; and concluded to the jurisdiction of the court. The same matter was also pleaded in bar. To both these pleas the plaintiff in the state court demurred, and the defendants joined in demurrer. Judgment having been rendered in favor of the plaintiff in the state court, the cause was removed into this court by writ of error.

The Attorney-General, for the plaintiff in error. 1. The seizure was well made under the eleventh section of the embargo act of the 25th of April, 1808. The nature and extent of the power vested in the revenue officers was settled in the case of Crowell v. M'Fudon.¹ Even admitting that, according to the doctrine held in the case of The Paulina,² the landing without a permit, contrary to the second section, does not work a forfeiture (the denial of a clearance being the only penalty), still the efficacy of the eleventh section justifies and protects the officer. 2. The case being brought under the cognizance of the United States, and within the jurisdiction of their courts, by the just exercise of an authority by one of their officers, the state court had no right to interfere, and arrest the seizure by its process. In the case of The Favorite,³ three of the judges held that "the conduct of the salvors in taking the goods out of the possession of the revenue officers, though by legal process, was improper." This intimation is the stronger as the wrecked [*4] goods were adjudged not liable to duties; and it is fortified by the opinion of a learned judge in the Supreme Court of New York, upon an analogous question.⁴

of a writ of habeas corpus, directed to John Christie, a lieutenant-colonel in the army of the United States, to bring up the body of Jeremiah Ferguson, founded upon an affidavit of his father, stating that he was an enlisted soldier in the 13th regiment of infantry in the army of the United States, then under the command of Christie, and that the said Jeremiah Ferguson was an infant under the age of

5*] Hunter*, contra. 1. It is conceded that the opinion or suspicion of the collector authorized him to detain any vessel, ostensibly bound with a cargo to some port of the United States, until the pleasure of the President should be known. This is not a replevin for the vessel. As to that, the owners submitted to the suspicion of the collector, and the pleasure of the President; but as to the cargo, neither of these officers had, by law, the power of detaining it. A momentary and unavoidable detention of the cargo, incidental to the seizure of the vessel, might indeed be deemed a necessary consequence of an undeniable power; but could never give the seizing officer a right to continue the detention of the cargo after the vessel was securely detained. Cargo, in the revenue laws, in the law of prize, and in questions of salvage, insurance, and freight, is contra-distinguished from vessel. The system of the embargo laws was intended to prevent exportation; and, in order to accomplish this only, they authorized the detention of the vessel, without which no exportation could take place. Even the vessel was not forfeited, but detained; and the cargo was neither forfeited nor detained, but left in the possession of the owners, to be freely consumed at home. The laws of the United States having then exerted their energy, and performed their office, the subsequent proceedings were illegal. In the case of Crowell v. M'Fadon, the action was trover. Lucrative damages were sought, for a conversion proved not to be wrongful, but assented to by the party. Here the 6*] action is replevin, and the *party only seeks to retain what is universally admitted to be his property. Incommoda vitantis quam commoda petentis melior est causa. 2. The plea to the jurisdiction of the state court is fatally defective in not stating another jurisdiction.¹ 3. But even supposing the decision of this court must be against the jurisdiction of the state court, no judgment can be pronounced upon that basis. The thing in controversy cannot be restored to the plaintiff in error, for he never owned or claimed it; and the authority of *The Paulina*² is sufficient to dissipate the mistaken notion of a forfeiture to the United States. No collision between the state and national judicatures can, therefore, arise. Even if the state court has improperly interfered, it is, at the worst, an innocent officiousness; since that court has determined the question precisely as the national tribunals would have done, and has merely anticipated the beneficence they intended. The mischief that the common law writ of prohibition seeks to remedy is the inconvenience of having the same question determined different ways, according to the court in which the suit is depending. But if it be shown to the court trying a suggestion in prohibition, that the question has been, or must be, determined exactly as the appropriate court would determine it, its merely being drawn at aliud examen would not be a sufficient ground for issuing the writ of prohibition.³ *No usur- [7] pation can be ultimately successful against the national jurisdiction. The very clause of the judiciary act of 1789, sec. 25 by which the cause is brought here, shows that this jurisdiction is amply armed for self-defense. But this transaction does not present anything for the judicial powers of the United States to act upon. The case of The Favorite was a question of salvage, depending, as such questions always do, upon personal merit and propriety of conduct. A severe assertion even of legal right may, in many instances, amount to demerit. In the case of Mr. Soderstrom,⁴ the very words of the ninth section of the judiciary act expressly excluded the state courts from jurisdiction. In that case there was a personal privilege in the consul, and an absolute disability in the court. The dictum of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of New York, in the case of Ferguson, was disclaimed by the rest of the court, although under the particular circumstances of the case they declined to interfere. Unless the state tribunals have a right to interfere with the aid of their preventive process, in a case where the national jurisdiction has not lawfully attached, property detained under color of authority may be dissipated by rapacious profusion, because a timely replevin could not be interposed.

The Attorney-General, in reply. 1. The plea of the defendant in the court below covers both the vessel and the cargo, and being demurred to, its facts *are admitted. Both must be [8] detained, where they are seized contemporaneously; and to permit a subsequent transshipment of the cargo from the vessel where it was found, in delicto, to another, would be to defeat the policy of the law. In the case of Otis v. Watkins,⁵ both vessel and cargo were removed from Provincetown to Barnstable, yet the conduct of the collector was held justified. 2. The rule, that he who pleads to the jurisdiction ought to give it to some other court, must be taken with the proper qualifications. Another jurisdiction of power under that government. The judicial power of the United States is commensurate with every case arising under the laws of the Union; and the act of Congress (1 Laws of the United States, 53, 55) gives to the federal courts, exclusively of the courts of the several states, cognizance of all crimes and offenses cognizable under the authority of the United States." The other judges concurred in refusing to allow the habeas corpus, deeming that a question of sound legal discretion; but reserved themselves as to the jurisdiction of the state courts.

must be shown, where it exists, or is intended to be claimed over the subject-matter of the suit. But here it was intended only to except to the officious, unlawful jurisdiction of that court where the officer was impleaded. 8. The plea of the defendant in the court below is not an avowry, which goes for a restitution of the thing in controversy; he merely makes cognizance, acknowledges the taking, but justifies under the law, and the orders of the collector. Hence the argument, that a reversal of the judgment below would imply a restitution of the cargo to the seizing officer as his property, is inapplicable. Where, from the circumstances of the case it was lawful to take, and yet, from intervening events, unlawful to detain, the defendant cannot be entitled to a return.¹ The seizure, in this case, though it looked to no direct forfeiture or even to a trial, yet, being a necessary incident to a seizure, having in view 9*] a forfeiture, *it falls within the scope of the 9th section of the judiciary act as fairly as the cases positively enumerated; and a contrary determination would efface from the statute book those preventive means by which a complexity of litigation is avoided.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court, and, after stating the facts, proceeded as follows:

In considering this case, the first question which presents itself is this: Has the constitution, or any law of the United States, been violated or misconstrued by the court of Rhode Island in exercising its jurisdiction in this cause?

The judiciary act gives to the federal courts exclusive cognizance of all seizures made on land or water. Any intervention of a state authority which, by taking the thing seized out of the possession of the officer of the United States, might obstruct the exercise of this jurisdiction, would unquestionably be a violation of the act; and the federal court having cognizance of the seizure, might enforce a redelivery of the thing by attachment or other summary process against the parties who should divest such a possession. The party supposing himself aggrieved by a seizure cannot, because he considers it tortious, replevy the property out of the custody of the seizing officer, or of the court having cognizance of the cause. If the officer has a right, under the laws of the United States, to seize for a supposed forfeiture, the question, whether that forfeiture has been actually incurred, belongs exclusively to the *federal courts, and cannot be drawn to another forum; and it depends upon the final decree of such courts whether such seizure is to be deemed rightful or tortious. If the seizing officer should refuse to institute proceedings to ascertain the forfeiture, the District Court may, upon the application of the aggrieved party, compel the officer to proceed to adjudication, or to abandon the seizure. And if the seizure be finally adjudged wrongful, and without reasonable cause, he may proceed, at his election, by a suit at common law, or in the admiralty for damages for the illegal act. Yet, even in that case, any remedy which the law may afford to the party supposing himself to be aggrieved, other than such as might be obtained in a court of admiralty, could be prosecuted only in the state court. The common law tribunals of the United States are closed against such applications, were the party disposed to make them. Congress has refused to the courts of the Union the power of deciding on the conduct of their officers in the execution of their laws, in suits at common law, until the case shall have passed through the state courts, and have received the form which may there be given it. This, however, being an action which takes the thing itself out of the possession of the officer, could certainly not be maintained in a state court, if, by the act of Congress, it was seized for the purpose of being proceeded against in the federal court.

A very brief examination of the act of Congress will be sufficient for the inquiry whether this cargo was so seized. The second section of the act, *pleaded by the defendant in [*11 the original action, only withholds a clearance from a vessel which has committed the offense described in that section. This seizure was made under the 11th section, which enacts, "that the collectors of the customs be, and they are hereby respectively authorized to detain any vessel ostensibly bound with a cargo to some other port of the United States, whenever, in their opinion, the intention is to violate or evade any of the provisions of the acts laying an embargo, until the decision of the President of the United States be had thereupon."

The authority given respects the vessel only. The cargo is in no manner the object of the act. It is arrested in its course to any other port, by the detention of the vehicle in which it was to be carried; but no right is given to seize it specifically, or to detain it if separated from that vehicle. It remains in custody of the officer, simply because it is placed in a vessel which is in his custody; but no law forbids it to be taken out of that vessel, if such be the will of the owner. The cargoes thus arrested and detained were generally of a perishable nature, and it would have been wanton oppression to expose them to loss by unlimited detention, in a case where the owner was willing to remove all danger of exportation.

This being the true construction of the act of Congress, the owner has the same right to his cargo that he has to any other property, and may exercise over it every act of ownership not prohibited by law. He may, consequently, demand it from the officer *in whose possession it is, that officer having no legal right to withhold it from him; and if it be withheld, he has a consequent right to appeal to the laws of his country for relief.

To what court can this appeal be made? The common law courts of the United States have no jurisdiction in the case. They can afford him no relief. The party might, indeed, institute a suit for redress in the District Court acting as an admiralty and revenue court; and such court might award restitution of the property unlawfully detained. But the act of Congress neither expressly nor by implication forbids the state courts to take cognizance of suits instituted for property in possession of an officer of the United States not detained under some law of the United States; consequently, their jurisdiction remains. Had this action been brought for the vessel instead of the cargo, the case would have been essentially different. The detention would have been by virtue of an act of Congress, and the jurisdiction of a state court could not have been sustained. But the action having been brought for the cargo, to detain which the law gave no authority, it was triable in the state court.

The same course of reasoning which sustains the jurisdiction of the court of Rhode Island sustains also its judgment on the plea in bar. The two pleas contain the same matter; the one concluding to the jurisdiction of the court, and the other in bar of the action. In examining the plea to the jurisdiction, it has been shown that the officer had no legal right to detain the [13*] property; consequently, his plea was *no sufficient defense, and the court misconstrued no act of Congress, nor committed any error in sustaining the demurrer.

Judgment affirmed with costs.

GREENLEAF v. COOK.

Where a promissory note was given for the purchase of real property, held that the failure of consideration through defect of title must be total, in order to constitute a good defense to an action on the note.

Quære, Whether, after receiving a deed, the party could avail himself even of a total failure of consideration.

But where the note is given with full knowledge of the extent of the incumbrance, and the party thus consents to receive the title, its defect is no legal bar to an action on the note.

Any partial defect in the title or the deed is not inquirable into by a court of law in an action on the note; but the party must seek relief in chancery.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States, for the District of Columbia.

NOTE.—Rawle on Covenants for Title, says: "In Greenleaf v. Cook, supra, the defence of a failure of title, to a note given for the purchase money of land, seems to have been excluded with entire propriety, as nothing in the report of the case shows that the deed contained any covenants whatever; and, from what was said in the decision as to the alleged defectiveness of the deed, it is possible that the absence of covenants was referred to. There was a prior mortgage on the premises, under which a decree of foreclosure had been pronounced, but the possession had never been disturbed.

"It may be observed of this case, which, upon the facts presented, was most correctly decided, that at that time the law was far from being settled as to the right of the purchaser thus to defend himself, and the true basis of the decision seems to rest not so much upon any distinction between a total and partial failure of consideration as on the ground that there being no covenants in the deed, the purchaser had already obtained what, from the absence of these covenants, a court of law must presume he bargained for, viz., the mere transfer of the vendor's title, such as it was, without any recourse to him in the event of its turning out defective; and hence the question of consideration was not touched—nor, if the deed had contained a covenant of warranty, or for quiet enjoy-

James Greenleaf instituted a suit in that court on a promissory note executed by the defendant, who pleaded the general issue. On the trial the defendant gave in evidence a deed executed by Pratt, Francis and others, by James Greenleaf, their attorney, *convey- [*14] ing to him a lot of ground in the city of Washington, for the purchase of which the promissory note in the declaration mentioned was given. He also gave in evidence a deed from Morris, Nicholson and others, to Thomas Law, purporting to be a mortgage of a great number of squares and lots in the city of Washington, and among others, of the square comprehending the lot purchased by the defendant, together with the proceedings in a suit in chancery, instituted by the said Thomas Law against Pratt, Francis and others, in which a decree of foreclosure was pronounced. He then produced a witness who proved that at the time of the sale the lot was not, in his opinion, exclusive of improvements, worth more than the sum mentioned in the note.

Upon this testimony, the counsel for the defendant moved the court to instruct the jury, that if they believed the testimony, the law was for the defendant; which instruction the court refused to give, the judges being divided in opinion thereon. The counsel for the plaintiff then moved the court to instruct the jury that the law was for the plaintiff; which opinion the court also refused to give, being still divided.

The counsel for the plaintiff then produced testimony to prove that the lot of ground, in payment for which the promissory note mentioned in the declaration was given, had been sold to a certain John Bickly, who took possession thereof, and resided thereon during his life; that after his death, his widow continued to reside thereon until she intermarried *with [*15] the defendant, and that the defendant still resides thereon. That previous to the execution of the promissory note, on which this suit is instituted, he received full and complete information of the deed of mortgage in the foregoing bill of exceptions mentioned, and of the probable effect of that deed. That with this knowledge, after consultation and mature consideration, he received the deed for the lot, and gave ment, could the result have been different, for, as there had been no eviction, the purchaser would not have been entitled at that time to damages." Rawle on Covenants for title, 495, 496, 497.

"Ten years after the decision in Greenleaf v. Cook, it was held by the same tribunal, in Thornton v. Wynn, 12 Wheat. 183, that a breach of warranty of a chattel was no defense to an action on a note given for its price, if the sale were absolute, and there was no subsequent agreement on the part of the vendor to take back the article; but very recently, in the cases of Withers v. Green, 9 How. 213, and Van Buren v. Diggs, 11 Id. 461, this doctrine has been much modified, if not overruled." Rawle on Cov. for title, 496, note.

In Scudder v. Andrews, 2 McLean, 464, the facts were very similar to those presented in Greenleaf v. Cook, but the decision was the other way. There the action was on a note given for the price of a tract of land, and the defense set up, was failure of consideration, in that the land sold was part of the public domain, and had never been sold or offered for sale by the United States, and it was held that the defense amounted to a total failure of consideration and was good. See Rawle on Cov. for title, 497, note 1.

In Frisbie v. Hoffnagle, 11 John. (N. Y.) 50, decided in 1814, where in an action on two notes given his promissory note for the purchase money. He then moved the court to instruct the jury that, if they believed the facts thus stated on testimony, the plaintiff was entitled to recover in this action. But the court, being again divided, refused to give the opinion required.

The counsel for the plaintiff took exceptions to the proceedings of the court in each point, in not giving their opinions as asked. The jury found a verdict for the defendant, upon which judgment was rendered, and the cause came before this court on a writ of error.

Jones, for the plaintiff in error, argued, that where a party purchases real property, without fraud on the part of the vendor, the vendee takes it at his own risk, unless he has a warranty against the acts of all the world. That there is no distinction between a direct action to recover back the purchase money, and a defense for want of consideration. In this case there is no eviction, but a mere contingent incumbrance only, proper for the exclusive cognizance of a court of equity, which court may [16*] decree a specific performance, or compensation, as its justice may require.¹

Law, contra, contended, that if this were a case of an express agreement to take any or no title, the doctrine cited from Sugden would apply; but that here the vendor promised to give the vendee a clear and unincumbered title. A court of chancery will never decree a specific performance without a perfect title at law and in equity; and the defense on account of defect of title is as available in the one forum as the other.²

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court, and after stating the facts, proceeded as follows:

On the first exception it has been argued that there is a failure of consideration, which constitutes a good defense in this action.

Without deciding whether, after receiving a deed, the defendant could avail himself of even

2.—2 Comyn on Cont. 52.

a total failure of consideration, the court is of opinion that to make it a good defense, in any case, the failure must be total. The prior mortgage of the premises, and the decree of foreclosure, do not produce a total failure of consideration. The equity of redemption may be worth something: this court cannot say how much; nor is the inquiry a proper *one [*17 in a court of law in an action on the note. If the defendant be entitled to any relief it is not in this action.

But if any doubt could exist on the first exception, there is none on the second. The note was given with full knowledge of the case. Acquainted with the extent of the incumbrance; and its probable consequences, the defendant consents to receive the title which the plaintiff was able to make, and on receiving it, executes his note for the purchase money. To the payment of a note given under such circumstances, the existence of the incumbrance can certainly furnish no legal objection.

It has also been said that the deed is defective. If it be, the defendant may require a proper deed, and it is not impossible but there may be circumstances which would induce a court of equity to enjoin this judgment until a proper deed be made. But the objections to the deed cannot be examined in this action.

*Judgment reversed.*³

*JUDGMENT.—This cause came on to be [*18 heard on the transcript of the record of the Circuit Court of the United States for the County of Washington, and was argued by counsel. All

3—By the French law, the price of the sale of real property cannot be recovered by the vendor, if the vendee has been disturbed (troublé) in his possession, by prior incumbrances, or has just ground for apprehension on that account, until the litigation concerning them is terminated; unless, indeed, the vendor gives sufficient security to indemnify the vendee in case of eviction. Pothier de Vente, n. 280. Code Napoleon, liv. 3, tit. 6, chap. 5, n. 1653. For the various distinctions in our law as to where the vendee may detain the purchase money, if incumbrances are discovered previously to the payment of it, and to what relief he is entitled if evicted after the money is actually paid, see Sugden's Law of Vendors, as above cited, which contains a complete digest of the cases in equity on this subject.

for the purchase money of land sold with a covenant of warranty, the defendant proved that the land had subsequently been sold under a judgment against the plaintiff, and a sheriff's deed made to the purchaser, and although it was also in evidence that the defendant had not been evicted or disturbed in his possession, the court ordered a nonsuit. On a motion for a new trial, the case was submitted without argument, and in refusing a new trial the court held, "The consideration of the note has entirely failed, for the defendant has no title, it having been extinguished by the sale under the judgment. Here is a total, not a partial, failure of consideration, for although the defendant has not been evicted by the purchaser under the sheriff's sale, he is liable to be so, and will be responsible for the mesne profits. To allow a recovery in this case would lead to a circuitry of action, for the defendant, on this failure of title, would be entitled to immediately recover back the money. The motion to set aside the nonsuit must therefore be denied."

Cases of Frisbie v. Hoffnagle, decided after Latitia v. Vail, 17 Wend. 188, in New York, substantially overruled by it. The defendant, on being sued for the purchase money of real estate, which had been conveyed with a covenant against incumbrances, pleaded the existence of a prior mortgage which was a lien on the property. The court held that although the covenant was broken as soon as made, yet as the defendant had not paid off the mortgage, or averred any special damage by reason of its existence, he would be at that time entitled to no more than nominal damages, and hence the defense could not be made available to him. Rawle on Cov. for title, 493, 497, 498.

Kent says: "In Frisbie v. Hoffnagle, the purchaser, in a suit at law upon his note given to the vendor for the purchase money, was allowed to show in his defense, in avoidance of the note, a total failure of title, notwithstanding he had taken a deed with full covenants, and had not been evicted. But the authority of that case and the doctrine of it, were much impaired by the Supreme Court in Maine, in a subsequent case, founded on like circumstances (Lloyd v. Jewell, 1 Greenl. R. 352); and they were afterwards in a degree restored, by the doubts thrown over the last decision by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in Knapp v. Lee (3 Pick. 452), the same defense was made to a promissory note in the case of Greenleaf v. Cook (2 Wheat. 13), and it was overruled on the ground that the title to the land, for the consideration of which the note was given, had only partially failed; and it

OF THE
Supreme Court of the United States.
FEBRUARY TERM, 1817.

1*] *[CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.]

SLOCUM v. MAYBERRY ET AL.

The courts of the United States have exclusive jurisdiction of all seizures made on land or water, for a breach of the laws of the United States; and any intervention of a state authority which, by taking the thing seized out of the hands of the United States officer, might obstruct the exercise of this jurisdiction, is unlawful.

In such a case, the court of the United States, having cognizance of the seizure, may enforce a redelivery of the thing, by attachment, or other summary process.

The question under such a seizure, whether a forfeiture has been actually incurred, belongs exclusively to the courts of the United States, and it depends upon the final decree of such courts whether the seizure is to be deemed rightful or tortious.

If the seizing officer refuse to institute proceedings to ascertain the forfeiture, the District Court may, upon application of the aggrieved party, compel the officer to proceed to adjudication, or to abandon the seizure.

And if the seizure be finally adjudged wrongful, and without probable cause, the party may proceed, at his election, by a suit at common law, or in the Instance Court of Admiralty, for damages for the illegal act.

But the common law remedy in such a case must be sought for in the state courts. the courts of the United States having no jurisdiction to decide on the conduct of their officers, in the execution of their laws, in suits at common law, until the case shall have passed through the state courts.

Where a seizure was made, under the eleventh section of the embargo act of April, 1808, it was determined that no power is given by law to detain the cargo if separated from the vessel, and that the owner had a right to take the cargo out of the vessel, and to dispose of it in any way not prohibited by law; and in case of its detention, to bring an action of replevin therefor in the state court.

ERROR on a judgment rendered by the Supreme Court for the state of Rhode Island.

John Slocum, the plaintiff in error, was surveyor of the customs for the port of Newport, in Rhode Island, and under the directions of the collector had seized the Venus, lying in that port with a cargo ostensibly bound to some other port in the United States. The defendants in error, who were owners of the cargo, brought their writ of replevin in the state court of Rhode Island for the restoration of the property. The defendant pleaded that the Venus was laden in the night, not under the inspection of the proper revenue officers; and that the collector of the port, suspecting an intention to violate the embargo laws, had directed him to seize and detain her till the opinion of the President should be known [*3] on the case; and concluded to the jurisdiction of the court. The same matter was also pleaded in bar. To both these pleas the plaintiff in the state court demurred, and the defendants joined in demurrer. Judgment having been rendered in favor of the plaintiff in the state court, the cause was removed into this court by writ of error.

The Attorney-General, for the plaintiff in error. 1. The seizure was well made under the eleventh section of the embargo act of the 25th of April, 1808. The nature and extent of the power vested in the revenue officers was settled in the case of Crowell v. M'Fadon.¹ Even admitting that, according to the doctrine held in the case of The Paulina,² the landing without a permit, contrary to the second section, does not work a forfeiture (the denial of a clearance being the only penalty), still the efficacy of the eleventh section justifies and protects the officer. 2. The case being brought under the cognizance of the United States, and within the jurisdiction of their courts, by the just exercise of an authority by one of their officers, the state court had no right to interfere, and arrest the seizure by its process. In the case of The Favorite,³ three of the judges held that "the conduct of the salvors in taking the goods out of the possession of the revenue officers, though by legal process, was improper." This intimation is the stronger as the wrecked [*4] goods were adjudged not liable to duties; and it is fortified by the opinion of a learned judge in the Supreme Court of New York, upon an analogous question.⁴

of a writ of habeas corpus, directed to John Christie, a lieutenant-colonel in the army of the United States, to bring up the body of Jeremiah Ferguson, founded upon an affidavit of his father, stating that he was an enlisted soldier in the 13th regiment of infantry in the army of the United States, then under the command of Christie, and that the said Jeremiah Ferguson was an infant under the age of

5*] Hunter, contra. 1. It is conceded that the opinion or suspicion of the collector authorized him to detain any vessel, ostensibly bound with a cargo to some port of the United States, until the pleasure of the President should be known. This is not a replevin for the vessel. As to that, the owners submitted to the suspicion of the collector, and the pleasure of the President; but as to the cargo, neither of these officers had, by law, the power of detaining it. A momentary and unavoidable detention of the cargo, incidental to the seizure of the vessel, might indeed be deemed a necessary consequence of an undeniable power; but could never give the seizing officer a right to continue the detention of the cargo after the vessel was securely detained. Cargo, in the revenue laws, in the law of prize, and in questions of salvage, insurance, and freight, is contra-distinguished from vessel. The system of the embargo laws was intended to prevent exportation; and, in order to accomplish this only, they authorized the detention of the vessel, without which no exportation could take place. Even the vessel was not forfeited, but detained; and the cargo was neither forfeited nor detained, but left in the possession of the owners, to be freely consumed at home. The laws of the United States having then exerted their energy, and performed their office, the subsequent proceedings were illegal. In the case of Crowell v. M'Fadon, the action was trover. Lucrative damages were sought, for a conversion proved not to be wrongful, but assented to by the party. Here the 6*] action is replevin, and the *party only seeks to retain what is universally admitted to be his property. Incommoda ritantis quam commoda petentis melior est causa. 2. The plea to the jurisdiction of the state court is fatally defective in not stating another jurisdiction.¹ 3. But even supposing the decision of this court must be against the jurisdiction of the state court, no judgment can be pronounced upon that basis. The thing in controversy cannot be restored to the plaintiff in error, for he never owned or claimed it; and the authority of *The Paulina*² is sufficient to dissipate the mistaken notion of a forfeiture to the United States. No collision between the state and national judicatures can, therefore, arise. Even if the state court has improperly interfered, it is, at the worst, an innocent officiousness; since that court has determined the question precisely as the national tribunals would have done, and has merely anticipated the beneficence they intended. The mischief that the common law writ of prohibition seeks to remedy is the inconvenience of having the same question determined different ways, according to the court in which the suit is depending. But if it be shown to the court trying a suggestion in prohibition, that the question has been, or must be, determined exactly as the appropriate court would determine it, its merely being drawn at aliud examen would not be a sufficient ground for issuing the writ of prohibition.³ *No usur- [*7 pation can be ultimately successful against the national jurisdiction. The very clause of the judiciary act of 1789, sec. 25 by which the cause is brought here, shows that this jurisdiction is amply armed for self-defense. But this transaction does not present anything for the judicial powers of the United States to act upon. The case of The Favorite was a question of salvage, depending, as such questions always do, upon personal merit and propriety of conduct. A severe assertion even of legal right may, in many instances, amount to demerit. In the case of Mr. Soderstrom,⁴ the very words of the ninth section of the judiciary act expressly excluded the state courts from jurisdiction. In that case there was a personal privilege in the consul, and an absolute disability in the court. The dictum of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of New York, in the case of Ferguson, was disclaimed by the rest of the court, although under the particular circumstances of the case they declined to interfere. Unless the state tribunals have a right to interfere with the aid of their preventive process, in a case where the national jurisdiction has not lawfully attached, property detained under color of authority may be dissipated by rapacious profusion, because a timely replevin could not be interposed.

The Attorney-General, in reply. 1. The plea of the defendant in the court below covers both the vessel and the cargo, and being demurred to, its facts *are admitted. Both must be [*8 detained, where they are seized contemporaneously; and to permit a subsequent transshipment of the cargo from the vessel where it was found, in delicto, to another, would be to defeat the policy of the law. In the case of Otis v. Watkins,⁵ both vessel and cargo were removed from Provincetown to Barnstable, yet the conduct of the collector was held justified. 2. The rule, that he who pleads to the jurisdiction ought to give it to some other court, must be taken with the proper qualifications. Another jurisdiction of power under that government. The judicial power of the United States is commensurate with every case arising under the laws of the Union; and the act of Congress (1 Laws of the United States, 53, 55) gives to the federal courts, exclusively of the courts of the several states, cognizance of all crimes and offenses cognizable under the authority of the United States." The other judges concurred in refusing to allow the habeas corpus, deeming that a question of sound legal discretion; but reserved themselves as to the jurisdiction of the state courts.

must be shown, where it exists, or is intended to be claimed over the subject-matter of the suit. But here it was intended only to except to the officious, unlawful jurisdiction of that court where the officer was impleaded. 3. The plea of the defendant in the court below is not an avowry, which goes for a restitution of the thing in controversy; he merely makes cognizance, acknowledges the taking, but justifies under the law, and the orders of the collector. Hence the argument, that a reversal of the judgment below would imply a restitution of the cargo to the seizing officer as his property, is inapplicable. Where, from the circumstances of the case it was lawful to take, and yet, from intervening events, unlawful to detain, the defendant cannot be entitled to a return.¹ The seizure, in this case, though it looked to no direct forfeiture or even to a trial, yet, being a necessary incident to a seizure, having in view 9*] a forfeiture, *it falls within the scope of the 9th section of the judiciary act as fairly as the cases positively enumerated; and a contrary determination would efface from the statute book those preventive means by which a complexity of litigation is avoided.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court, and, after stating the facts, proceeded as follows:

In considering this case, the first question which presents itself is this: Has the constitution, or any law of the United States, been violated or misconstrued by the court of Rhode Island in exercising its jurisdiction in this cause?

The judiciary act gives to the federal courts exclusive cognizance of all seizures made on land or water. Any intervention of a state authority which, by taking the thing seized out of the possession of the officer of the United States, might obstruct the exercise of this jurisdiction, would unquestionably be a violation of the act; and the federal court having cognizance of the seizure, might enforce a redelivery of the thing by attachment or other summary process against the parties who should divest such a possession. The party supposing himself aggrieved by a seizure cannot, because he considers it tortious, replevy the property out of the custody of the seizing officer, or of the court having cognizance of the cause. If the officer has a right, under the laws of the United States, to seize for a supposed forfeiture, the question, whether that forfeiture has been actually incurred, belongs exclusively to the *federal courts, and cannot be drawn to another forum; and it depends upon the final decree of such courts whether such seizure is to be deemed rightful or tortious. If the seizing officer should refuse to institute proceedings to ascertain the forfeiture, the District Court may, upon the application of the aggrieved party, compel the officer to proceed to adjudication, or to abandon the seizure. And if the seizure be finally adjudged wrongful, and without reasonable cause, he may proceed, at his election, by a suit at common law, or in the admiralty for damages for the illegal act. Yet, even in that case, any remedy which the law may afford to the party supposing himself to be aggrieved, other than such as might be obtained in a court of admiralty, could be prosecuted only in the state court. The common law tribunals of the United States are closed against such applications, were the party disposed to make them. Congress has refused to the courts of the Union the power of deciding on the conduct of their officers in the execution of their laws, in suits at common law, until the case shall have passed through the state courts, and have received the form which may there be given it. This, however, being an action which takes the thing itself out of the possession of the officer, could certainly not be maintained in a state court, if, by the act of Congress, it was seized for the purpose of being proceeded against in the federal court.

A very brief examination of the act of Congress will be sufficient for the inquiry whether this cargo was so seized. The second section of the act, *pleaded by the defendant in [*11 the original action, only withholds a clearance from a vessel which has committed the offense described in that section. This seizure was made under the 11th section, which enacts, "that the collectors of the customs be, and they are hereby respectively authorized to detain any vessel ostensibly bound with a cargo to some other port of the United States, whenever, in their opinion, the intention is to violate or evade any of the provisions of the acts laying an embargo, until the decision of the President of the United States be had thereupon."

The authority given respects the vessel only. The cargo is in no manner the object of the act. It is arrested in its course to any other port, by the detention of the vessel in which it was to be carried; but no right is given to seize it specifically, or to detain it if separated from that vessel. It remains in custody of the officer, simply because it is placed in a vessel which is in his custody; but no law forbids it to be taken out of that vessel, if such be the will of the owner. The cargoes thus arrested and detained were generally of a perishable nature, and it would have been wanton oppression to expose them to loss by unlimited detention, in a case where the owner was willing to remove all danger of exportation.

This being the true construction of the act of Congress, the owner has the same right to his cargo that he has to any other property, and may exercise over it every act of ownership not prohibited by law. He may, consequently, demand it from the officer *in whose possession it is, that officer having no legal right to withhold it from him; and if it be withheld, he has a consequent right to appeal to the laws of his country for relief.

To what court can this appeal be made? The common law courts of the United States have no jurisdiction in the case. They can afford him no relief. The party might, indeed, institute a suit for redress in the District Court acting as an admiralty and revenue court; and such court might award restitution of the property unlawfully detained. But the act of Congress neither expressly nor by implication forbids the state courts to take cognizance of suits instituted for property in possession of an officer of the United States not detained under some law of the United States; consequently, their jurisdiction remains. Had this action been brought for the vessel instead of the cargo, the case would have been essentially different. The detention would have been by virtue of an act of Congress, and the jurisdiction of a state court could not have been sustained. But the action having been brought for the cargo, to detain which the law gave no authority, it was triable in the state court.

The same course of reasoning which sustains the jurisdiction of the court of Rhode Island sustains also its judgment on the plea in bar. The two pleas contain the same matter; the one concluding to the jurisdiction of the court, and the other in bar of the action. In examining the plea to the jurisdiction, it has been shown that the officer had no legal right to detain the [13*] property; consequently, his plea was *no sufficient defense, and the court misconstrued no act of Congress, nor committed any error in sustaining the demurrer.

Judgment affirmed with costs.

GREENLEAF v. COOK.

Where a promissory note was given for the purchase of real property, held that the failure of consideration through defect of title must be total, in order to constitute a good defense to an action on the note.

Quære, Whether, after receiving a deed, the party could avail himself even of a total failure of consideration.

But where the note is given with full knowledge of the extent of the incumbrance, and the party thus consents to receive the title, its defect is no legal bar to an action on the note.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States, for the District of Columbia.

James Greenleaf instituted a suit in that court on a promissory note executed by the defendant, who pleaded the general issue. On the trial the defendant gave in evidence a deed executed by Pratt, Francis and others, by James Greenleaf, their attorney, *convey- [*14] ing to him a lot of ground in the city of Washington, for the purchase of which the promissory note in the declaration mentioned was given. He also gave in evidence a deed from Morris, Nicholson and others, to Thomas Law, purporting to be a mortgage of a great number of squares and lots in the city of Washington, and among others, of the square comprehending the lot purchased by the defendant, together with the proceedings in a suit in chancery, instituted by the said Thomas Law against Pratt, Francis and others, in which a decree of foreclosure was pronounced. He then produced a witness who proved that at the time of the sale the lot was not, in his opinion, exclusive of improvements, worth more than the sum mentioned in the note.

Upon this testimony, the counsel for the defendant moved the court to instruct the jury, that if they believed the testimony, the law was for the defendant; which instruction the court refused to give, the judges being divided in opinion thereon. The counsel for the plaintiff then moved the court to instruct the jury that the law was for the plaintiff; which opinion the court also refused to give, being still divided.

The counsel for the plaintiff then produced testimony to prove that the lot of ground, in payment for which the promissory note mentioned in the declaration was given, had been sold to a certain John Bickly, who took possession thereof, and resided thereon during his life; that after his death, his widow continued to reside thereon until she intermarried *with [*15] the defendant, and that the defendant still resides thereon. That previous to the execution of the promissory note, on which this suit is instituted, he received full and complete information of the deed of mortgage in the foregoing bill of exceptions mentioned, and of the probable effect of that deed. That with this knowledge, after consultation and mature consideration, he received the deed for the lot, and gave

NOTE.—Rawle on Covenants for Title, says: "In Greenleaf v. Cook, supra, the defence of a failure of title, to a note given for the purchase money of land, seems to have been excluded with entire propriety, as nothing in the report of the case shows that the deed contained any covenants whatever; and, from what was said in the decision as to the alleged defectiveness of the deed, it is possible that the absence of covenants was referred to. There was a prior mortgage on the premises, under which a decree of foreclosure had been pronounced, but the possession had never been disturbed.

"It may be observed of this case, which, upon the facts presented, was most correctly decided, that at that time the law was far from being settled as to the right of the purchaser thus to defend himself, and the true basis of the decision seems to rest not so much upon any distinction between a total and partial failure of consideration as on the ground that there being no covenants in the deed, the purchaser had already obtained what, from the absence of these covenants, a court of law must presume he bargained for, viz., the mere transfer of the vendor's title, such as it was, without any recourse to him in the event of its turning out defective; and hence the question of consideration was not touched—nor, if the deed had contained a covenant of warranty, or for quiet enjoy-

Rawle on Covenants for title, 495, 496, 497. "Ten years after the decision in Greenleaf v. Cook, it was held by the same tribunal, in Thornton v. Wynn, 12 Wheat. 183, that a breach of warranty of a chattel was no defense to an action on a note given for its price, if the sale were absolute, and there was no subsequent agreement on the part of the vendor to take back the article; but very recently, in the cases of Withers v. Green, 9 How. 213, and Van Buren v. Diggs, 11 Id. 461, this doctrine has been much modified, if not overruled." Rawle on Cov. for title, 496, note.

In Scudder v. Andrews, 2 McLean, 464, the facts were very similar to those presented in Greenleaf v. Cook, but the decision was the other way. There the action was on a note given for the price of a tract of land, and the defense set up, was failure of consideration, in that the land sold was part of the public domain, and had never been sold or offered for sale by the United States, and it was held that the defense amounted to a total failure of consideration and was good. See Rawle on Cov. for title, 497, note 1.

In Frisbie v. Hoffnagle, 11 John. (N. Y.) 50, decided in 1814, where in an action on two notes given his promissory note for the purchase money. He then moved the court to instruct the jury that, if they believed the facts thus stated on testimony, the plaintiff was entitled to recover in this action. But the court, being again divided, refused to give the opinion required.

The counsel for the plaintiff took exceptions to the proceedings of the court in each point, in not giving their opinions as asked. The jury found a verdict for the defendant, upon which judgment was rendered, and the cause came before this court on a writ of error.

Jones, for the plaintiff in error, argued, that where a party purchases real property, without fraud on the part of the vendor, the vendee takes it at his own risk, unless he has a warranty against the acts of all the world. That there is no distinction between a direct action to recover back the purchase money, and a defense for want of consideration. In this case there is no eviction, but a mere contingent incumbrance only, proper for the exclusive cognizance of a court of equity, which court may [16*] decree a specific performance, or compensation, as its justice may require.¹

Law, contra, contended, that if this were a case of an express agreement to take any or no title, the doctrine cited from Sugden would apply; but that here the vendor promised to give the vendee a clear and unincumbered title. A court of chancery will never decree a specific performance without a perfect title at law and in equity; and the defense on account of defect of title is as available in the one forum as the other.²

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court, and after stating the facts, proceeded as follows:

On the first exception it has been argued that there is a failure of consideration, which constitutes a good defense in this action.

Without deciding whether, after receiving a deed, the defendant could avail himself of even

2.—2 Comyn on Cont. 52.

a total failure of consideration, the court is of opinion that to make it a good defense, in any case, the failure must be total. The prior mortgage of the premises, and the decree of foreclosure, do not produce a total failure of consideration. The equity of redemption may be worth something: this court cannot say how much; nor is the inquiry a proper *one [*17 in a court of law in an action on the note. If the defendant be entitled to any relief it is not in this action.

But if any doubt could exist on the first exception, there is none on the second. The note was given with full knowledge of the case. Acquainted with the extent of the incumbrance; and its probable consequences, the defendant consents to receive the title which the plaintiff was able to make, and on receiving it, executes his note for the purchase money. To the payment of a note given under such circumstances, the existence of the incumbrance can certainly furnish no legal objection.

It has also been said that the deed is defective. If it be, the defendant may require a proper deed, and it is not impossible but there may be circumstances which would induce a court of equity to enjoin this judgment until a proper deed be made. But the objections to the deed cannot be examined in this action.

*JUDGMENT.—This cause came on to be [*18 heard on the transcript of the record of the Circuit Court of the United States for the County of Washington, and was argued by counsel. All

3—By the French law, the price of the sale of real property cannot be recovered by the vendor, if the vendee has been disturbed (troublé) in his possession, by prior incumbrances, or has just ground for apprehension on that account, until the litigation concerning them is terminated; unless, indeed, the vendor gives sufficient security to indemnify the vendee in case of eviction. Pothier de Vente, n. 280. Code Napoleon, Liv. 3, tit. 6, chap. 5, n. 1653. For the various distinctions in our law as to where the vendee may detain the purchase money, if incumbrances are discovered previously to the payment of it, and to what relief he is entitled if evicted after the money is actually paid, see Sugden's Law of Vendors, as above cited, which contains a complete digest of the cases in equity on this subject.

for the purchase money of land sold with a covenant of warranty, the defendant proved that the land had subsequently been sold under a judgment against the plaintiff, and a sheriff's deed made to the purchaser, and although it was also in evidence that the defendant had not been evicted or disturbed in his possession, the court ordered a nonsuit. On a motion for a new trial, the case was submitted without argument, and in refusing a new trial the court held, "The consideration of the note has entirely failed, for the defendant has no title, it having been extinguished by the sale under the judgment. Here is a total, not a partial, failure of consideration, for although the defendant has not been evicted by the purchaser under the sheriff's sale, he is liable to be so, and will be responsible for the mesne profits. To allow a recovery in this case would lead to a circuitry of action, for the defendant, on this failure of title, would be entitled to immediately recover back the money. The motion to set aside the nonsuit must therefore be denied."

Cases of Frisbie v. Hoffnagle, decided after Latin v. Vail, 17 Wend. 188, in New York, substantially overruled by it. The defendant, on being sued for the purchase money of real estate, which had been conveyed with a covenant against incumbrances, pleaded the existence of a prior mortgage which was a lien on the property. The court held that although the covenant was broken as soon as made, yet as the defendant had not paid off the mortgage, or averred any special damage by reason of its existence, he would be at that time entitled to no more than nominal damages, and hence the defense could not be made available to him. Rawle on Cov. for title, 493, 497, 498.

Kent says: "In Frisbie v. Hoffnagle, the purchaser, in a suit at law upon his note given to the vendor for the purchase money, was allowed to show in his defense, in avoidance of the note, a total failure of title, notwithstanding he had taken a deed with full covenants, and had not been evicted. But the authority of that case and the doctrine of it, were much impaired by the Supreme Court in Maine, in a subsequent case, founded on like circumstances (Lloyd v. Jewell, 1 Greenl. R. 352); and they were afterwards in a degree restored, by the doubts thrown over the last decision by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in Knapp v. Lee (3 Pick. 452), the same defense was made to a promissory note in the case of Greenleaf v. Cook (2 Wheat. 13), and it was overruled on the ground that the title to the land, for the consideration of which the note was given, had only partially failed; and it which being seen and considered, it is the opinion of this court that there is error in the proceedings of the said Circuit Court, in this, that the said court refused to instruct the jury on the application of the counsel for the plaintiff, that on the facts given in evidence to them, if believed, the plaintiff was entitled to recover in that action; wherefore it is considered by this court that the said judgment of the said Circuit Court be reversed and annulled, and that the cause be remanded to the said court to be proceeded in according to law.

[COMMON LAW.]

OTIS v. WALTER.

In seizures under the embargo laws, the law itself is a sufficient justification to the seizing officer where the discharge of duty is the real motive, and not the pretext for detention, and it is not necessary to show probable cause.

But the embargo act of the 25th of April, 1808, related only to vessels ostensibly bound to some port in the United States, and a seizure after the termination of the voyage is unjustifiable; and no further detention of the cargo is lawful than what is necessarily dependent on the detention of the vessel.

It is not indispensable to the termination of a voyage that the vessel should arrive at the terminus of her original destination; but it may be produced by stranding, stress of weather, or any other cause [20*] inducing her to enter another port with a view to terminate her voyage bona fide.

But if a vessel, not actually arriving at her port of original destination, excites an honest suspicion in the mind of the collector that her demand of a permit to land the cargo was merely colorable, this is not a termination of the voyage so as to preclude the right of detention.

ERROR to the Supreme Judicial Court of the State of Massachusetts.

This was an action of trover brought in the state court, in which Walter, the plaintiff in that court, recovered of Otis, the defendant in that court, damages for the conversion of sundry articles constituting the cargo of a vessel called the Ten Sisters. The defendant in the court below, collector of the port of Barnstable, in Massachusetts, had detained the vessel under suspicion of an intention to violate the embargo laws, particularly the act of the 25th of April, 1808, sec. 6 and 11. The vessel sailed from Ipswich with a cargo of flour, tar, and rice, in order to carry the same to Barnstable, or to a place called Bass River, in Yarmouth; and proceeded to Hyannis, in the collection district of Barnstable. On her arrival there, the master applied to the collector for a permit to land the cargo, which was refused by the latter, who shortly afterwards seized and detained the vessel under the above-mentioned acts. This detention was given in evidence as a defense to the action under the general issue, and the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts instructed the jury "that the said several matters and things, so allowed and proved, *were not sufficient to bar the plaintiff of [*20 his said action, nor did they constitute or amount to any defense whatever in the action," &c. Whereupon the jury found a verdict, and the court rendered a judgment for the plaintiff.

The Attorney-General, for the plaintiff in error, argued, that this case fell under the principal of that of Crowell v. M'Fadon,¹ and it would appear that the vessel was in itinere; but that even if this were not the state of the case, the jury ought to have been left to make their own inference from the facts, and not to have been charged by the judge that no defense whatever was made out.

Read, for the defendant in error, contended, that the case of *Otis v. Bacon*² was perfectly in point, and showed that the vessel, having arrived at her port of discharge, was no longer within the operation of the embargo laws; and that if the collector's defense was not completely made out—if it was, in any respect, materially defective, it was not made out at all.

JOHNSON, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of trover, brought in the State Court of Massachusetts, in which was said, that to make it a good defense in any case, the failure of title must be total.

1.—3 Cranch, 94.

2.—8 Cranch, 589.

"This case at Washington is contrary to the defense set up and allowed, and to the principle established in the case of Gray v. Handkinson (1 Bay's Rep. 278), but it seems to be supported by the case of Day v. Nix (9 Moore's R. 159), where it was decided, by the English court of C. B., that a partial failure of the consideration of a note was no defense, provided the quantum of damages arising upon the failure was not susceptible of definite computation.

"The cases are in opposition to each other, and they leave the question how far and to what extent a failure of title will be a good defense, as between the original parties to an action for the consideration money on a contract of sale, in a state of painful uncertainty. I apprehend that in sales of land the technical rule remits the party back to his covenants in his deed; and if there be no ingredient of fraud in the case, and the party has not had the precaution to secure himself by covenants, he has no remedy for his money even on a failure of title. This is the strict English rule, both in law and in equity; and applies equally to chattels, when the vendor sells without any avowment of title and without possession. Roswell v. Vaughn, Cro. Jac. 196; Medina v. Stoughton, 1 Salk. Rep. 211; Bree v. Holbreck, Doug. R. 654; Johnson

v. Johnson, 3 Bos. & Pul. 170; Sugden on Vendors, 346, 347; 4 Cruise's Dig. 90; Coop. Eq. R. 311. In sales of chattels the purchaser cannot resist payment in cases free from fraud, while the contract continues open, and he has possession. But in this country the rule has received very considerable relaxation. In respect to lands, the same rule has been considered to be the law in New York (Frost v. Raymond, 2 Caines' R. 188); while on the other hand, in South Carolina, their courts of equity will allow a party suffering by the failure of title, in a case without warranty, to recover back the purchase money, in the sale of real as well as of personal estates." Tucker v. Gordon, 4 Eq. Rep. So. Car. 53, 58; 2 Kent's Com. 472, 473.

It is now settled in the New York decisions, that on a partial failure of a consideration on a sale of goods the defendant may recoupe his damages, on a breach of the plaintiff's contract of warranty. Reab v. McAllister, 8 Wendell, 109; Still v. Hall, 2 Wendell, 51; Batterman v. Pierce, 3 Hill, 171.

The case of Frisbie v. Hoffnagle has been virtually overruled in Vibbard v. Johnson, 19 Johnson, 77, and it is now not regarded as authority. See Whitney v. Lewis, 21 Wendell, 132, 134.

By the Code of N. Y., sec. 501, any cause of action arising out of the contract or transaction alleged, which tends to diminish or defeat a recovery, may be set up as a counterclaim.

Walter, the plaintiff in that court, recovered of Otis damages for the conversion of sundry articles constituting the cargo of a vessel called the Ten Sisters.

21*] *Otis, the collector of Barnstable, had detained the vessel under suspicion of an intention to violate the embargo laws. (Act of the 25th of April, 1808, sec. 6 and 11.)

It has already been decided, in such cases, that it is not necessary to show probable cause; that the law confides in the discretion of the collector, and is, in itself, a sufficient justification, when the discharge of duty is the real motive, and not the pretext for detention. But it has also been decided that the law relates only to vessels ostensibly bound to some port in the United States: that a seizure is unjustifiable after the termination of a voyage; and that no further detention of the cargo is lawful than what is necessarily dependent upon the detention of the vessel.

In this case there was no ground for charging the collector with oppression or malversation; and the only point insisted on in the argument was, that she had actually terminated her voyage. As the clearance is not in evidence in the cause, we are obliged to take the termini of the voyage from the testimony of the captain, who swears that he sailed from Ipswich "with a cargo of tar, flour, and rice, to carry the same to Barnstable, in the county of Barnstable, or to a place called Bass River, in Yarmouth, in said county;" that he "proceeded to Hyannis, in the district of Barnstable; that on his arrival there he applied for a permit to land, which was refused by the collector, who, in a day or two afterwards, seized the vessel, and detained her under the embargo acts." Ipswich lies to the 22*] north of the peninsula *which terminates in Cape Cod; the port or bay of Barnstable on the north side of that peninsula; Bass River and Hyannis Bay on the south; all of them known as distinct places, but all lying within the county and collection district of Barnstable. And although Hyannis Bay lies within the district of Barnstable, yet to reach it in sailing from Ipswich you must pass both the town of Barnstable and the mouth of Bass River.

The defense of the collector in the state court was founded on the authority to detain vested in him by the act of Congress. The instruction of the Chief Justice of that state was in these words: "that the said several matters and things, so allowed and proved, were not sufficient to bar the plaintiff of his said action, nor did they constitute or amount to any defense whatever in the action."

Instructions couched in such general terms may serve to embarrass a court exercising appellate jurisdiction; but it is a mistake to suppose that it precludes such a court from a view of the errors which may have been committed on the trial. It has before been decided that it only obliges this court to look through the whole cause, and examine if there be nothing in it which ought to have called forth a different instruction or judgment. In this case we are of opinion that, conformably to our former decisions, the instruction given could only have been sanctioned on the supposition that the vessel had actually terminated her voyage. But here it is contended that this court stand committed by an admission *in the case of Wheat. 2.

Otis v. Bacon;¹ that a destination to Barnstable is satisfied by an arrival in Hyannis Bay.

We have looked into the record in that case, and find that it will support no such inference. It is true that Mud-hole, the place at which the vessel had arrived in that case, is in Hyannis Bay. But the question of fact did not arise, for the collector had acquiesced in the termination of the voyage there, by actually granting a permit to land. And the grant of the permit was expressly made a ground, in the state court, of the instruction to the jury. Now, it is not indispensable to the termination of the voyage that the vessel should arrive at the terminus ad quem she was destined. It may as well be produced by stranding, by stress of weather, or by any other cause inducing her to enter another port, honestly, with a view to terminate her voyage. But if a vessel, not actually arriving at her port of destination, excites an honest suspicion in the mind of the collector that her demand of a permit was merely colorable, we are of opinion that this can neither be held to be an actual or admitted termination of the voyage, so as to preclude the right of detention. Had the destination in this case been generally to Barnstable, or the town of Barnstable, there may have been some color of ground for arguing that her arrival at Hyannis was the termination of her voyage; but as the destination was expressly to Barnstable or Bass River, within the county of *Barnstable, her [*24 arrival at one or the other of those places was indispensable to the termination of her voyage, supposing her really, in fact, to have had no ulterior destination.

But a destination may be colorable, and intended only to mask an ulterior and illegal destination; and hence, we are of opinion that, unless the fact be conceded by some such unequivocal act as was done by the collector in the case of Otis v. Bacon, it is a question which ought to be left in the instruction of the court open to the jury. And that if any positive instruction on the subject had been given to the jury in this cause, it ought to have been in favor of the defendant, as the arrival in Hyannis Bay would not have been deemed a legal termination of the voyage, either on a policy of insurance, a charter-party, bottomry bond, or any other maritime contract.

A majority of the court are therefore of opinion that the court of Massachusetts erred in this case, and that the judgment ought to be reversed.

STORY, J., did not sit in this cause.

M'IVER ET AL., LESSEES, v. RAGAN ET AL.

Where the plaintiffs in ejectment claimed under a grant from the state of North Carolina, comprehending the lands for which the suit was brought, and the defendants claimed under a junior patent, and a possession of seven years, which, by the statutes of that state and Tennessee, constitutes a bar to the action, if the possession be under color of title. To repel this defense, the plaintiffs proved that no corner or course of the grant, under which they claimed, was marked, except the beginning corner; that the beginning and nearly the whole land, and all the corners, except one, were within the Cherokee Indian boundary, not having been ceded to the United States, until the year 1806, within seven years from which time the suit was brought; but the land in the defendant's possession, and for which the suit was brought, did not lie within the Indian boundary. It was held that, notwithstanding the laws of the United States prohibited all persons from surveying or marking any lands within the Indian territory, and the plaintiffs could not, therefore, survey the land granted to them, the defendants were entitled to hold the part possessed by them for the period of seven years under color of title.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of West Tennessee.

The plaintiffs in error brought an ejectment in that court for 5,000 acres of land, in possession of the defendant, Ragan, and on the trial gave in evidence a grant from the state of North Carolina, of 40,000 acres, comprehending the lands for which the suit was instituted.

The defendants claimed, under a junior patent to Mabane, and a possession of seven years held by Ragan, which, by the statutes of North Carolina and Tennessee, constitutes a bar to the action, if the possession be under color of title.

To repel this defense, the plaintiffs proved that no corner or course of the grant, under which they claimed, was marked, except the beginning corner. That the beginning, and nearly the whole land, and all the corners, except one, were within the Indian boundary, being part of the lands reserved by treaty for the Cherokee Indians. These lands were not ceded to the United States until the year 1806, within seven years from which time this suit was instituted. But the land, in possession of the defendant, Ragan, and for which this ejectment was brought, did not lie within the Indian boundary.

The laws of the United States prohibited all persons from surveying or marking any lands within the country reserved by treaty for the Indians.

Upon this testimony the counsel for the plaintiffs requested the court to instruct the jury that "the act of limitations would not run against the plaintiffs for any part of the said tract, although such part should be out of the Indian boundary, until the Indian title was extinguished to that part of the tract which includes the beginning corner, and the lines running from it, so as to enable them to survey their land, and prove the defendant to be within their grant." But the judge instructed the jury that, "although the Indian boundary included the beginning corner, and part of the lines of the said tract, yet, if the defendants had actual possession of part of the said tract, not so included within the said Indian boundary, and retained possession thereof 27*] "for seven years, without any suit being commenced, the plaintiff would thereby be barred from a recovery."

To this opinion the plaintiffs, by their counsel, excepted.

The jury found a verdict for the defendants, on which a judgment was rendered, and the cause was brought before this court by writ of error.

Swann and Campbell, for the plaintiffs in error and in ejectment. 1. Statutes of limitations, all over the world, except certain cases of a peculiar nature from their operation; and the impediment in this case is analagous to the exceptions expressly provided. The case of civil war interrupting all the proceedings in courts of justice is not stronger than the present; the omission in the statute ought, therefore, to be supplied by judicial equity. 2. The act of the 30th of March, 1802, ch. 13, sec. 5, prohibits the surveying, or attempting to survey, or designating any of the boundaries, &c., of lands within the Indian territory, under severe penalties; and the party could not have obtained a passport from the officers authorized to grant it by the third section of the act, in order to survey lands, but merely to go into the Indian country for any lawful purpose. 3. The record does not regularly deduce the defendant's title. There is no presumption raised that Ragan continued his possession under Mabane, and without it, that possession would not be under color of title, according to the statutes of limitation of North Carolina and Tennessee, and the decision of this court in the case [*28 of Patton's Lessee v. Easton.¹

Jones and Thomas, contra. The exceptions in the statute of limitations (which statute gives the right of property as well as of possession) are expressed by the legislature, and cannot be multiplied by implication. But supposing the statute not to apply to lands within the Indian boundary; the lands held by the defendant was not within the Indian boundary, and therefore the limitation applies to it. If the plaintiffs had instituted a suit, they might have entered the Indian country, under an order of court, and surveyed the lands. The character of the defendants' possession, and not that of the plaintiffs, is to determine the right of property.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court, and after stating the facts, proceeded as follows:—

It is contended, by the plaintiffs in error, that the judge misconstrued the law in his instructions to the jury.

The case is admitted to be within the act of limitations of the state of Tennessee, and not within the letter of the exceptions. But it is contended that, as the plaintiffs were disabled, by statute, from surveying their land, and, consequently, from prosecuting this suit with effect, they must be excused from bringing it; and are within the equity, though not within the letter of the exceptions.

The statute of limitations is intended, not for the punishment of those who neglect to assert their rights by suit, but for the protection of those who have remained in possession under color of a title believed to be good. The possession of the defendants being of lands not within the Indian territory, and being in itself legal, no reason exists, as connected with that possession, why it should not avail them and perfect their title as intended by the act.

The claim of the plaintiffs to be excepted from the operation of the act is founded, so far as respects this point, not on the character of the defendants' possession, but on the impediments to the assertion of their own title.

Wherever the situation of a party was such as, in the opinion of the legislature, to furnish a motive for excepting him from the operation of the law, the legislature has made the exception. It would be going far for this court to add to those exceptions. It is admitted that the case of the plaintiffs is not within them, but it is contended to be within the same equity with those which have been taken out of the statute; as where the courts of a country are closed so that no suits can be instituted.

This proposition cannot be admitted. The difficulties under which the plaintiffs labored respected the trial, not the institution of their suit. There was no obstruction to the bringing of this ejectment at an earlier day. If, at [30*] the trial, a survey had been *found indispensable to the justice of the cause, the sound discretion of the court would have been exercised on a motion for a continuance. Had such a motion been overruled, the plaintiffs would have been in the condition of all those who, from causes which they cannot control, are unable to obtain that testimony which will establish their rights. If this difficulty be produced by the legislative power, the same power might provide a remedy; but courts cannot, on that account, insert in the statute of limitations an exception which the statute does not contain. It has never been determined that the impossibility of bringing a case to a successful issue, from causes of uncertain duration, though created by the legislature, shall take such case out of the operation of the act of limitations unless the legislature shall so declare its will.

It has also been contended that in this case the possession is not under color of title.

The ejectment was served on Ragan, who was the tenant in possession, and, on his motion, David Mabane and John Thomson, executors of the last will and testament of James Mabane, deceased, and landlords to the said Henry Ragan, were admitted as defendants with him in the cause. At the trial they produced a grant for the land in controversy to James Mabane, and proved "that Ragan took possession of the same, under James Mabane, the grantee, in 1804, and continued to occupy the same ever since."

It is argued that, though Ragan is stated to have taken possession under Mabane, he is not [31*] stated to *have continued that possession under Mabane, and this court will not presume that he did so. Without such presumption, his possession, it is said, would not be under color of title, and, consequently, would be no bar to the action according to the statute of Tennessee.

The court cannot yield its assent to this hypercriticism on the language of the exceptions. The representatives of Mabane came in as defendants, and plead the general issue. They are stated on the record to be the landlords of Ragan. When Ragan is said to have taken possession under Mabane, and to have continued to occupy the land, the fair inference is that the possession was continued under the same right by which it was originally taken. Neither the statement of the counsel nor the opinion of the court turns, in any degree, on the nature and character of Ragan's possession, but on the disability of the plaintiffs to survey their land. For all these reasons this court is decidedly of opinion that the possession of Ragan was the possession of Mabane, and was under color of title.

Judgment affirmed.

HUNTER ET AL. v. BRYANT.

H., in contemplation of marriage with B., gave a bond for $5,000, and interest to trustees, to secure to B. a support, during the marriage, and after the death of H., in case she should survive him, and to their child or children, in case he should survive her; with condition that if H. should, within the time of his life, or within one year after the marriage (whichever of the said terms should first expire), convey to the trustee some good estate, real or personal, sufficient to secure the annual payment of $300 for the separate use of his wife during the marriage, and also sufficient to secure the payment of the said $5,000 to her use in case she should survive her husband, to be paid within six months after his death; and in case of her death before her husband, to be paid to their child or children; or, if H. should die before B., and by his will should, within a year from its date, make such devises and bequests as should be adequate to these provisions, then the bond to be void. H. died, leaving his widow B. and a son, having by his last will devised a tract of 1,000 acres of land in the Mississippi territory to his son in fee; a tract of 10,000 acres in Kentucky, equally between his wife and son, with a devise over to her in fee of the son's moiety, if he died before he attained "the lawful age to will it away." And the residue of his estate, real and personal, to be divided equally between his wife and son with the same contingent devise over to her as with regard to the tract of 10,000 acres of land. The value of the property thus devised to her, beside the contingent interest, might have been estimated, at the time of H.'s death, at $5,000. B. subsequently died, having made a nuncupative will, by which she devised all her estate, "whether vested in her by the will of her deceased husband or otherwise," to be divided between her son and the plaintiff below (Bryant), with a contingent devise of the whole to the survivor. The son afterwards died, and the plaintiff brought this bill to charge the lands of H. with the payment of the bond for $5,000, and interest, to which the plaintiff derived his right under the nuncupative will of B.

By the laws of Kentucky this will did not pass the real estate of the testator, but was sufficient to pass her personal estate, including the bond.

*Held, that the provision made in the will of [*33] H. for his wife, must be taken in satisfaction of the bond, but subject to her liberty to elect between the provision under the will and the bond, and that this privilege was extended to her devisee, the plaintiff.

Actual maintenance is equivalent to the payment of a sum secured for separate maintenance, and, therefore, interest upon the bond during the husband's life-time was not allowed.

Under all the circumstances of the case, it was determined that the bond was chargeable on the residue of the estate, and of this the personality first in order.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court for the District of Pennsylvania. This cause was argued by Key and Hopkinson for the appellants and defendants, and by Jones for the plaintiffs and respondents.

JOHNSON, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree in equity, in the District of Pennsylvania, on a bill filed by Thomas Y. Bryant, against the legal representatives of John Hare.

The object of the bill is to charge the lands of Andrew Hare, now deceased, through John Hare, to the appellants, defendants in the court below, with the payment of a bond for $5,000, and interest, given by Andrew Hare, in contemplation of marriage with Margaret Bryant, the mother of John Hare.

The land lies partly in the state of Kentucky, and partly in the Mississippi territory, and five of the defendants live in the state of Pennsylvania, the sixth in the state of Virginia. The 34] bill was originally *filed against all six of the legal representatives of John Hare; but the name of Mary Dickinson, the resident in Virginia, being stricken out by leave of court, five only were made defendants below.

The bond is executed to George Hunter and William Hunter, two of these appellants. The penalty is in the usual form, and bears date the 10th of November, 1789. The condition is in these words: "Whereas, by the permission of God, a marriage is intended to be had and solemnized between the above bound Andrew Hare, and Margaret Bryant, of the city of Philadelphia, spinster, and the said Andrew Hare, in consideration of the said marriage, and to secure a decent and competent support to and for his said intended wife, as well during the marriage as after his death, in case she should survive him, and to all and every the child or children which may be born of the said marriage, in case he should survive her, hath agreed that the sum of 5,000 Mexican dollars, part of the estate whereof, by the blessing of God, he is now possessed, and the interest and income thereof accruing annually should be vested in trustees, for the sole and separate use of the said Margaret Bryant, his intended wife, or the children born of her body, in the manner hereinafter mentioned. Now, the conditions of the above obligation is such, that if the said Andrew Hare do, and shall, within the time of his life, or within the term of one year after the marriage shall take effect (whichsoever of the said terms shall first expire), convey and assure to the above named George and William Hunter, 35] the next *friends of the said Margaret Bryant, and trustees by her for this special purpose chosen, or the survivor of them, or his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, some good estate, real or personal, sufficient to secure the payment of 300 Mexican dollars, as aforesaid, to the trustees, or the survivor of them, on every the 10th day of November, in every year after the date hereof, for the sole and separate use of the said Margaret, his intended wife, during the intended marriage; which annual payment shall be at her own disposal, and shall be paid upon her own orders or receipts, independent and free from the intermeddling charge or control of her said intended husband, and shall not be liable to any of his contracts, debts, or engagements whatsoever, and also sufficient to secure the payment of the sum of $5,000, as aforesaid, to and for the sole use of the said Margaret, in case she shall survive her said intended husband, to be paid to the said trustees, or the survivor of them, for her use within six months next after the death of her said intended husband, and in case of her death before her said intended husband, to be paid to the said trustees, or the survivor of them, for the use of all and every of the child or children of the said Margaret, to be born in pursuance of the intended marriage, to be equally divided amongst them, if more than one, but if but one, then the whole to the use of the said one. Or, if the said Andrew Hare shall die before the said Margaret, and by his testament and last will shall, within the said year from the date hereof, give and bequeath to her such estates, legacies, bequests *and provisions, as shall be [*36 fully adequate to the provisions here intended to be made for her, and her child or children; then, and in either of the said cases, the above written obligation shall be void, otherwise the same shall remain in full force and virtue at law, in this state of Pennsylvania, and in all other states or kingdoms whatever."

The marriage accordingly took effect, and except when the husband was necessarily absent, in prosecution of his business as a merchant, the parties lived constantly together in great harmony, and in a style fully consonant with the husband's resources. In 1793 he established himself in Lexington, Kentucky, and was engaged in mercantile transactions until his death, which happened in 1799.

By his will Andrew Hare devised a tract of 1,000 acres of land lying in the Mississippi territory to his son John, in fee. A tract of 10,000 acres in the state of Kentucky equally between his wife and son, with a devise over to her in fee of the son's moiety if he died before he attained "the lawful age to will it away." And the rest and residue of his estate, real and personal, he gives to be equally divided between his wife and son, with the same contingent devise over to her as is given with regard to the Kentucky tract of 10,000 acres. The value of the property thus devised to her, independent of the contingent interest which has since fallen, might reasonably have been estimated at the time of the testator's death at about five thousand dollars.

In 1801, about eighteen months after the husband, the wife died; after having made a nuncupative *will, by which she devised all [*37 her estate, "whether vested in her by the will of Andrew Hare, her deceased husband, or otherwise," to be divided between her son John and the complainant below, Thomas Y. Bryant, with a contingent devise of the whole to the survivor.

John Hare died, aged about 11 years; and under this nuncupative will it is that Thomas Y. Bryant derives his right to this bond. According to the laws of Kentucky this will was not sufficient to pass the landed estate of Margaret Hare, but it is good as to the personal estate, including the bond, which was the subject of this suit.

The defense set up in the answer below is, that the provision made in the will of the husband for his wife must be taken in satisfaction of this bond, inasmuch as he would otherwise have left his child, who ought to have been, and evidently was, the primary object of his care, probably destitute of support. And this court unanimously acquiesce in the correctness of this reasoning. For, every bequest is but a bounty, and a bounty must be taken as it is given. Positive words are not indispensably necessary to attach a condition. It may arise from implication, and grow out of a combination of circumstances which go to show that without attaching such condition to a bequest the primary views and prominent duties of the testator will be pretermitted. In this case, in addition to the striking improbability of the testator's intending to leave his child destitute, or even dependent, there are two circumstances which [38*] tend to show that the testator had no *expectation that, in addition to the provision for his widow, his estate was to be made liable for this heavy debt. First. The condition of the bond holds out the alternative of making provision by will, in satisfaction of it. And, although we do not accede to the construction contended for, that this necessarily extended to his whole life, but think it was, in legal strictness, limited by the latter words of the condition to his death within one year, yet the words in the prior part of the condition "within the term of his life," were well calculated to excite in the mind of a man whose habits of thinking had not been corrected by technical exercise, an idea that he was legally, as well as conscientiously, complying with his obligation when executing this will. Second. The principal part of his bounty to his wife consists of the one-half of the rest and residue of his estate, with a contingent devise over to her of the other half on the decease of his son; thus disposing of the whole, and giving to her the one-half of the natural and ordinary fund for the payment of this bond; a disposition of his effects that would have been idle under the supposition that this bond was to be exacted of his estate.

But, in the actual state of the rights and interests of these parties, at least in the view which this court takes of them, this question becomes a very immaterial one. For, the complainant, Bryant, acquires nothing of the estate of Andrew Hare, under the will of Mrs. Hare, but that part of the personality which she acquired under the residuary bequest of her husband. [39*] And this being unquestionably the *fund first to be applied to the payment of debts, it must, in his hands, be first subjected to the payment of this debt. It is only as connected with Mrs. Hare's acquiescence or election to take under the will that the question of satisfaction becomes material. In which case we should be bound to dismiss the bill altogether, on the ground of satisfaction. But here we are of opinion that the evidence of election is not sufficient to bind Mrs. Hare. That she was perfectly at liberty to reject the provision under the will of her husband, and rest alone on her bond, is unquestionable. And if this election was never deliberately made in her life-time, there can be no reason for denying the extension of it to her representative, Bryant. He now makes that election in demanding the payment of this bond, and we conceive that nothing unequivocally expressive of that election has before occurred, at least nothing that ought to preclude it. If the will had expressly given the property devised to her in satisfaction of this bond, she would have been put on her guard, and more cautious conduct might have been required of her; but, although a court may raise the implication, she was not bound to do it, and her mind was not necessarily led to an election. It is true that in her will she notices the property acquired under her husband's will; but this is perfectly consistent with the idea that she took, under her husband's will, something in addition to her interests under the bond independent of that will. We are therefore of opinion that the complainant is entitled to satisfaction of this bond; and as in the course of events, the interests of *the obligees, who stood in [*40 the relation of trustees to Margaret Bryant, have become hostile to those of the cestui que trust, he must have the aid of this court to enforce it. The only questions, then, are, how the bond shall be stated, and how the money shall be raised. And here the question occurs, on the allowance of interest during the husband's life-time.

On this subject the majority of the court is satisfied that actual maintenance is equivalent to the payment of a sum secured for separate maintenance. It is true the husband cannot claim his election; but, if the wife and her trustees never demand it, it is considered as an acquiescence, or waiver, on their part, and this court will not afterwards enforce payment. (2 P. Wms., 84; 3 P. Wms., 355; 2 Atkin, 84; 4 Bro. Ch. Cas., 326.) In the present case, there is nothing in the bond that holds out the idea of making this interest an accumulating fund; no demand of a settlement was ever made; the parties lived together in perfect harmony, and the wife was maintained in a style fully adequate to the provision stipulated for. This bond was intended as a provision against the husband's inability or unwillingness to maintain his wife; but whilst steadily pursuing his avocation as a merchant, and faithfully discharging his duties as a husband, the reasonable conjecture is, that it was thought really best for his family not to withdraw so large a sum from his small capital. If the trustees or the wife had desired that the settlement should be made *in pursuance of the condition, [*41 they might have demanded it, and enforced a compliance at law or in equity. We, therefore, think that interest on the bond is not to be computed during the husband's life.

The only remaining question is, how the money is to be raised, or on what funds the bond is to be charged. And here there can be no doubt that the first fund to be exhausted is the residue of the estate; and of this, the personal residue first in order. This, of course, sweeps all that part of Andrew Hare's estate that Bryant acquired under the will of Mrs. Hare; and included in this we find Hustin's bond for $3,272.86. The one-half of this bond was decreed in the court below to be an equitable offset against Hare's bond. All we know on the subject of this offset is extracted from the confessions of the complainant himself. From these it appears that the testator, Hare, held a bond of Hustin's for the delivery of a quantity of pork. This bond it was purposed to exchange for one for the delivery of a quantity of tobacco, and the testator, in his life-time, dispatched the complainant as his agent with instructions to effectuate the exchange. To enable him to do so, he assigned the bond for the pork to the complainant, instead of executing a common power of attorney. Whilst absent for this purpose, and before he had completed the arrangement with Hustin, Hare died; and Bryant proceeded no farther, until he had consulted Mrs. Hare and Mr. Todd, as executrix and executor of the will of Hare, on the propriety of proceeding. "On conferring with Mrs. Hare, and advising with Mr. Todd," to use Bryant's 42 own equivocal language, he effected a negotiation, and having received the tobacco, took it down to New Orleans, where, not meeting with a ready sale, he deposited it with one Moore, the factor and correspondent of Hare, in his life-time. He took Moore's receipt for the tobacco so deposited, and all that we are told of the transaction subsequently is, that at the instance of Mr. Todd he assigned that receipt to some house under the firm of John Jordan & Co., but who they were, or what finally became of the tobacco, the case does not show; and, for aught that appears to us, the proceeds of that adventure may at this day lie in the hands of the factor, subject to the order of the executor of Andrew Hare.

The court below thought these facts sufficient to charge Mrs. Hare with one-half the amount of Hustin's bond. But this court are of opinion that the evidence is not sufficient for them to decide finally on the subject. Although it be generally true that the executor, who, by taking an inferior security or unreasonably extending time of payment, brings a loss upon his testator's estate, shall himself be liable, yet there are many objections to applying that principle to this case. The executor, who takes charge of the affairs of a man in trade, must necessarily, on the winding up of his affairs, be allowed a reasonable latitude of discretion, and in general, where there is manifest fidelity, diligence, and ordinary judgment displayed, this court will always with some reluctance enforce the rigid rules which courts have been obliged, for the protection of estates, to impose upon the conduct of executors. In the principal case the language of Thomas Bryant 43 is by no means positive as to the consent of either the executor or executrix to this transaction. He says that he did it "after conferring with Mrs. Hare, and advising with Mr. Todd." But it does not follow that either of them assented because they were consulted, or that they did anything more than express an opinion on the expediency of the measure. Neither of them had then qualified, nor was it at all certain that they would qualify, and the only person then empowered to act on this subject was Bryant himself; who, by virtue of the assignment which he held, possessed a power which legally survived his principal. Under this assignment it was that the negotiation was effected, and not by virtue of any power derived to him from the supposed assent of the executrix. Moreover, admitting the consent of the executrix, it is still doubtful whether any change of security did in fact take place. For, Hustin still remained the debtor—the articles of agreement substituted for the original bond bear the aspect of the purchase of a bond rather than the relinquishment of an advantage; the greater part, if not the whole balance, of the original debt was also payable in tobacco; and if the loss finally sustained proceeded, as is probable, from the insolvency of the factor, and not the reduced value of the commodity, this was by no means a necessary consequence of the change. Upon the whole, we are of opinion that the estate of Margaret Hare ought not in this mode, and upon the evidence now before us, to be charged with any part of Hustin's debt. For aught we know, Bryant may himself be liable for the whole, *by 44 means of his mismanagement in the agency, or it may be in the power of the defendants to prove such acts of the executrix as may amount to a derastavit. On these points we do not mean to express an opinion or prejudice the rights of the appellants; we only mean to decide that the evidence in this case is not sufficient to sustain this discount.

After having settled these principles, the decree below must be reversed, and the case remanded for such further proceedings as are necessary to carry into effect the views of this court. But as only five-sixths of the land are represented in this court, we can decree for only five-sixths of the balance of the bond. After applying to it the residuary personal estate, for the balance the complainant will have to pursue his remedy against Mary Dickinson, unless the representatives shall have the prudence voluntarily to join in any sales of land that may be made under this decree.

DECREE.—Whereupon it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the decree of the Circuit Court of Pennsylvania District be reversed and annulled. And this court decrees: 1st. That the complainant, Thomas Y. Bryant, is entitled to recover of the estate of Andrew Hare the sum of five thousand dollars, with interest thereon, at six per centum per annum from the day of the death of the said Andrew. 2d. That the defendant, George Hunter, do pay to the complainant in the court below the balance in his hands of money of the estate of the said Andrew, with interest at the same rate from the day it was *demanded by 45 the said complainant. 3d. That the complainant, after giving credit for the sum that shall be thus paid him by the said defendant, and all other sums received by the said Margaret in her life, or the complainant since her death, from, or on account of, the estate of the said Andrew, as well as the value of any part of the personal residue of the said Andrew's estate, which may have come to their, or either of their hands according to the date of such receipts, shall have the aid of the said Circuit Court to compel these defendants to raise by sale (if sufficient for that purpose) of their respective shares of the real estate of the said Andrew, descended to them, five-sixths of the balance that shall be computed to be due on the said bond, calculated as above directed. And, lastly, that the cause be remanded to the Circuit Court for further proceedings.

Decree accordingly.

DUVALL v. CRAIG ET. AL.

Variances between the writ and declaration are matters pleadable in abatement only, and cannot be taken advantage of upon general demurrer to the declaration.

Wheat. 2.

A trustee is, in general, suable only in equity; but if he chooses to bind himself by a personal covenant he is liable at law for a breach thereof, although he describe himself as covenanting as trustee.

46*] *Where the parties to a deed covenanted severally against their own acts and incumbrances, and also to warrant and defend against their own acts, and those of all other persons, with an indemnity in lands of an equivalent value in case of eviction; it was held that these covenants were independent, and that it was unnecessary to allege in the declaration any eviction, or any demand or refusal to indemnify with other lands, but that it was sufficient to allege a prior incumbrance by the acts of the grantors, &c., and that the action might be maintained on the first covenant in order to recover pecuniary damages.

Where the grantors covenant generally against incumbrances made by them, it may be construed as extending to several, as well as joint incumbrances. No proof of a deed is necessary where it is stated only as inducement, and where the plaintiff is neither a party nor privy to it.

An averment of an eviction under an elder title is not always necessary to sustain an action on a covenant against incumbrances; if the grantee be unable to obtain possession in consequence of an existing possession or seizure by a person claiming and holding under an elder title, it is equivalent to an eviction, and a breach of the covenant.

ERROR to the Circuit for the District Court of Kentucky.

The capias ad respondendum issued in this case was as follows: "The United States of America to the marshal of the Kentucky District, Greeting. You are hereby commanded to take John Craig, Robert Johnson, and Elijah Craig, if they be found within your bailiwick, and them safely keep so that you have their bodies before the judge of our District Court, at the capitol in Frankfort, on the first Monday in March next, to answer William Duvall, a citizen of the state of Virginia, of an action of covenant; damages fifty thousand dollars; and have then and there this writ. In testimony whereof. Harry Innes, Esq., judge of our said 47*] court, hath caused the *seal thereof to be hereunto affixed this 22d day of January, 1804, and of our independence the 28th. Thomas Turnstall, C. D. C."

Whereupon the plaintiff declared against John Craig, Robert Johnson, and Elijah Craig, in covenant, for that whereas, on the 28th day of February, 1795, &c., the said John, and the said Robert and Elijah, as trustees to the said John, by their certain indenture of bargain and sale, &c., did grant, bargain, sell, alien, and confirm unto the said plaintiff, by the name of William Duvall, of the city of Richmond and state of Virginia, his heirs and assigns forever, a certain tract of land lying and being in the state of Kentucky, &c., together with the improvements, water-courses, profits, and appurtenances whatsoever, belonging, or in any wise appertaining; and the reversion and remainder, and remainders and profits, thereof; and all the estate, right, title, property, and demand of them, the said John Craig, and Robert Johnson, and Elijah Craig, trustees for the said John Craig, of, in, and to the same, to have and to hold the lands thereby conveyed with all and singular the premises, and every part and parcel thereof to the said William Duvall, his heirs and assigns forever, to the only proper use and behoof of him, the said William, his heirs and assigns forever; and the said John Craig, and Robert Johnson, and Elijah Craig, trustees to the said John Craig, for themselves, their heirs, executors, and administrators, did covenant, promise, and agree, to and with the said William Duvall, his heirs and assigns, that the premises before mentioned, *then [*48 were, and forever after should be, free of and from all former and other gifts, bargains, sales, dower, right and title of dower, judgments, executions, titles, troubles, charges, and incumbrances whatsoever done, or suffered to be done by them, the said John Craig, and Sarah, his wife, and Robert Johnson, and Elijah Craig, trustees for the said John Craig, as by the said indenture will more at large appear. And the said William, in fact saith that the premises before mentioned were not, then and there, free of and from all former gifts, grants, bargains, sales, titles, troubles, charges, and incumbrances whatsoever done and suffered to be done by the said John Craig, and Sarah, his wife, and Robert Johnson and Elijah Craig, trustees to the said John Craig. But, on the contrary, the said John Craig and Robert Johnson, therefore, to wit, on the 11th day of May, 1785, assigned the place and certificate of survey of said land to a certain John Hawkins Craig, by virtue of which said assignment, Patrick Henry, Governor of the Commonwealth of Virginia, granted the said land to said John Hawkins Craig, and his heirs forever, by letters patent, dated the 16th day of September, 1785, and now here shown to the court, the date whereof is the day and year aforesaid, which said patent to the said John Hawkins Craig, on the day and year first aforesaid, at the district aforesaid, was in full force and virtue, contrary to the covenant aforesaid, by reason of which said assignment, patent and incumbrance, the said William hath been prevented from having and enjoying all or any part of the premises above mentioned. *And there- [*49 upon the said William further saith, that the defendants aforesaid, although often requested, have not kept and performed their covenant aforesaid, &c. To which declaration there was a general demurrer, and joinder in demurrer, and a judgment thereupon in the Circuit Court for the defendants.

The indenture referred to in the plaintiff's declaration is in the following words: "This indenture, made this 28th day of February, 1795, between John Craig, and Sarah, his wife, and Robert Johnson and Elijah Craig, trustees for the said John Craig, all of the state of Kentucky, of the one part, and William Duvall, of the city of Richmond, and state of Virginia, of the other part, witnesseth, that the said John Craig, for and in consideration of the sum of two thousand pounds, current money of Kentucky, to him, the said John Craig, in hand paid, the receipt whereof they do hereby acknowledge and forever acquit and discharge the said William Duvall, his heirs, executors, and administrators, have granted, bargained and sold, aliened and confirmed, and by these presents do grant, bargain and sell, alien and confirm, unto the said William Duvall, his heirs and assigns forever, a certain tract of land lying and being in the state of Kentucky, and now county of Scott, formerly Fayette, on the waters of the Ohio River, below the Big Bone Lick Creek, it being the same lands that the said John Craig covenanted by a writing obligatory, sealed with his seal, and dated the second day

And the said John Craig and Sarah, his wife, and Robert Johnson, and Elijah Craig, trustees for the said John Craig, and their heirs, all and singular the premises hereby bargained and sold, with the appurtenances, unto the said William Duvall, his heirs and assigns, against him the said John Craig and Sarah, his wife, and Robert Johnson, and Elijah Craig, trustees for the said John Craig, and their heirs, and all and every person whatsoever, do and will warrant and forever defend with this warranty, and no other, to wit, that if the said land, or any part thereof, shall at any time be taken by a prior legal claim, or claims, that then and in such case they, the said John Craig and Sarah, his wife, and Robert Johnson, and Elijah Craig, trustees for the said John Craig, and their heirs, shall make good to the said William Duvall

B. Hardin, for the plaintiff, made the following points: 1. That the variance between the writ and declaration, as to the description of the parties, *was immaterial. Naming two of [53 the defendants as trustees, is only descriptio personæ, and could not alter the nature of the covenant. 2. Judgment was rightly rendered against the defendants in their individual capacity. 3. It was unnecessary to aver a demand and refusal of other lands of equivalent value as an indemnity, this covenant not being sued upon; and the action might be maintained upon the first covenant against incumbrances by the parties to the deed. 4. That the breach alleged in the declaration was sufficient. 5. That it was unnecessary to make profert of the assignment described in the breach.

Talbot, contra. 1. The variance between the writ and declaration is a substantial variance, and is therefore available on general demurrer. The parties, Robert Johnson and Elijah Craig, are not sued in their fiduciary character; but they are declared against as trustees to the said John, who is the cestui que trust, and could not be joined in an action at law with the trustees. They covenanted as trustees, and a court of equity is the proper forum in which they ought to be sued. 2. Having covenanted as trustees, no individual judgment could be rendered against them. 3. Supposing the trustees to be liable in their individual capacity, the two covenants in the deed are to be construed in connection; the clause as to an indemnity with other lands of an equivalent value, ought to be applied to both; and the declaration is fatally defective in not alleging a demand and refusal to indemnify with other lands. 4. The covenant, *on which the breach is assigned, [54 is against the joint and not the several incumbrances of the parties to the deed. The incumbrance alleged is the act of two of the parties only. 5. There is no profert of the assignment to John Hawkins Craig, by which the incumbrance was created; nor is it shown to have been made for a valuable consideration. 6. There is no averment of an eviction of the plaintiff under the assignment, which was absolutely necessary to sustain the action on the covenant against incumbrances.

M. B. Hardin, in reply. 1. The variance between the writ and declaration could only be taken advantage of by a plea in abatement. 2. As between a trustee and the cestui que trust a court of chancery is the only jurisdiction; but trustees may bind themselves individually so as to be amenable at law. The present case is not that of a covenant binding the trustees, only as to the trust fund in their hands, but they covenant for themselves, their heirs, executors, &c. The mere description as trustees, therefore, becomes immaterial. 3. The covenants are independent, and the action may be maintained to recover pecuniary damages, without alleging an eviction and demand of other lands of equivalent value. 4. Where there is any doubt, a covenant is to be construed most strongly against the covenanters; and in a case of this nature, the law considers an act done by one or more of the covenanters as a breach of the covenant. 5. No proof of the assignment was necessary, because the action [*55] was not founded upon it, nor was the plaintiff a party or privy to it; and the omission of proof was ground of special demurrer only.

STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Several points have been argued in this case, upon which the opinion of the court will be now pronounced. In the first place, it is stated that a material variance exists between the writ and declaration, of which (being shown upon oyer) the court, upon a general demurrer to the declaration, are bound to take notice; and if so, it is fatal to the action. The supposed variance consists in this, that in the writ all the defendants are sued by their christian and surnames only; whereas, in the declaration, the deed on which the action is founded is averred to be made by the defendant, John Craig, and by the other defendants, Robert Johnson and Elijah Craig, "as trustees to the said John," and the covenant on which the breach is assigned, is averred to be made by the said John Craig, and Robert Johnson and Elijah Craig,

"trustees to the said John." The argument is, that the writ is founded upon a personal covenant, and the declaration upon a covenant in autre droit, upon which no action lies at law; or if any lies, the writ must conform in its language to the truth of the case. It is perfectly clear, however, that the exception, even if a good one, cannot be taken advantage of upon general demurrer to the declaration, for such a demurrer is in bar to the action; whereas, variances between the writ and declaration are matters pleadable in abatement only. *But [*56] there is nothing in the exception itself. A trustee, merely as such, is, in general, only suable in equity. But if he chooses to bind himself by a personal covenant, he is liable at law for a breach thereof in the same manner as any other person, although he describe himself as covenanting as trustee; for, in such case, the covenant binds him personally, and the addition of the words "as trustee" is but matter of description to show the character in which he acts for his own protection, and in no degree affects the rights or remedies of the other party. The authorities are very elaborate on this subject. An agent or executor who covenants in his own name, and yet describes himself as agent or executor, is personally liable, for the obvious reason that the one has no principal to bind, and the other substitutes himself for his principal.¹

*The reasoning upon this point disposes, [*57] also, of the second made at the argument, viz., that the covenant being made by Robert Johnson and Elijah Craig, as trustees, no individual judgment can be rendered against them. It is plain that the judgment is right, and, indeed, there could have been no other judgment rendered, for at law a judgment against a trustee in such special capacity is utterly unknown.

Having answered these minor objections, we may now advance to the real controversies between the *parties. It is contended that [*58] the two covenants in the deed are so knit together that they are to be construed in connection, so that the clause as to an indemnity with other lands, in case of an eviction by a prior legal claim, is to be applied as a restriction to both covenants; and if so, then the action can

1.—Where a person acts as agent for another, if he executes a deed for his principal, and does not mean to bind himself personally, he should take care to execute the deed in the name of his principal, and state the name of his principal only, in the body of the deed. White v. Cuyler, 6 Term Rep. 176; Wilkes v. Back, 2 East, 142. The usual and appropriate manner is to sign the deed "A. B. by C. D., his attorney." If, instead of pursuing this course, the agent names himself in the deed, and covenants in his own name, he will be personally liable on the covenants, notwithstanding he describes himself as agent. There are numerous cases to be found in the books illustrative of this doctrine decided in the text. Thus in Appleton v. Birks (5 East, 148), where the defendant entered into an agreement, under seal, with the plaintiff, by the name of T. B. of, &c., "for, and on the part and behalf of the Right Honorable Lord Viscount Rokeby," and covenanted for himself, his heirs, executors, &c., "on the part and behalf of the said Lord Rokeby," and executed the agreement in his own name, it was held that he was personally liable on the covenant. So where a committee for a turnpike corporation contracted under their own hands and seals, describing themselves as a committee, they were held personally responsible. Tibbetts v. Walker, 4 Mass. Rep. 505. So where a person signed a promissory note in his own name, describing himself as guardian, he was held bound to the payment of the note in his personal capacity. Thatcher v. Dinsmore, 5 Mass. Rep. 299; Foster v. Fuller, 6 Mass. Rep. 53; Chitty on bills (Story's Ed.) 40, note Ibid. So where administrators of an estate, by proper authority from a court, sold the lands of their intestate, and covenanted in the deed "in their capacity as administrators," that they were seized of the premises, and had good title to convey the same; that the same were free of all incumbrances, and that they would warrant and defend the same against the lawful claims of all persons; it was held that they were personally responsible. Sumner v. Williams, 8 Mass. Rep. 162; Thayer v. Wendall, 1 Gallis, 37. In respect to public agents a distinction has been long asserted, and is now generally established; and, therefore, if an agent of the government contract for their benefit, and on their behalf, and describe himself as such in the contract, he is held not to be personally responsible, although the terms of the contract might, in cases of a mere private nature, involve him in a personal responsibility. Macbeath v. Haldimand, 1 Term Rep. 172; Unwin v. Wolseley, 1 Term Rep. 674; Myrtle v. Beaver, 1 East, 135; Rice v. Shute, 1 East, 579; Hodgdon v. Dexter, 1 Cranch, 363; Jones v. Le Tombe, 3 Dall. 384; Brown v. Austin, 1 Mass. Rep. 208; Freeman v. Otis, 9 Mass. Rep. 272; Sheffield v. Watson, 3 Calnes, 69.

not be sustained, for the declaration does not allege any eviction, or any demand or refusal to indemnify with other lands. There is certainly considerable weight in the argument. It is not unreasonable to suppose that then the parties had provided a specific indemnity for a prior claim, they might mean to apply the same indemnity to all the other cases enumerated in the first covenant. But something more than the mere reasonableness of such a supposition must exist to authorize a court to adopt such a construction. The covenants stand distinct in the deed, and there is no incongruity or repugnancy in considering them as independent of each other. The first covenant being only against the acts and incumbrances under the parties to the deed, which they could not but know, they might be willing to become responsible to secure its performance by a pecuniary indemnity; the second including a warranty against the prior claims of strangers also, of which the parties might be ignorant, they might well stipulate for an indemnity only in lands of an equivalent value. The case ought to be a very strong one, which should authorize a court to create, by implication, a restriction which the order of the language does not necessarily import or justify. It ought to be one [59*] in which no judicial doubt could exist of the real intention of the parties to create such a restriction. It cannot be pronounced that such is the present case; and this objection to the declaration cannot, therefore, be sustained.

The remaining objections turn upon the sufficiency of the breach alleged in the declaration. It is contended that the covenant on which the breach is assigned is against the joint, and not the several acts and incumbrances of the parties to the deed, and that, therefore, the breach, which states an assignment by John Craig and Robert Johnson only, is wholly insufficient. It is certainly true that, in terms, the covenant is against the acts and incumbrances of all the parties, and the words "every of them" are not found in the deed. Some of the incumbrances, however, within the contemplation of the parties are not of a nature to be jointly created; as, for instance, the incumbrance of dower and title of dower. This very strongly shows that it was the intention of the parties to embrace in the covenant several, as well as joint acts and incumbrances. There is also a reference in the premises of the deed to a covenant for a conveyance previously made by John Craig to Samuel M'Craw, against which it must have intended to secure the grantees; and if so, it fortifies the construction already stated. If, therefore, the point were of a new impression, it would be difficult to sustain the reasoning which would limit the covenant to the joint acts of all the grantors; and there is no authority to support it. On the contrary, Meriton's case, though stated with some difference by the several reporters, seems to *us completely to sustain the position [*60] that a covenant of this nature ought to be construed as including several, as well as joint incumbrances, and has certainly been so understood by very learned abridgers. (Meriton's case, Noy, 86; S. C. Popham, 200; S. C. Latch, 161; Bac. Abr. Covenant, 77; Com. Dig. Condition, [E].) This objection, therefore, is overruled.¹

*Another exception is, that there is no [*61] profert of the assignment described in the breach, nor is it shown to have been made for a valuable consideration. Various answers have been given at the bar to this exception; and without deciding on others, it is a sufficient answer that the plaintiff is neither a party nor privy to the assignment, nor consant of the consideration upon which it was made, and therefore is not bound to make a profert of it or show the consideration upon which it was made.

The last exception is, that the breach does not set forth any entry or eviction of the plaintiff under the assignment and patent to John Hawkins Craig. Assuming that an averment of an entry and eviction under an elder title be in general, necessary to sustain an action on a covenant against incumbrances (on which we give no opinion), it is clear that it cannot be always necessary. If the grantee be unable to obtain possession in consequence of an existing possession or seizin by a person claiming and holding under an elder title, this would certainly be equivalent to *an eviction and a [*62]

1.—It may not, perhaps, be useless to the learned reader to state the substance of Meriton's case as given in the various reporters. In Noy's Reports, 86, the case is thus succinctly given: "A and B lease to M for years, and covenant that he may claim without disturbance, interruption, or incumbrance by them, and an obligation was made for performance, &c. A makes another lease to C, who enters, and M brought debt, &c., (on the obligation), and by the court, it is well, for the covenant is broken, and 'them' shall not be taken jointly only, but severally also. In Latch, 161, the case stands as follows: "Debt upon an obligation. Two make a lease for years by indenture, and covenant that the lessee should not be disturbed, nor any incumbrance made by them; one of the lessors made a lease to a stranger, who disturbed, &c. The condition was to perform covenants. And it was agreed by Dodderidge, Jones, and Whitle, to be a breach of the condition, for 'them' shall not be taken jointly; but if either of them disturb the lessee, it is a breach of the condition." The case, therefore, as stated in both of these reports, is substantially the same. But in Popham's Reports, 200, it is reported somewhat differently. It is there stated to be an action of covenant, upon a covenant in an indenture between the plaintiffs and their lessors, whereby the lessors covenant to discharge them of all incumbrances done by them or any other person, and the plaintiffs assign for breach that one of the lessors had made a lease. It was moved in arrest of judgment, that the breach was not well laid, "because it is only laid to be done by one of them, and the covenant is to discharge them of incumbrances done by them, which shall be intended joint incumbrances."

DODDERIDGE, J. The covenant goes as well to incumbrances done severally as jointly, for it is of all incumbrances done by them or any other person; and so was the opinion of all the other justices; and, therefore, the exception was overruled." From this last report, it would seem that the covenant was against incumbrances, not only of the lessors, but of other persons, and it might, at first view, be thought that some stress was laid by the court upon the last words. But upon a careful consideration, even supposing (what may well be doubted) that Popham's is the more correct report, it would not seem that the latter words, "any other person," could be properly held to embrace the lessees, or either of them; for "other" is used as exclusive "of them"; and, therefore, the cause must have turned substantially upon the import of the preceding words, "of them," i. e., whether embracing several as well as joint incumbrances. In this view all the reports are consistent, and put the case upon the real point in controversy.

breach of the covenant. In the case at bar the breach is assigned in a very inartificial and lax manner; but it is expressly averred that the assignment and patent to John Hawkins Craig was a prior conveyance, which was still in full force and virtue, "by reason of which said assignment, patent, and incumbrance, the said William (the plaintiff) hath been prevented from having and enjoying all or any part of the premises above mentioned." We are all of opinion that upon general demurrer this must be taken as an averment, that the possession of the premises was legally withheld from the plaintiff by the parties in possession, under the prior title thus set up.¹

COOLIDGE ET AL. v. PAYSON ET AL.

A letter, written within a reasonable time before or after the date of a bill of exchange, describing it in terms not to be mistaken, and promising to accept it, is, if shown to the person who afterwards takes the bill on the credit of the letter, a virtual acceptance binding the person who makes the promise.

THIS cause was argued by Swann for the plaintiff in error, and by Winder for the defendant.

1.—The usual covenants in conveyances of real property by the grantor are, that he is lawfully seized in fee of the premises; that he has good right and title to convey the same; that they are free of all incumbrances; that the grantor, his heirs, &c., will warrant and defend the same to the grantee, his heirs, &c., against the lawful claims of all persons. The manner of assigning breaches upon these covenants deserves the attention of all persons who aspire to a reasonable knowledge of the duties of special pleaders. In case of the covenants of seizin and of good right and title to convey, it is sufficient to allege the breach by negating the words of the covenant. Bradshaw's case, 9 Co. 60 b. S. C. Cro. Jac. 304; Lancashire v. Glover, 2 Shower, 460; 2 Saund. 181, note (a.) by Mr. Sergeant Williams; Greenby v. Wilcocks, 2 Johns. R. 1. Sedgwick v. Hollenback, 7 Johns. R. 376; Marston

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was instituted by Payson & Co., as indorsers of a bill of exchange, drawn by Cornthwaite & Cary, payable to the order of John Randall, against Coolidge & Co. as the acceptors.

At the trial the holders of the bill, on which the name of John Randall was indorsed, offered, for the purpose of proving the indorsement, an affidavit made by one of the defendants in the cause, in order to obtain a continuance, in which he referred to the bill in terms which, they supposed, implied a knowledge on his part that the plaintiffs were the rightful holders. The defendants objected to the bill's going to the jury without further proof of the indorsement; but the court determined that it should go with the affidavit to the jury, who might be at liberty to infer from thence that the indorsement was made by Randall. To this opinion the counsel for the defendants *in [*67 the Circuit Court excepted, and this court is divided on the question whether the exception ought to be sustained.

On the trial it appeared that Coolidge & Co. held the proceeds of part of the cargo of the Hiram, claimed by Cornthwaite & Cary, which had been captured and libeled as lawful prize. The cargo had been acquitted in the district and circuit courts, but from the sentence of acquittal, the captors had appealed to this court. Pending the appeal Cornthwaite & Co. transmitted to Coolidge & Co. a bond of indemnity, executed at Baltimore with scrolls in the place of seals, and drew on them for two thousand seven hundred dollars. This bill was also payable to the order of Randall, and indorsed by him to Payson & Co. It was presented to Coolidge & Co. and protested for non-acceptance. After its protest Coolidge & Co. wrote to Cornthwaite & Cary a letter, in which, after acknowledging the receipt of a letter from them, with the bond of indemnity, they say: "This bond, conformably to our laws, is not executed as it ought to be; but it may be otherwise in your state. It will therefore be necessary to satisfy us that the scroll is usual and legal with you instead of a seal. We notice no seal to any of the signatures." "We shall write our friend Williams by this mail, and will state to him our ideas respecting the bond, which he will probably determine. If Mr. W. feels satisfied on this point, he will inform you, and in that case your draft for two thousand dollars will be honored."

On the same day Coolidge & Co. addressed a letter *to Mr. Williams, in which, after [*68 referring to him the question respecting the legal obligation of the scroll, they say: "You know the object of the bond, and, of course, see the propriety of our having one not only legal, but signed by sureties of unquestionable responsibility, respecting which, we shall wholly rely on your judgment. You mention the last surety as being responsible; what think you of the others?"

R. 433; Emerson v. Proprietors of Minot, 2 Mass. R. 464; Bearce v. Jackson, 4 Mass. R. 406. In respect to the covenant against incumbrances, it seemed admitted by Chief Justice Parsons, in Marston v. Hobbs, 2 Mass. R. 433, that there was no authority directly in point; but he held, that in principle it was analagous to a covenant for quiet enjoyment; and said, that in the entries, the incumbrance is specially alleged in the count. See also Bickford v. Page, 2 Mass. R. 455. It does not, however, seem necessary to allege an ouster or eviction, on the breach of a covenant against incumbrances; but only to allege the special incumbrance as a good and subsisting one. Prescott v. Trueman, 4 Mass. R. 629. And a paramount title subsisting in a third person, is an incumbrance within the meaning of the covenant. Prescott v. Trueman, 4 Mass. R. 627. So a public town way is, in legal contemplation, an incumbrance on the land over which it is laid. Kellogg v. Ingersoll, 2 Mass. R. 87; see Ellis v. Welsh, 6 Mass. R. 246.

There is some diversity of opinion as to the damages recoverable upon a breach of these several covenants. Upon the covenants of seizin, and of good right and title to convey, it is held by the courts of New York and Pennsylvania that the grantee is entitled to the purchase money and interest [*64] from the time of the purchase. Staats v. Ten Eyck's executors, 3 Caines, 111; Pitcher v. Livingston, 4 Johns. R. 1; Bender v. Fromberger, 4 Dall. 441. The same rule has been adopted in Massachusetts. Bickford v. Page, 2 Mass. R. 455; Marston v. Hobbs, 2 Mass. R. 433; Caswell v. Wendell, 4 Mass. R. 108. But if the grantee has actually enjoyed the lands for a long time, the purchase money and interest for a term not exceeding six years prior to the time of eviction is given; for the grantee, upon a recovery against him, is liable to account for the mesne profits for that period only. Staats v. Ten Eyck's executors, 3 Caines, R. 111; Caulkins v. Hams, 9 Johns. R. 324; Bennet v. Jenkins, 13 Johns. R. 50. As to the covenant against incumbrances, it seems generally held that the grantee is entitled to nominal damages only, unless he extinguish the incumbrance; and if he extinguish it for a reasonable and fair price, he is entitled to recover that sum with interest from the time of payment. Delavergne v. Norris, 7 Johns. Rep. 358; Hull v. Dean, 13 Johns. Rep. 106; Prescott v. Freeman, 4 Mass. Rep. 627. And the costs, if any, to which he has been put by an action against him on account of the incumbrance. Waldo v. Long, 7 Johns. Rep. 173. In respect to the covenant for quiet enjoyment and of general warranty, the rule of damages adopted in New York and Pennsylvania is to give the purchase money with interest and the costs of the prior suit; but no allowance is made for the value of any improvements. Staats v. Ten Eyck's executors, 3 Caines, 111; Pitcher v. Livingston, 4 Johns. Rep. 1. Spencer, J. dissenting. Bennet v. Jenkins, 13 Johns. Rep. 50; Bender v. Fromberger, 4 Dall. 441. The same rule has been adopted in Tennessee. 5 Hall's American Law Journ. 330. But, in relation to covenants of warranty, the courts of Massachusetts have adopted a different rule, and allow the damages, or, in other words, the value of the property at the time of eviction. Gore v. Brazier, 3 Mass. Rep. 523. And the same rule appears to be adopted in South Carolina. Liber et ux. v. Parsons, 1 Bay, 19; Guerard's executors v. Rivers, 1 Bay, 265. And in Virginia. Mills v. Bell, 3 Call. 326; Humphrey's administrators v. M'Clenahan's administrators, 1 Munf. 493. And in Connecticut. Horsford v. Wright, Kirby, 3. Where there is a failure of title, as to part only of the land granted, it has been held that the grantee cannot recover back the whole consideration money. If the title has failed as to an undivided part of an entire tract, the grantee is entitled to a like proportion of the consideration; but if it be of a *specific proportion of the tract, the damages [*65] are to be apportioned according to the measure of value between the land lost and the land preserved; that is, the portion of the consideration money to be recovered is to be in the same ratio to the entire consideration that the value of the part, as to which the title has failed, is to the value of the whole tract. Morris v. Phelps, 5 Johns. Rep. 49.

In respect to these covenants running with the land, it has been held in New York and Massachusetts, that if the grantor be not seized, at the time of conveyance, the covenant of seizin is immediately broken, and no action can be brought by the assignee of the grantee against the grantor; for after the covenant is broken, it is a chose in action, and incapable of assignment. Greenby v. Wilcocks, 2 Johns. Rep. 1; Bickford v. Page, 2 Mass. Rep. 455. But in a recent case in England, a different doctrine was held; and it was adjudged that such a covenant runs with the land, and though broken in the time of a testator, is a continuing breach in the time of his devisee, and it is sufficient to allege for damage, that thereby the lands are of less value to the devisee, and that he is prevented from selling them so advantageously. Kingdon v. Noble, 4 Maule & Selw. 53; and see Kingdon v. Noble, 1 Maule & Selw. 355; Chamberlain v. Williamson, 2 Maule & Selw. 408; King v. Jones, 5 Taunt. 418; S. C. 1 Marshall's Rep. 107.

In his answer to this letter, Williams says: "I am assured that the bond transmitted in my last is sufficient for the purpose for which it was given, provided the parties possess the means; and of the last signer, I have no hesitation in expressing my firm belief of his being able to meet the whole amount himself. Of the principals I cannot speak with so much confidence, not being well acquainted with their resources. Under all circumstances, I should not feel inclined to withhold from them any portion of the funds for which the bond was given."

On the day on which this letter was written, Cornthwaite & Cary called on Williams, to inquire whether he had satisfied Coolidge & Co. respecting the bond. Williams stated the substance of the letter he had written, and read to him a part of it. One of the firm of Payson & Co. also called on him to make the same inquiry, to whom he gave the same information, and also read from his letter book the letter he had written.

Two days after this, the bill in the declaration mentioned was drawn by Cornthwaite & Cary, and paid to Payson & Co. in part of the pro-⁶⁹ tested bill of $2,700, by whom it was presented to Coolidge & Co., who refused to accept it, on which it was protested, and this action brought by the holders.

On this testimony, the counsel for the defendants insisted that the plaintiffs were not entitled to a verdict; but the court instructed the jury that if they were satisfied that Williams, on the application of the plaintiffs, made after seeing the letter from Coolidge & Co. to Cornthwaite & Cary, did declare that he was satisfied with the bond referred to in that letter, as well with respect to its execution as to the sufficiency of the obligors to pay the same, and that the plaintiffs, upon the faith and credit of the said declaration, and also of the letter to Cornthwaite & Cary, and without having seen or known the contents of the letter from Coolidge & Co. to Williams, did receive and take the bill in the declaration mentioned, they were entitled to recover in the present action; and that it was no legal objection to such recovery that the promise to accept the present bill was made to the drawers thereof, previous to the existence of such bill, or that the bill had been taken in part payment of a pre-existing debt, or that the said Williams, in making the declarations aforesaid, did exceed the private instructions given to him by Coolidge & Co., in their letter to him.

To this charge, the defendants excepted; a verdict was given for the plaintiffs, and judgment rendered thereon, which judgment is now before this court on a writ of error.

The letter from Coolidge & Co. to Cornthwaite & Cary contains no reference to their let-⁷⁰ ter to Williams *which might suggest the necessity of seeing that letter, or of obtaining information respecting its contents. They refer Cornthwaite & Cary to Williams, not for the instructions they had given him, but for his judgment and decision on the bond of indemnity. Under such circumstances, neither the drawers nor the holders of the bill could be required to know, or could be affected by, the private instructions given to Williams. It was enough for them, after seeing the letter from Wheat. 2.

Coolidge & Co. to Cornthwaite & Cary, to know that Williams was satisfied with the execution of the bond and the sufficiency of the obligors, and had informed Coolidge & Co. that he was so satisfied.

This difficulty being removed, the question of law which arises from the charge given by the court to the jury is this: Does a promise to accept a bill amount to an acceptance to a person who has taken it on the credit of that promise, although the promise was made before the existence of the bill, and although it is drawn in favor of a person who takes it for a pre-existing debt?

In the case of Pillans & Rose v. Van Mierop & Hopkins (3 Burr, 1663), the credit on which the bill was drawn was given before the promise to accept was made, and the promise was made previous to the existence of the bill. Yet in that case, after two arguments, and much consideration, the Court of King's Bench (all the judges being present and concurring in opinion) considered the promise to accept as an acceptance.

Between this case and that under the consideration *of the court, no essential distinction is perceived. But it is contended that the authority of the case of Pillans & Rose v. Van Mierop & Hopkins is impaired by subsequent decisions.

In the case of Pierson v. Dunlop et al. (Cowp., 571), the bill was drawn and presented before the conditional promise was made on which the suit was instituted. Although, in that case, the holder of the bill recovered as on an acceptance, it is supposed that the principles laid down by Lord Mansfield, in delivering his opinion contradict those laid down in Pillans & Rose v. Van Mierop & Hopkins. His lordship observes: "It has been truly said, as a general rule, that the mere answer of a merchant to the drawer of a bill, saying, 'he will duly honor it,' is no acceptance, unless accompanied with circumstances which may induce a third person to take the bill by indorsement; but if there are any such circumstances, it may amount to an acceptance, though the answer be contained in a letter to the drawer."

If the case of Pillans & Rose v. Van Mierop & Hopkins had been understood to lay down the broad principle that a naked promise to accept amounts to an acceptance, the case of Pierson v. Dunlop certainly narrows that principle so far as to require additional circumstances proving that the person on whom the bill was drawn was bound by his promise, either because he had funds of the drawer in his hands or because his letter had given credit to the bill, and induced a third person to take it.

It has been argued that those circumstances to which Lord Mansfield alludes must be apparent on *the face of the letter. But [⁷² the court can perceive no reason for this opinion. It is neither warranted by the words of Lord Mansfield nor by the circumstances of the case in which he used them. "The mere answer of a merchant to the drawer of a bill, saying he will duly honor it, is no acceptance unless accompanied with circumstances," &c. The answer must be "accompanied with circumstances;" but it is not said that the answer must contain those circumstances. In the case of Pierson v. Dunlop, the answer did not contain those circumstances. They were not found in the letter, but were entirely extrinsic. Nor can the court perceive any reason for distinguishing between circumstances which appear in the letter containing the promise and those which are derived from other sources. The great motive for construing a promise to accept, as an acceptance, is, that it gives credit to the bill, and may induce a third person to take it. If the letter be not shown, its contents, whatever they may be, can give no credit to the bill; and if it be shown, an absolute promise to accept will give all the credit to the bill which a full confidence that it will be accepted can give it. A conditional promise becomes absolute when the condition is performed.

In the case of Mason v. Hunt (Doug., 296), Lord Mansfield said: "There is no doubt but an agreement to accept may amount to an acceptance; and it may be couched in such words as to put a third person in a better condition than the drawee. If one man, to give credit to another, makes an absolute promise to accept his bill, the drawee, or any other person, may [73*] show such promise upon the exchange, to get credit, and a third person, who should advance his money upon it, would have nothing to do with the equitable circumstances which might subsist between the drawer and acceptor."

What is it that "the drawer, or any other person, may show upon the exchange?" It is the promise to accept—the naked promise. The motive to this promise need not, and cannot be examined. The promise itself, when shown, gives the credit; and the merchant who makes it is bound by it.

The cases cited from Cowper and Douglass are, it is admitted, cases in which the bill is not taken for a pre-existing debt, but is purchased on the credit of the promise to accept. But in the case of Pillans v. Van Mierop, the credit was given before the promise was received or the bill drawn; and in all cases the person who receives such a bill in payment of a debt will be prevented thereby from taking other means to obtain the money due to him. Any ingredient of fraud would, unquestionably, affect the whole transaction; but the mere circumstance that the bill was taken for a pre-existing debt has not been thought sufficient to do away the effect of a promise to accept.

In the case of Johnson and another v. Collins (1 East. 98), Lord Kenyon shows much dissatisfaction with the previous decisions on this subject; but it is not believed that the judgment given in that case would, even in England, change the law as previously established. [74*] In the case of Johnson v. Collins the promise to accept was in a letter to the drawer, and is not stated to have been shown to the indorser. Consequently, the bill does not appear to have been taken on the credit of that promise. It was a mere naked promise, unaccompanied with circumstances which might give credit to the bill. The counsel contended that this naked promise amounted to an acceptance; but the court determined otherwise. In giving his opinion, Le Blanc, J., lays down the rule in the words used by Lord Mansfield, in the case of Pierson v. Dunlop; and Lord Kenyon said, that "this was carrying the doctrine of implied acceptances to the utmost verge of the law; and he doubted whether it did not even go beyond it." In Clark and others v. Cock (4 East. 57), the judges again express their dissatisfaction with the law as established, and their regret that any other act than a written acceptance on the bill had ever been deemed an acceptance. Yet they do not undertake to overrule the decisions which they disapprove. On the contrary, in that case, they unanimously declared a letter to the drawer promising to accept the bill, which was shown to the person who held it, and took it on the credit of that letter, to be a virtual acceptance. It is true, in the case of Clark v. Cock, the bill was made before the promise was given, and the judges, in their opinions, use some expressions which indicate a distinction between bills drawn before and after the date of the promise; but no case has been decided on this distinction; and in Pillans & Rose [*75 v. Van Mierop & Hopkins, the letter was written before the bill was drawn.

The court can perceive no substantial reason for this distinction. The prevailing inducement for considering a promise to accept, as an acceptance, is that credit is thereby given to the bill. Now, this credit is given as entirely by a letter written before the date of the bill as by one written afterwards.

It is of much importance to merchants that this question should be at rest. Upon a review of the cases which are reported, this court is of opinion that a letter written within a reasonable time before or after the date of a bill of exchange, describing it in terms not to be mistaken, and promising to accept it, is, if shown to the person who afterwards takes the bill on the credit of the letter, a virtual acceptance binding the person who makes the promise. This is such a case. There is, therefore, no error in the judgment of the Circuit Court, and it is affirmed with costs.

It appears by the discussions in the council of state in drawing up the new Commercial Code, that no provision requiring the acceptance to be written on the bill itself was inserted, in order to avoid a mistaken inference which might be drawn from it that the law meant to prohibit the acceptance of a bill by a letter promising to accept (par lettre missive.) THE DOS HERMANOS—GREEN, Claimant.

In prize causes, the evidence to acquit or condemn must come, in the first instance, from the papers and crew of the captured ship.

It is the duty of the captors to bring the ship's papers into the registry of the District Court, and to have the examinations of the principal officers and seamen of the captured ship taken on the standing interrogatories.

77*] *It is exclusively upon these papers and examinations that the cause is to be heard in the first instance: If, from this evidence, the property clearly appears to be hostile or neutral, condemnation or restitution immediately follows. If the property appears to be doubtful, or the case suspicious, further proof may be granted according to the rules which govern the legal discretion of the court.

If the parties have been guilty of gross fraud, or misconduct, or illegality, further proof is not allowed, and condemnation follows.

Although some apology may be found in the state of peace which had so long existed previous to the late war, for the irregularities which had crept into the prize practice, that apology no longer exists; and if such irregularities should hereafter occur, it may be proper to withhold condemnation even in the clearest cases, unless the irregularities are avoided or explained.

If a party attempts to impose upon the court, by knowingly or fraudulently claiming as his own property belonging in part to others, he will not be entitled to restitution of that portion which he may ultimately establish as his own.

It seems that where a native citizen of the United States emigrated before a declaration of war to a neutral country, there acquired a domicile, and afterwards returned to the United States during the war and re-acquired his native domicile, he became a reintegrated American citizen; and could not afterwards, flagrante bello, acquire a neutral domicile by again emigrating to his adopted country.

The claimants have no right to litigate the question whether the captors were duly commissioned; the claimants have no persona standi in judicio to assert the rights of the United States. But if the capture be made by a non-commissioned captor, the prize will be condemned to the United States.

APPEAL from the District Court for the Louisiana District.

This was the case of a Spanish schooner captured on the 18th of October, 1814, by Mr. Shields, a purser in the navy, commanding an armed barge, in the service of the United States, ostensibly bound with a cargo of crates and dry goods, on a voyage from Jamaica to 78*] Pensacola, but in fact in pursuance *of an asserted change of destination then in prosecution of a voyage to New Orleans. The schooner was delivered up, and prize proceedings were instituted against the cargo in the District Court for Louisiana District. Upon the return of the monition various claims were interposed for small adventures or parts of the cargo; but the only questions before the court arose upon the claim of Mr. Basil Green, calling himself a citizen of the Republic of Carthagena, who, by his agents, Mr. John F. Miller and Messrs. Lewis & Lee, asserted an ownership to nearly the whole of the cargo. Mr. Miller, in his affidavit annexed to the claim, states, "that he purchased the goods so claimed, with moneys in his hands belonging to the claimant; that at the time of the purchase, he expected to have had an interest therein, but that on his arrival at New Orleans, the attorney in fact of the said claimant (meaning Mr. Lewis) refused to allow any such interest, and the deponent is therefore obliged to give up the same; and this deponent further saith, that the facts contained in the said claim are true to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief." At the hearing in the District Court, the claim was rejected, and the goods were condemned as the property of enemies, or of citizens trading with the enemies of the United States.

Harper, for the appellant and claimant, argued, upon the facts, that the proprietary interest in the cargo was in the claimant, and that he (though a native citizen) had a right to change his domicile, and did change it bona fide to Carthagena, in South America, where he *was a resident merchant, and in his [*79 neutral character had a right to trade with the enemy of his native country.¹ He further suggested that the captor was not duly authorized to capture, there being no evidence that the armed barge, which made the capture, was duly incorporated into the navy.²

Key, contra, argued that the residence of the claimant at Carthagena was temporary only, and that the whole transaction was infected with fraud and falsehood.

STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Before we consider the merits of this claim it may not be unfit to advert to some of the principles applicable to proceedings in prize causes, which seem to have been wholly neglected in the progress of this cause.

It is the established rule in courts of prize that the evidence to acquit or condemn must, in the first instance, come from the papers and crew of the captured ship. On this account it is the duty of the captors, as soon as practicable, to bring the ship's papers into the registry of the District Court, and to have the examinations of the principal officers and *sea- [*80 men of the captured ship taken before the district judge, or commissioners appointed by him, upon the standing interrogatories. It is exclusively upon these papers and the examin-n'exclut pas l'acceptation par lettre missive, on en concluerait naturellement qu'elle la permet." Esprit du Code de Commerce, par J. G. Locré, tom. 2, p. 89.

Such is the law of France on this subject. That of England is fully analyzed in the above opinion. In the tribunals of our own country, the first case which occurs on the subject, is that of M'Kim v. Smith et al. 1 Hall's Law Journal, 486, in which the doctrine of the above opinion is fully recognized. The next is that of M'Evers v. Mason, 10 Johns, Rep. 207, in which a more limited application of the principle may seem to be indicated. But upon an inspection of that case, it will be found that the Supreme Court of New York declined expressing any opinion upon the question whether a promise to accept a bill not in case would amount to an acceptance, and whether an indorsee could avail himself of such promise and maintain an action on the bill against the drawee. The Supreme Court of Massachusetts also, in the case of Wilson v. Clements, 3 Mass. Rep., 1, avoided a determination of the question whether a promise to accept before the bill was drawn amounted to an acceptance, because the bill was not drawn in due season after the promise was made. But the above decision in the text may be considered as settling the law of the country on this subject.

ations, taken in preparatorio, that the cause is to be heard before the District Court. If, from the whole evidence, the property clearly appears to be hostile, or neutral, condemnation or acquittal immediately follows. If, on the other hand, the property appear doubtful, or the case be clouded with suspicions or inconsistencies, it then becomes a case of further proof, which the court will direct or deny, according to the rules which govern its legal discretion on this subject. Further proof is not a matter of course. It is granted in cases of honest mistake or ignorance, or to clear away any doubts or defects consistent with good faith. But if the parties have been guilty of gross fraud or misconduct, or illegality, further proof is not allowed; and under such circumstances, the parties are visited with all the fatal consequences of an original hostile character. It is essential, therefore, to the correct administration of prize law, that the regular modes of proceeding should be observed with the utmost strictness; and it is a great mistake to allow common law notions in respect to evidence or practice, to prevail in proceedings which have very little analogy to those at common law.

These remarks have been drawn forth by an examination of the present record. The court could not but observe with regret that great irregularities had attended the cause in the court below. Neither were the ship's papers produced by the captors, nor the captured crew examined upon the standing interrogatories. Witnesses were produced by the libelants and the claimant indiscriminately at the trial, and their testimony was taken in open court upon any and all points to which the parties chose to interrogate them, and upon this testimony and the documentary proofs offered by the witnesses, the cause was heard and finally adjudged. In fact there was nothing to distinguish the cause from an ordinary proceeding in a mere revenue cause in rem.

This court cannot but watch with considerable solicitude irregularities, which so materially impair the simplicity of prize proceedings, and the rights and duties of the parties. Some apology for them may be found in the fact that from our having been long at peace, no opportunity was afforded to learn the correct practice in prize causes. But that apology no longer exists; and if such irregularities should hereafter occur it may be proper to adopt a more rigorous course, and to withhold condemnation in the clearest cases, unless such irregularities are avoided or explained. In the present case the first fault was that of the captors; and if the claimant had suffered any prejudice from it, this court would certainly restore to him every practicable benefit. But in fact no such prejudice has arisen. The claimant has had, in the court below, the indulgence and benefit of further proof and of collateral aids to verify the truth of his claim; and he stands at least upon as favorable a ground to sustain it as if the cause had been conducted with the most scrupulous form.

Two questions have been argued at the bar: 82 First, whether Mr. Basil Green, the asserted owner, has established his proprietary interest in the goods in question; and, second, supposing this point decided in his favor, whether he has proved himself a neutral merchant, entitled, by his domicile and national character, to a restitution of the property.

It appears by the evidence in the case that Mr. Green was born in Maryland, and resided in that state, and principally at Baltimore, until the year 1809, when he went abroad. In 1811 he resided in Carthagen; and in the spring of 1813, he came to New Orleans from Carthagen, in a schooner under Carthaginian colors, and being unable to sell her, he determined, in connection with Messrs. John F. Miller, Lewis & Lee, and others, inhabitants of New Orleans, who became jointly interested with him, to fit her out as an American privateer. Accordingly, on or about the 13th of March, 1813, Mr. Green applied to the collector of the customs at New Orleans for a commission; and in his petition he described her as the private armed schooner Hornet, of New Orleans, owned by Basil Green. The commission was granted, and soon afterwards Mr. Green sailed in the privateer on her destined cruise. In June, 1813, he was, as he alleges, compelled by a mutiny of the crew to go to Carthagen, where they deserted, and the cruise was broken up, and the privateer was finally sold; of all which he gave information to the other owners at New Orleans, and promised to remit their proportions of the proceeds. While at New Orleans in April, 1813, Mr. Green executed a letter of attorney, appointing Messrs. Lewis & [*83] Lec, of that city, his general attorneys and agents, and in this power he described himself as "Basil Green, of Baltimore, merchant." He does not appear, since that period, to have returned to the United States. In July, 1814, he was a resident at Carthagen, and is described by one other witness as having a house and store there. Such are the most material facts respecting Mr. Green's domicile apparent on the record.

In respect to the proprietary interest in the goods claimed by him, the evidence is more complicated. The whole adventure was conducted by Mr. John F. Miller, of New Orleans (one of the proprietors of the Hornet), from whose testimony it appears that the owners of the Hornet, resident at New Orleans, having received information of her sale, and being desirous of receiving their funds, he, Miller, on his own account, and as their agent, determined to make a voyage to Carthagen for this purpose. He accordingly in June, 1814, went from New Orleans to St. Jago de Cuba, and from thence to Jamaica (as the only practicable route), and from thence to Carthagen. When he left New Orleans, he took a draft from Messrs. Lewis & Lee on Mr. Green for $2,500, and a letter from the same gentlemen to Messrs. O'Hara & Offley, merchants at Jamaica, authorizing them to pay him the balance of their accounts, whatever it might be. At Carthagen, in August, 1814, he received from Mr. Green the sum of $1,500.50, in part of the draft of Messrs. Lewis & Lee. He also received from Mr. Green the whole of the net proceeds of the sale of the [*84] Hornet, amounting to the sum of $11,636. of which his own share amounted to $1,500, and that of Mr. Green to $4,139.02; and he gave a receipt to Mr. Green for this amount, promising, on his arrival at New Orleans (sea risks and captures excepted), to pay over to the stockholders their respective proportions, deducting all necessary charges. Mr. Green directed his share to be remitted to his nephew at Baltimore, by written instructions contained in a letter directed to Mr. Miller, as follows: "Carthagera, August 12, 1814, Mr. John F. Miller. My dear sir—On your safe arrival in New Orleans, sea risks and captures excepted, you are authorized and appointed, at my wish, in which you will please to remit on to my nephew, Mr. George A. Stamp, of Baltimore, the sum of $4,129.02, after deducting the charges thereon, and you will much oblige your friend—Respectfully—B. Green." On the 29th of August Mr. Green addressed a letter to his nephew, in the following paragraph: "Mr. John F. Miller, a particular friend of mine, will remit on to you, in good bills, after his safe arrival in New Orleans, the sum of $4,129.25, agreeable to his receipt on the same, now in my possession. Perhaps he may remit you a $1,000 or $1,500 more, if fortune favors his prospects." At what period Mr. Miller left Carthagera, does not precisely appear, but he says that he thinks it was before the 20th of August and that the letter of the 29th of August was sent [85] to him at Jamaica. Previous *to his departure, he further asserts that Mr. Green gave him verbal instructions to lay out his share of the money in goods, at Jamaica, instead of remitting it to his nephew, and also by a written authority, under date of the 12th of August, authorized him, if he thought proper, to draw on him for the further sum of $2,500, at five days sight. From Carthagera, Mr. Miller went to Jamaica, where he endeavored to purchase a small vessel; but failing in his object, he, on the 9th of September, 1814, chartered the Spanish schooner Dos Hermanos, Captain Delgado master and owner, then lying at Kingston. By the charter-party, which was made by Messrs. O'Hara & Offley, on behalf of the owner of the one part, and Mr. Miller of the other part, it was agreed that the sum of $1,500 should be given for the charter of the vessel for a voyage from Kingston to Pensacola, in West Florida, and back again to Kingston. That after her arrival at Pensacola, Mr. Miller should put on board, within 18 days, a return cargo of the produce of the country, to be consigned to Messrs. O'Hara & Offley for sale; and should further invest the amount of the freight in cotton or tobacco, on account of Mr. Delgado, and ship it on the return voyage, freight free, unless it occupied more than a stipulated portion of the room of the vessel. Mr. Miller was further to pay all port charges, and in case of detention beyond 18 days, demurrage, also, at the rate of $16 per day. And it was further agreed that if the situation of that part of the world should be such as to preclude any communication between New Orleans and Pensacola, *and prevent Mr. Miller from procuring a full return cargo or as much cotton and tobacco as should be required for the amount of the charter, then the said amount of $1,500 was to be paid over on account of the said O'Hara & Offley, to Mr. John K. West, of New Orleans; and in that event, and payment of all port charges, Miller was to be at liberty to decline loading the vessel on the return voyage. Immediately after the execution of this charter-party, Mr. Miller loaded on board of the schooner the goods in question, through the agency of Messrs. O'Hara & Offley; and drew a bill for $2,500 in their favor, on Mr. Green, and received from them, for the account of Messrs. Lewis & Lee, the sum of $900. The whole cargo, with an inconsiderable exception, was documented as the property of a Don Juan Lesado, of Pensacola, and purported to be the proceeds of the sale of a former cargo consigned by him to Messrs. O'Hara & Offley. Among these documents, which are asserted by the claimant to be merely colorable, there is an invoice account current of the sales of a supposed former cargo; and a letter of advice, stating that the schooner was chartered for the voyage on account of Don Juan Lesado, and that the cargo, consisting of dry goods, was a return cargo purchased by his orders. There is, also, a bill of lading consigning the cargo to the same person. Mr. Miller alleges this artifice to have been resorted to to preserve the shipment from British and Spanish capture. The schooner sailed on the voyage about the 13th of September, with Mr. Miller on board, and *having been driven by currents consider- [87] ably to the westward of Pensacola, and being in the Bay of St. Bernard, Mr. Miller left the schooner about the first of October, in a boat, which he had purchased at Jamaica, for the purpose, and proceeded for New Orleans, leaving the property under the control and directions of a Mr. Bassett, who was a passenger on board. On the 13th of October, Mr. Miller arrived at New Orleans. In the meantime the schooner proceeded to Dauphin Island, and there Mr. Bassett undertook (as he alleges) to change the destination, and determined to proceed to New Orleans; and, for this purpose, on the 14th of October, 1814, he entered into a new charter-party in behalf of Mr. Miller, by which it was agreed between Mr. Bassett, as agent of Mr. Miller, and Captain Delgado for himself and Messrs. O'Hara & Offley, that for the additional sum of $1,100, the vessel should immediately proceed from Dauphin Island for the Bayou St. John, near the city of New Orleans, and there deliver the said cargo to Mr. Miller, his agents or assigns. The schooner was soon afterwards captured by the libelants, detained in the Bay of St. Lewis, and subsequently brought to Petit Coquille. After his arrival at New Orleans, and before knowledge of the capture, Mr. Miller wrote the following letter to Mr. Bassett: "New Orleans, 15th of October, 1814. Dear sir:—I arrived here on the 15th in the morning, after 12 days' suffering, and found all my family as well as could be expected from the situation of this place and Pensacola. I have thought proper to remain *without doing anything until I hear of [88] your arrival, and news from you. I would advise, by all means, to fetch the vessel and cargo to Mobile point, if no farther, if possible. I believe it can be done without much or no danger. I believe, also, it is practicable to procure a permission from the English commander to come to New Orleans with the schooner, provided you promise to return with provisions that they stand in need of. Try every means in your power to effect the arrival here of yourself and schooner. Should you get the schooner here, I shall meet a ready sale for the crockeryware, and the schooner a ready dispatch. Blankets sell readily at nine dollars per pair. Try and make arrangements with Delgado to fetch the schooner here, as it is certainly greatly to his advantage as well as ours. I depend upon your known activity, and remain your friend. In haste, the vessel is about to sail.

MILLER.

I have not time to write to Delgado, but will next opportunity. Should you not have consigned the schooner and cargo to any person, you may place any confidence in Mr. Joseph Moreiga, as I know him well."

Mr. Miller asserts that he brought a considerable sum of money in dollars and doubloons from Jamaica, of which he took $4,500, when he left the schooner, in the boat, for New Orleans, and the residue, amounting to about $1,800 or $1,900, which was stored away in several crates of goods, he afterwards contrived to obtain from the schooner in the night time while she lay at Petit Coquilles. All the letters brought in the schooner from Jamaica were taken by Mr. Miller, and all the documents respecting the cargo came from his hands during his several examinations in court.

Such is the general outline of the case, as to the question of proprietary interest in the goods claimed in behalf of Mr. Green. An examination of some other minute, though important particulars, will properly arise in the subsequent discussion of this question.

The first thing that strikes us on the slightest survey of this cause, is the total absence of all documentary proof to establish the claim of Mr. Green. The shipment was made in the enemy's country in the name of an enemy, and ultimately destined for sale at Mobile or New Orleans, if the parties should be able to accomplish the voyage. The property was clothed with a Spanish character, as Mr. Miller asserts, to protect it from British and Spanish capture. It is certainly the duty of neutrals to put on board of their ships sufficient papers to show the real character of the property, and if their conduct be fair and honest, there can rarely occur an occasion to use disguise, or false documents. At all events, when false or colorable documents are used, the necessity or reasonableness of the excuse ought to be very clear and unequivocal to induce a court of prize to rest satisfied with it. To say the least of it, the excuse is not, in this case, satisfactory; for the disguise is as strongly pointed to elude American as British or Spanish capture. It is not pretended that any genuine papers were put on board, or are now in existence, which would explain the circumstances; for Mr. Miller, himself, in an answer to an interrogatory on this point, says he had from Mr. Green no written instructions, nor did he enter into a written contract with Mr. Green respecting the goods to be purchased at Jamaica; that Mr. Green would have given written instructions, but he, Mr. Miller, objected to it, as in case of capture it would have been insecure. He adds that there are no letters or papers at Carthagena that can throw any light on this subject, and that not having received any, he was unwilling to leave any.

In the next place, there is not, with the exception of Mr. Miller's, the slightest testimony from the ship's crew that the property belonged to Mr. Green. The master and mate of the schooner, and Mr. Bassett also, the agent of Mr. Miller, expressly state that they always believed Mr. Miller to be the real owner, and that he never named any other person to them as the owner, though he sometimes alluded darkly to a possible ownership in others. It is a general rule of the prize law not to admit claims which stand in entire opposition to the ship's papers, and to the preparatory examinations, where the voyages have originated after the war. The rule is founded upon this simple reason, that it would open a door to fraud in an incalculable extent, if persons were not required to describe their property with perfect fairness. The rule, however, is not inflexible; it yields to cases of necessity, or where, by the course of the trade, simulated papers become indispensable, as in a trade licensed by the state with the public enemy. It may be said that the rule cannot be applied to the present case, because Mr. Miller is to be deemed one of the ship's crew, although he had, some time before the capture, left the vessel, and was, at the time of capture, at New Orleans; and that his examinations (for he was examined several times) established the interest of Mr. Green, and so the claim is consistent with what ought to have been the evidence in preparatorio. Assuming this argument to be correct, on which we give no opinion, the circumstances of this case call for the most plenary explanations to dissipate the doubts which cannot fail to be awakened.

These explanations come altogether from Mr. Miller, and are unsupported by any corroborative documents, or facts asserted upon independent testimony. All that the other principal witnesses have testified to, which bears directly on the cause, consists of declarations or confessions, or acts of Mr. Miller, after his return to New Orleans. Mr. Miller himself certainly stands in a predicament which does not lend additional credit to his assertions. He was the projector of the voyage, and the conductor of all its operations. He chartered the vessel in his own name; and if he was acting for Mr. Green, and not for himself, what motive could there be for him to conceal his agency from Messrs. O'Hara & Offley, or from Captain Delgado? The voyage itself was illegal in an American citizen. The charter-party stipulated for a return cargo to Jamaica, which was to be furnished by Mr. Miller, and he does not pretend that this cargo was to have been shipped on Mr. Green's account. It must have been a traffic on his own account, or a joint concern with Messrs. O'Hara & Offley; and in either view was a surrender of all the obligations which he owed to his country. These considerations cannot certainly increase our confidence in the integrity of the conduct of Mr. Miller.

On examining his testimony there are many circumstances which cannot fail to create unfavorable doubts. The test affidavit itself is couched in very equivocal language. Mr. Miller there asserts that at the time of the purchase he expected to have an interest in the goods, but that on his arrival at New Orleans, the attorney in fact of the claimants refused to allow any such interest, and the deponent was obliged to give up the same. What authority could Mr. Lewis, the attorney here alluded to, have to intermeddle with Mr. Miller's interest in the shipment? He was not the consignee of the property, nor was he confidentially acquainted with any agreement or instructions of Mr. Green relative to the voyage. It is scarcely credible that the real consignee of the goods, having an interest in them, should, under such circumstances, yield it up to a mere intruder. In his examination in chief, Mr. Miller states that it was his original intention to have invested his own funds, as well as Mr. Green's, at Jamaica; but he was induced to abandon it by reports that the British intended to occupy Pen-^{93*} sacola *and Mobile Point; and he explains his interest in the shipment to have been only a right to one-third of the profits in lieu of commissions.

This representation is not consistent with the language held by Mr. Miller on other occasions. After the capture Mr. Miller stated to Captain Delgado that "he had got himself into a difficulty in consequence of his (Delgado's) coming here; that the greater part of the funds invested in the goods belonged to Mr. Green; that he (Miller) was acting for others, and that he feared he should get himself into difficulty." Upon an inquiry from the same person during the voyage from Kingston, whether he was the owner, Mr. Miller answered "that he did not know—that he had funds from Carthage." On another occasion, Mr. Miller gave another witness (Mr. M'Ilvaine) to understand "that the cargo was purchased on his (Miller's) and Green's account." And in a conversation with a Mr. West, who was the confidential agent of Messrs. O'Hara & Offley, and received a letter by the schooner advising him of the voyage, he left the impression on Mr. West's mind that the cargo was his own. The language, too, that Miller held with Mr. Heins (the mate of the schooner) after the capture, is very significant. He said, "It was a hard case that he should lose his property in that way; that it was the earnings of many years."

There are some other discrepancies in the declarations of Mr. Miller, which are not easily to be accounted for. Mr. Miller, in his examination, states that Mr. Green authorized him ^{94*} to invest in goods *the money belonging to him; and that after he chartered the schooner it was his intention to lay out Mr. Green's funds, as well as his own, in the purchase of goods; but that subsequent events induced him not to lay out his own funds, and that he laid out for Mr. Green about $6,000 only. In his conversation with Mr. Lewis he stated that there was an arrangement between Mr. Green and himself; that if he thought proper upon his arrival at Jamaica, he might invest in goods the whole of the $11,686, and more (for which he was authorized to draw on Mr. Green, if necessary), on the joint account of himself and Mr. Green; that after his arrival at Jamaica he thought he would enter into this speculation; and, thereupon, he drew upon Mr. Green for $2,500; and that after the draft was made he discovered that he had not any right to make this disposition of the funds of the stockholders in the Hornet, and, accordingly, he laid out $6,000 of Mr. Green's money, supposing he ought to have an interest in it himself, as a compensation for his trouble.

In determining the real character of this whole transaction it becomes material to ascertain the true value of the cargo shipped by Mr. Miller. He asserts it to be about $6,000; but no original invoice, or other genuine paper, is produced to prove its cost at Jamaica. According to Mr. Bassett, it was worth about $7,000 or $8,000; and Capt. Delgado says, that while lading it, Mr. Miller told him it would amount to about $8,000 or $10,000. If their cargo cost but $6,000, it may be asked, what became of the residue of the money in the *hands of Mr. Miller? According to his [⁹⁵ own account, he received for the sales of the Hornet $11,636; from O'Hara & Offley $900; and he drew a bill on Mr. Green, in part payment of the goods, for $2,500, making in the whole, the aggregate sum of $14,000. There remained, therefore, after the purchase of the goods, in the hands of Mr. Miller, about $8,000. What has become of this fund, belonging to himself and the stockholders in the Hornet? Here, as, indeed, in every other material part of the cause, the explanation comes exclusively from Mr. Miller. He says that when he left the schooner in St. Bernard's Bay, he took away with him in the boat the sum of $4,500; and that while the schooner lay at Petit Coquilles, he took away from some crates on board of the schooner, in which it was concealed, the further sum of $1,800 or $1,900. It is true that Capt. Delgado says that when Miller left the schooner he took away with him a bag, which, he supposes, contained dollars, but he does not pretend even to guess at the amount; and it is remarkable that none of the passengers are interrogated on this subject. But the statement in relation to the $1,800 or $1,900 is wholly incredible. The mate flatly denies that it could have been taken out of the crates in the manner which Miller asserts; and Mr. Bassett manifestly considers it almost impossible. What adds to the incredibility of the statement is, that when Mr. Miller left the schooner, he never informed Mr. Bassett that there was any money concealed in any of the crates, although he expressly constituted him his agent to dispose of the cargo, without any reserve.

*If the funds were brought to New [⁹⁶ Orleans in money, as Mr. Miller pretends, nothing could have been more easy of proof than the fact, considering that a large proportion of it belonged to the other stockholders in the Hornet. By the very terms of his receipt he was bound to pay over to them their respective proportions on his arrival at New Orleans. Has he done so? There is not the slightest proof to this effect in the case. On the contrary, several of the stockholders, or their agents, have been examined, and not one of them admits his proportion to have been paid. Indeed, Mr. Miller himself admits that he has never paid any; and gives this extraordinary excuse, that he had orders from Mr. Green not to pay over the money until three months after his arrival at New Orleans. This excuse is entirely at variance with the receipt given by Mr. Miller, and is as little reconcilable with the letter of Mr. Green to his nephew, respecting his own remittance. It may be added that the statement itself has very little intrinsic probability to support it.

It is, therefore, no harshness to declare that the declarations of Mr. Miller, that he brought home so very considerable a sum, are not of themselves entitled to much credit, and, under the circumstances, cannot be received as satisfactory evidence of the fact by this court; and if so, then every suspicion that the whole funds were invested in the cargo is greatly inflamed, and every doubt of the good faith of the present claim materially strengthened.

There are many other circumstances in the case which tend to a discredit of the claim; but 97 it would *occupy too much time to discuss them minutely. One circumstance, however deserves particular notice. It is the letter of Mr. Miller written to Mr. Bassett, after his arrival at New Orleans, which may almost be said to carry, in every line of it, the language and feelings of an owner of the goods. And it adds no inconsiderable force to these observations, that the only documents on board pointing to Mr. Green are inconsistent with the supposition that the goods were purchased on his account; and the only doubtful expression in them may well be satisfied as referring to money to be obtained by Mr. Miller, from a Mr. Hardy, of Jamaica, who was indebted to Mr. Green.

Considering, then, that the present claim rests altogether upon the testimony of Mr. Miller, given by him after he well knew the form and pressure of the cause, and liable, as it must be, to the strongest doubts both from the predicament in which he stands, and the circumstances which have been already stated, the court cannot admit that it is supported by any reasonable evidence. It is not material, in our view, whether the property belonged wholly to Mr. Miller, or to him jointly with Green, or was purchased with the funds of the stockholders of the Hornet, on his own account, as an unauthorized speculation, or on joint account with their authority; for in either case it is liable to the same judgment. It is a settled rule of this court, that if a party will attempt to impose upon the court by knowingly or fraudulently claiming as his own property belonging in part to others, he shall not be entitled to a restitution of that portion which he may ultimately establish *as his own. This rule is founded in the purest principles of morality and justice, and would bear upon the claim of Mr. Green, supposing his domicile, as a neutral, were ever so clearly established.

In respect to the domicile of Mr. Green, there is certainly much reason to doubt if it would be sufficient to protect him, even if he could show himself, at the time of the capture, a citizen of Carthage. For, if upon his return to New Orleans after the war, he acquired a domicile there (of which the circumstance of his becoming the owner of a privateer in that port affords a strong presumption), he became a reintegrated American citizen, and he could not, by an emigration afterwards, flagrante bello, acquire a neutral character so as to separate himself from that of his native country.

The counsel for the claimant, aware of the pressure of his case upon the present evidence, has prayed to be admitted to make further proof, which he states to be now in his possession. If this cause turned upon the question of domicile, the court would feel little hesitation in admitting it. But considering the manner in which the cause was conducted in the court below, and that the claimant there had the benefit of further proof, and that it appears to us that upon the question of proprietary interest, the cause now admits of no fair and reasonable explanation, consistent with an exclusive interest in Mr. Green, we do not feel at liberty to make an order for further proof. We are not satisfied that it would be a safe or convenient rule, unless, under very special circumstances, to allow parties who have had the benefit *of plenary proof in the court below, to have an order for further proof in this court upon the same points. Much less should we incline to allow it in a case of pregnant suspicion, where the evidence must come from sources tainted with so many unwholesome personal interests, and so many infusions of doubtful credit.

The claim of Mr. Green must, therefore, be rejected, and the goods be condemned as good and lawful prize.

It has been urged that there is no evidence upon the record that the capture were duly commissioned, and that further proof ought to be required on this point. This, however, is a question which the claimant has no right to litigate. He has no legal standing before the court to assert the rights of the United States. If the capture was without a commission, the condemnation must be to the United States generally; if with a commission, as a national vessel, it must still be to the United States, but the proceeds are to be distributed by the court among the captors according to law. It will be time enough to require the commission to be produced when the proceeds are to be distributed by the court, if the United States shall then insist upon any exclusive claim.

BEVERLY v. BROOKE.

Where the owner of certain slaves, and also part owner of a vessel, hired the slaves to the master of the vessel to proceed as mariners on board, on a voyage, at the usual wages, and without any special contract of hiring; held, that the master, having acted with good faith, was not responsible for the escape of the slaves in a foreign port, which was one of the contingent termini of the voyage, and consequently within the hazards to which the owner knew his property might be exposed; although it was doubtful whether the master had strictly pursued his orders in going to such port.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

This suit was instituted by the plaintiff in the Circuit Court for the county of Alexandria, to recover the value of three slaves hired by the plaintiff to the defendant for a voyage to some part of Europe in the brig Sophila, of which the defendant was master, which slaves escaped from the vessel, and were lost to the owner. The claim was founded on the allegation that the master pursued a different voyage from that for which the slaves were hired, and that to this cause was to be ascribed the loss that has been sustained.

The cause was argued by Swann for the plaintiff, and by Taylor for the defendant. The latter cited Pothier on Obligations, part 1, c. 101*] 2, art. 3, *to show that the party was only responsible for the ordinary results of his fault, unaccompanied with fraud,¹ and contended that the loss of the slaves was not a necessary consequence of the shipmaster's supposed misconduct, but was remote and unforeseen.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The declaration in this cause states that the defendant "was master of the brig Sophila, then in the county of Alexandria, and bound on a voyage from thence to Savannah, in the state of Georgia, and from Savannah to New York, in the state of New York, and from thence to such other place or places as he, the said defendant, might be directed to go to by the owners of the said brig." of whom the plaintiff was one. That believing and expecting the defendant would pursue the orders he should receive, as was his duty, he hired to him, for the voyage the slaves in the declaration mentioned.

It appeared in evidence that these slaves were received on board the vessel as mariners on the usual wages, and without any special contract.

102*] *On the 23d of May, 1809, after the Sophila had sailed from Alexandria to Savannah, a letter of instructions was addressed to the master, which contains the following directions: "I hope this will find you arrived at Savannah, and ready to proceed on your voyage to Amsterdam, where you are to proceed with all dispatch; and when you arrive off the Texel, should you not have received information either from Messrs. Willinks, or from some source that you can depend upon, that you can enter Holland with safety, you are to proceed to Tonnigen, and from thence communicate with Messrs. Willinks, and follow their instructions. If they say they cannot get you admitted to the continent, or can do nothing for you, you are then at liberty to take upon yourself the disposal of the cargo in any way that may be practicable, and the investment of the proceeds in any German goods that may answer our market. Should no opportunity offer for a sale at Tonnigen, or on the coast of Holland, or Denmark, or in the Baltic, you must then, as a last resort, proceed to Liverpool," &c.

On the 6th of July, 1809, a letter containing additional instructions, was written, of which the following is an extract: "Nothing decisive has yet occurred whereby to judge of the ultimate result of the pending negotiations between this country and the powers of the continent. But hoping, by the time you arrive in the British channel, all difficulties will be settled between us and the continent, your owners are still desirous, and direct, that you may prosecute your voyage, as before directed, for *Amsterdam. They are, however, desirous, [103 that before you attempt to enter the Texel, you inform yourself whether the port be blockaded, and whether there be any danger of confiscation after entering. And should you not be able to get satisfactory information on these heads at sea, or going up the British channel, you will proceed, as before directed, for Tonnigen, and from thence communicate with Messrs. Willinks, of Amsterdam, and Messrs. Parish & Co., of Hamburg, and abide by their instructions. Should it so turn out that you cannot, with safety, proceed to Amsterdam, and that you can get admittance at Tonnigen or Hamburg, you will deliver your cargo at either place to Messrs. Parish & Co., as they may instruct you," &c. "If no admittance can be had either at Amsterdam, Hamburg, or Tonnigen, you are then at liberty to do the best you can with the cargo, as before directed."

Under these instructions the Sophila proceeded on her voyage, till visited by one of the squadron which blockaded Amsterdam. Information was there received showing the danger, from the local government, of entering the Texel, and also that Hamburg and Bremen were shut, and that Tonnigen had been shut and opened to American vessels several times. The Sophila continued to ply off and on the mouth of the Texel for four or five days, with her signals displayed, when the master concluded to run into the Texel, the blockade of which, it would seem, was not then intended to exclude neutral commerce. In executing this design he was met by the schooner Enterprise, an American man-of-war, *beating out [*104 abreast the first buoy of the Hacks. The commander of the schooner sent his boat to the Sophila with a request that her master would come on board the Enterprise. The defendant went on board, and continued there near two hours. On his return, the commander of the Enterprise sent on board the Sophila a Captain Swaine, master of an American vessel which had been captured by a Danish cruiser on a voyage to St. Petersburg, and condemned. Captain Swaine gave to Captain Brooke, the defendant, a written statement, containing all the information he possessed respecting the dangers of those seas. He stated that his vessel was captured on the 4th, and condemned on the 19th of June. That on the 20th himself and his men were turned on shore without assigning to them any cause of capture or condemnation, and without making any provision for them. His men were compelled to go on board Danish privateers to avoid starving. He remained himself at Albourg, until the 17th of July, when he traveled by land to Amsterdam, and passed within four miles of Tonningen. The information of Captain Swaine showed that the seas about the mouths of the Eider, the Elbe, and the Weser, swarmed with Danish privateers, who respected no flag, and brought in every American vessel they could capture. On the 28th of July he passed through Hamburg, and waited on the American consul for a passport, where he was informed by the chancellor that there were several American vessels at Tonningen petitioning for liberty to land their cargoes, which 105] they could *not obtain, nor was any attention paid to their petitions. He received the same information afterwards at Amsterdam. By the consulate at Hamburg he was also informed that there had been, a few days before, some American vessels at Cruxhaven, which had been ordered by the consul to leave that place immediately. After receiving this information the Sophila proceeded to Liverpool, where the slaves of the plaintiff escaped, and have been totally lost.

Upon this testimony the counsel for the plaintiff prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if they believed the evidence, the plaintiff was entitled to recover of the defendant the value of the slaves in the declaration mentioned. The court refused to give this instruction, to which refusal the plaintiff excepted. A verdict was found for the defendant, and a judgment rendered thereon by the court, which judgment is now before this court on writ of error.

The plaintiff in error contends that the Circuit Court ought to have given the instruction prayed for, because, 1st. The defendant has violated the instructions by which he was bound. 2d. Any violation of those instructions subjects him to every loss sustained in consequence thereof.

Captain Brooke is supposed to have violated his orders in not proceeding to Tonningen, and waiting there for the directions of Messrs. Willinks.

In considering the instructions given by the owners of the Sophila, there are extrinsic circumstances which ought not to be entirely overlooked. The state of the whole commercial 106] world was without *example. The then Emperor of France exercised the most absolute despotism over nearly the whole continent of Europe, and at his capricious will destroyed the commerce and seized the property of neutrals in the ports of those who were compelled to submit to his influence. Under such circumstances it is reasonable to suppose that, in commercial expeditions planned from so distant a place as the United States, some confidence is placed in the master of the voyage, and that much must be left to his discretion. Although this consideration will not excuse a disobedience of orders, it is entitled to weight in expounding orders not entirely decisive. The primary object of the owners was obviously that the Sophila should go to Amsterdam. Yet this primary object was to be relinquished, if not to be attained with safety; and of this the master was the judge.

But the orders are said to direct the master absolutely to proceed to Tonningen, should he decline entering the Texel.

In the first letter, of the 23d of May, this direction does appear to be positive, but it also appears to have been given in the expectation that the voyage from the mouth of the Texel to Tonningen might be prosecuted without imminent danger, and with the probability of entering some port on the continent. Of this probability the Messrs. Willinks were to judge, should it be in the power of Captain Brooke to consult them.

The first paragraph of the letter of the 6th of July repeats the order to proceed to Tonningen, *should it be unsafe to enter [107 the Texel, and there "to communicate with Messrs. Willinks, of Amsterdam, and Messrs. Parish & Co., of Hamburg, and to follow their instruction." The letter then directs the conduct of the master, should he be enabled to get admittance into Tonningen or Hamburg, and proceeds to say: "If no admittance can be had, either at Amsterdam, Tonningen, or Hamburg, you are then at liberty to do the best you can with the cargo, as before directed."

It is on this last clause in the letter that the difficulty arises.

The plaintiff contends that the master had no right to determine at the mouth of the Texel the practicability of getting into Tonningen or Hamburg, but was bound to proceed for the former place, and when there, to govern himself by the directions of Messrs. Willinks, or of Messrs. Parish & Co. If this be not the true construction of the letter, he then contends that the intelligence received off the mouth of the Texel did not excuse the master for sailing from that place for Liverpool.

As the first paragraph of that letter contains an unconditional order to proceed to Tonningen, should it be unsafe to go to Amsterdam, it is probable that the owners might found their subsequent orders on the state of things which might be found to exist when the vessel should arrive at Tonningen, and on the expectation that the voyage would be prosecuted to that place. But this expectation is not so clearly expressed as to be free from doubt. The writer does not say "if on arriving at Tonningen *no admittance can be had," [108 &c.; but, "If no admittance can be had," &c. These expressions might well be understood to apply to the fact, although it should be communicated before arriving at the place, and to dispense with the necessity of a useless voyage to Tonningen. There is the more reason for coming to this conclusion from the consideration that the vessel could not arrive at a place, admittance into which was forbidden. Whether this be the true construction of the letter or not, the phraseology is deemed too ambiguous to subject the master to remote damages, not certainly produced by his omitting to proceed to Tonningen, if, in omitting so to do he acted with good faith and a sincere desire to obey his orders.

This brings us to the information under which he acted. That information was that Hamburg was shut. That Tonningen had been occasionally shut and occasionally opened to American vessels. That, at the time, the cargoes of those which had been admitted were not allowed to be sold; and that the voyage to Tonningen would be attended with very serious hazards, which were probably not contemplated by his owners when they gave their instructions. If, in such a state of things, the master should be thought to have misconstrued his instructions, and should be deemed responsible for exercising his own discretion, the action, founded on such misconstruction, would certainly be a harsh one. The court will not decide this question, because its decision is rendered unnecessary by the view taken of the second point.

109*] *2d. Admitting that the true construction of his orders required the master to proceed to Tonningen, on finding it unsafe to go to Amsterdam, is he liable in this action?

The court thinks he is not. No special contract is proved, and the slaves of the plaintiffs were put on board the vessel generally as seamen. The court is not satisfied that the danger of their escaping might not be as great on the continent as in England. But, at any rate, Liverpool was one of the contingent termini of the voyage, and was consequently within the hazards to which the plaintiff knew his property might be exposed. The danger of losing them, should the Sophila proceed to Liverpool, did not deter him from placing the slaves on board the vessel, nor from directing the master to go to Liverpool, or from giving full discretion respecting his port, in an event which was far from being improbable.

There is no error, and the judgment is to be affirmed with costs.

M'COUL

v.

LEKAMP'S ADMINISTRATRIX.

A. L. brought an action of assumpsit in the Circuit Court, and after issue joined, the plaintiff died,

1. It will be perceived that the above case was determined upon the ground that, whether the master misconstrued his orders or not, no special contract of hiring being proved, and the slaves being put on board generally as mariners, having escaped at a port which was one of the contingent termini of the voyage, and was, consequently, within the hazards to which the owner knew his property might be exposed, was not liable for the loss. In general, as to his obligations to the ship-owner, the master being a letter to hire of his care and attention, conductor operis faciendi, and the contract being reciprocally beneficial to both parties, nothing more is required of him than ordinary diligence; and he is only responsible *for ordinary neglect. But this must be understood, with the exception of his responsibility as a common carrier, and also that he is responsible like any other conductor operis, or even a mandatory, for a degree of skill in his profession adequate to the performance of what he undertakes. Imperitia culpæ adnumeratur; Straccha, de Nautis, Part 3, No. 32; Casaregis, Disc. 23, No. 65; Disc. 122, Nos. 1 and 12; Emerigon, tom. 1, p. 373. These principles have been recognized by the tribunals of our own country. In the case of Purviance et al. v. Angus, the High Court of Errors and Appeals of Pennsylvania said: "It is a wrong position that a master of a ship is not answerable for an error in judgment, but only for the fault of the heart, in civil matters. Reasonable care, attention, prudence, and fidelity, are expected from the master of a ship, and if any misfortune or mischief ensues from the want of them, either in himself or his mariners, he is responsible in a civil action." Per Chief Justice M'Kean, 1 Dall. 184. But it is difficult, if not impossible, to lay down many general rules to enforce the performance of all the duties of the master. Targa sarcastically remarks that it is as difficult to detect the misfeasance of ship-masters as that of phys-

and the suit was revived by scire facias in the name of his administratrix. While the suit was still depending, the administratrix intermarried with F. A., which marriage was pleaded puis darrein continuance. Held that the scire facias was thereupon abated, and a new scire facias might be issued to revive the original suit in the name of F. A. and wife, as the personal representative of A. L., in order to enable her to prosecute the suit until a final judgment under the judiciary act of 1789, ch. 20, sect. 31.

Where a witness, a clerk to the plaintiff, swore that the several articles of merchandise contained in the account annexed to his deposition, were sold to the defendant by the plaintiff, and were charged in the plaintiff's day-book by the deponent and another person who is dead, and that the deponent delivered, and further swore, that he had referred to the original entries in the day-book; held, that this was sufficient evidence to prove the sale and delivery of the goods.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Virginia.

This cause was argued by Lee, for the plaintiff in error, and by Swann, for the defendant in error.

*MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the [*112 opinion of the court.

Albert Lekamp brought this suit in the Circuit Court, for the District of Virginia, for the recovery of money claimed to be due to him from Neil M'Coul, the defendant below. After issue joined the plaintiff died, and the suit was revived in the name of his administratrix. While the suit was still depending, the administratrix intermarried with Frederick L. E. Amelung, which marriage was pleaded puis darrein continuance. The scire facias was thereupon abated and a new scire facias issued to revive the original action in the names of Amelung and wife, as the personal representatives of Albert Lekamp.

At a subsequent term the cause was tried on clans. Son questi errori, come quelli che commettono bene spesso i medici, nel curare li poveri infermi. Ch. 70. By the French Code de Commerce, it is provided that the responsibility of the master shall not be discharged but by proof of the intervention of the vis major or irresistible force. La responsabilité du capitaine ne cesse pas que par la preuve d'obstacles de force majeure, Liv. 2, tit. 4, Du Capitaine, art. 230. This provision may, at first sight, appear to extend unduly the responsibility of ship-masters, which (except in their capacity of common carriers) ought not to be enlarged beyond that of other persons who undertake, for a reward, to perform any work. Its insertion in the code was objected to upon this ground by the tribunal of commerce of Palmpol, who remarked that no ship-master would be found willing to incur a responsibility so tremendous as that which a rigorous application of the literal expressions of the law might incur. That many accidents happen in navigation which no human skill can avert, but which are not to be considered as the effects of the vis major, and many misfortunes which are not to be attributed to the want of knowledge, the negligence, or the fault of the master. The tribunal, therefore, proposed, as an amendment to the article, the addition of the following words: Ou par l'effet des accidens qui tiennent au hazard et à l'imprévoyance insurmontable de la navigation et du chômage dans les ports. But this *amendment was rejected upon the [*111 ground that it would be dangerous to insert in the code a general provision of this nature, which, though it might be required in some cases, would, in others, be perverted to the protection of fraud and negligence, and the principle of which ought, therefore, to be applied by judicial discretion in every particular case, according to its own peculiar circumstances. Espit du Code de Commerce, par J. G. Locré, tom. 3, p. 101.

the original issue, and a verdict found for the plaintiff, on which the defendant prayed that the judgment might be arrested for the following reasons: "Because he saith, that after the plea pleaded the original plaintiff, Albert Lekamp, departed this life, and Sophia Lekamp, his administratrix, sued forth a scire facias to revive the suit on the 4th of July, 1811; that while the suit stood revived in her name as administratrix, the said Sophia Lekamp intermarried with Frederick L. E. Amelung, and on the 4th of December, 1812, this defendant having pleaded the intermarriage aforesaid, it was ordered that the scire facias be abated, whereupon the said Frederick L. E. Amelung and Sophia, his wife, as administratrix aforesaid, sued out a new scire facias to revive the suit, and there being no new plea pleaded or any consent that the cause should be revived in any 113 other manner than the law would direct, the jury was empaneled, and a verdict found as aforesaid; and the said defendant saith, that the act of Congress, in that case made and provided, doth not warrant the revival of the suit in the name of the said Amelung and wife, under the circumstances aforesaid."

These errors were overruled, and a judgment rendered conforming to the verdict of the jury.

At the trial of this cause the plaintiff offered in evidence the deposition of Zachariah Roberts, with the accounts thereunto annexed. The deponent states that he was clerk of Albert Lekamp from the 10th day of January, 1804, to the 9th day of June, 1809. That the account B, annexed to his deposition, is a just and true account current taken from the books. That on the 8th day of November, 1805, Neil M'Coul paid up the balance for goods purchased previous to the 26th of April, 1805, with the interest due thereon as stated. He then recapitulates in his deposition the several items on the debit side of the account current, which is composed of the sums total of goods delivered on particular days, and "states most positively that the said items are taken from the account current of the said Neil M'Coul on the said Lekamp's books, which books he kept, and has had reference thereto. That viewing and referring to the other paper writing annexed, marked, also, with the letter B, beginning with the words, 'a statement of merchandise sold and delivered to Neil M'Coul,' he saith that the several articles of merchandise therein enumerated, specified, described, and at large 114 set forth and *charged, and contained also in the before-mentioned account current, marked B, were sold by said Albert Lekamp, in his life-time, and at the respective times at which they are charged to the defendant, Neil M'Coul, and were charged in the day-book of the said Albert Lekamp, by the deponent and Mr. Vithake, who is now deceased, and the deponent delivered them," &c. The deposition then proceeds to state that the prices are correctly stated; that all due credits, so far as he knows, are given; and that the balance is truly struck. And adds, that the deponent, before giving in his deposition, had reference to the original entries on the day-books of Lekamp, which entries were made by Mr. Vithake himself.

The first account, marked B, is, as is stated in the deposition, the account current. The second account, also marked B, is a particular and detailed enumeration of the articles sold and delivered, with their prices, and agrees in amount with the account current.

The counsel for the defendant moved the court not to allow the said accounts to go in evidence to the jury, as not being copies of the original entries in the day-books or original books of the plaintiff's intestate; but the court was of opinion that the account B, beginning with the words "statement," &c., was substantially stated by the witness to be a copy from the day-books, or original books of entries, and that the same was sufficiently proved to go in evidence to the jury, together with the said deposition. The defendants excepted to this opinion.

1st. In reviving this suit after the abatement of the first scire facias, which error ought to have arrested the judgment.

2d. In permitting the account marked B to go in evidence to the jury.

The first error assigned is of some consequence, as the decision upon it furnishes a rule of practice for all the circuit courts of the United States.

The argument for the plaintiff in error is briefly this: At common law all suits abate by the death or marriage of the plaintiff, if a feme sole; and such suit could not be prosecuted in the name of the representative, or of the husband and wife, unless enabled so to do by statute. The act of Congress provides for the case of death, but not for the case of marriage. Consequently, the suit of a feme sole who marries abates as at common law.

This argument, if applied to an original suit instituted by a feme sole, would certainly be conclusive; but this suit was not instituted by a feme sole. It was instituted by Albert Lekamp, who died while it was depending. The law says, "That where any suit shall be depending in any court of the United States, and either of the parties shall die before final judgment, the executor or administrator of such deceased party, who was plaintiff, petitioner, or defendant, in case the cause of action doth, by law, survive, shall have full power to prosecute or defend any such suit or action until final judgment."

When, therefore, Albert Lekamp died, his administratrix, *since the cause of action [116 survived, had full power given her by the statute to prosecute this suit until final judgment. The suit did not abate, but continued on the docket as the suit of Albert Lekamp. It did not become the suit of the administratrix, but remained the suit of the intestate, to be prosecuted by his representative. The marriage of this representative would abate her own suit, but could not abate the suit of her intestate. That still remained on the docket, to be prosecuted by her, according to the letter of the law, as well as its spirit, "until final judgment." If her marriage abated her scire facias, and the original suit still remained on the docket, was still depending, then its state was the same as if a scire facias had never issued; in which case all will admit a scire facias ought to issue in the name of husband and wife.

This court is unanimously of opinion, that as the original suit did not abate, the scire facias in the name of the administratrix, while a feme sole, constituted no bar to a scire facias in the name of the husband and wife after her marriage, to enable her still "to prosecute that suit until a final judgment."

The question which grows out of the bill of exceptions is entirely a question of construction. All admit that in this action the delivery of the goods sold must be proved, and that the entries to which the witness may refer must be the original entries made in the day-book. The doubt is, whether, upon right construction, the deposition of Zachariah Roberts amounts to this. He says that the several articles of merchandise contained in the account [117*] annexed to his deposition were sold to the defendant by Albert Lekamp, and were charged in the day-book by the deponent and another person, who is dead, and that the deponent delivered them. He further swears that he had referred to the original entries in the day-book. He could not swear more positively to the delivery of the goods than he does; but as it is clear that he could not, even for a week, recollect each article which is enumerated, he accounts for his recollection by saying that they were entered in the day-book partly by himself and partly by another clerk, who is dead, and that he has referred to this day-book. This is an account taken from the original entries made at the time of delivery, and is, therefore, admissible. The account current, though agreeing with the account taken from the day-book, appears not to have gone to the jury.

SHELDON.

Under the act of the 8th July, 1812, "to prohibit American vessels from proceeding to or trading with the enemies of the United States, and for 1.—Whatever might have been the doctrine of the civil, or Roman law, on this subject, it is certain that by the codes of the nations of the European continent, which are founded on that law, the books of merchants and traders are, under certain regulations, evidence against those with whom they deal. Thus, by the law of France, the books of traders, regularly kept, may be admitted as evidence, in commercial matters, between persons engaged in trade. Code de Commerce, Liv. 1, tit. 2, Des Livres de Commerce, Art. 12. So, also, the books of tradesmen make a semi-proof against all persons dealing with them, the oath of the party being added to this imperfect evidence afforded by the books. To which Pothier adds, that the tradesman must enjoy the reputation of probity; that the books must be regularly kept; that the action must be commenced within a year from the time the articles are delivered; that the amount be not [118*] too great; and that there is nothing improbable in the demand arising from the circumstances and wants of the debtor. Des Obligations, Nos. 719, 721.

By the common law of England, books of account, or shop-books, are not allowed, of themselves, to be given in evidence for the owner; but a clerk, or servant, who made the original entries, may have recourse to them to refresh his memory, as to other written memoranda, made at the time of the transaction. So if the clerk or servant who made the entries be dead, the books may be admitted in evidence, to show the delivery of the articles, on producing proof of his handwriting. Bull. N. P. 232; Price v. Torrington, 1 Salk. 285; S. C. 2 Ld. Raym. 873; Pitman v. Madox, 2 Salk. 680. But if the clerk be living, though absent without jurisdiction of the court, the entries are inadmissible. Cooper v. other purposes," held, that living fat oxen, &c., are articles of provision and munitions of war, within the true intent and meaning of the act.

Also held, that driving living fat oxen, &c., on foot is not a transportation thereof within the true intent and meaning of the same act.

THIS cause was argued by the Attorney-General for the United States, and by Hopkinson for the defendant.

WASHINGTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant, George Sheldon, was indicted in the Circuit Court for the District of Vermont, for transporting, over land, in November, 1813, a certain number of fat oxen, cows, steers, and heifers, from a place in the United States to the province of Lower Canada. A special verdict was found which submitted to the court the questions, whether living fat oxen, cows, steers, and heifers, are articles of provision and munitions of war, and whether driving living fat oxen, cows, steers, and heifers, on foot, is a transportation thereof, within the true intent and meaning of the act of Congress then in force. The judges being opposed in opinion upon both these questions, the cause comes before this court upon a certificate of such disagreement.

*This indictment was founded on the [*120 act of the 6th of July, 1812: the second section of which declares "that if any citizen of the United States, or person inhabiting the same, shall transport, or attempt to transport, over land or otherwise, in any wagon, cart, sleigh, boat, or otherwise, naval or military stores, arms or munitions of war, or any articles of provision from the United States to Canada, &c., the wagon, cart, sleigh, boat, or the thing by which the said articles are transported, or attempted to be transported, together with the articles themselves, shall be forfeited; and the person aiding, or privy to the same, shall forfeit to the United States a sum equal in value to the wagon, &c., or thing by which the said articles were transported, and shall moreover be considered as guilty of a misdemeanor and liable to fine and imprisonment."

In most of the United States the English law on this subject is adhered to as the rule of practice, But in others it has been changed either by usage and decisions of the courts founded thereon or by positive statutes.

Thus it has been held, by the Supreme Court of New York, (Platt, J., dissenting,) that where there are regular dealings between the plaintiff and defendant, and it is proved that the plaintiff keeps fair and honest books of account; that some of the articles charged to the defendant have been delivered to him; and, that the plaintiff keeps no clerk, his books of account are, under these restrictions, and from the necessity of the case, admissible evidence for the consideration of the jury. Vosburgh v. Thayer, 12 Johns. Rep. 461.

In Pennsylvania, and in the eastern states generally, the plaintiff's books of account, together with his suppletory oath proving the original entries, and the sale and delivery of the articles are evidence to prove such sale and delivery. Poulteney et al. v. Ross, 1 Dall. 238; Steritt v. Bull, 1 Binney, 284; Cogswell v. Dolliver, 2 Mass. Rep. 217; Prime v. Smith, 4 Mass. Rep. 455.

In answer to the first question submitted to this court, we are unanimously of opinion that living fat oxen, &c., are articles of provision and munitions of war, within the true intent and meaning of the above-recited act.

The second question is attended with much more difficulty: Is the driving of living fat oxen, &c., a transportation of them within the true intent and meaning of the law?

There is no doubt but that the word transport, correctly interpreted as well as in its ordinary acceptation, means to carry, to convey; and in this sense it seems to a majority of the court the legislature intended to use it. The offense is made to consist in transporting in any 121] wagon, cart, sleigh, boat, or otherwise*, the prohibited articles. Had the words "or otherwise" been omitted, it would scarcely admit of a doubt, that unless the prohibited articles had been conveyed on some one of the enumerated vehicles, no offense would have been committed within the words or the meaning of the law. What, then, is the correct interpretation of these expressions, taken in connection with the other parts of the section? To transport an article in a wagon, or otherwise, would seem necessarily to mean to carry or convey it in that or in some other vehicle, by whatever name it might be distinguished. If these words are construed to mean a removal of the article from one place to another otherwise than in a vehicle, it might well admit of a doubt whether a removal in a vehicle, other than one of those which are enumerated, would be a case within the law.

But so far from this matter being left a doubt by the law, we find, that when the punishment by way of forfeiture is prescribed, the words "or otherwise" are very plainly construed to mean the thing by which the articles are transported; thus distinguishing between the thing which transports and the thing which is transported.

It may be admitted that the mischief is the same whether the enemy be supplied with provisions in the one way or the other; but this affords no good reason for construing a penal law by equity, so as to extend it to cases not within the correct and ordinary meaning of the expressions of the law, particularly when it is confirmed by the interpretation which the legislature has given to the same expressions in the 122] same law*. If it were impossible to satisfy the words "or otherwise," except in the way contended for on the part of the United States, there would be some reason for giving that interpretation to them. But it has been shown that this is not the case.

It was contended by the Attorney-General that these questions were in effect settled in the case of The United States v. Barber.¹ But this is clearly a mistake. The only question in that case which was referred to this court, was, "whether fat cattle are provisions or munitions of war?" The decision of this court was in the affirmative. But whether the fat cattle were dead or alive, and if the latter was to be intended, whether they were driven or transported in some vehicle did not appear, and, of course, the law arising out of that state of facts was not, and could not be decided.

1.—9 Cranch, 243.

Upon the whole, it is the opinion of a majority of this court, that driving living fat oxen, &c., on foot is not a transportation thereof, within the true intent and meaning of the above-recited act of Congress.

Judgment for the defendant.

THE MARY.

Where an enemy's vessel was captured by a private armed vessel of the United States, and subsequently dispossessed by the force or terror of another; the prize was, under the circumstances of the case, adjudged to the first captor, with costs and damages.

A PPEAL from the Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts.

The British schooner Mary, whereof Charles Thomas, Jr., a British subject, domiciled at St. Johns, New Brunswick, was late owner and master, sailed under convoy from St. Johns, New Brunswick, bound to Castine then in the military occupation of the British, laden with a cargo, the growth, produce, and manufacture of British possessions, shipped by British merchants domiciled in St. Johns, N. B., to merchants resident in Castine.

The schooner Mary was captured by the private armed schooner Cadet, between Duck Island and Mount Desert, on the night of the 25th of December, 1814, between the hours of 11 and 12; the convoy under which the Mary sailed was in sight of the Mary at the time of her capture; but no other vessel was in sight at that time. The Cadet came up with the Mary so suddenly that she had no opportunity to make resistance or give notice to the convoy of her danger.

After the capture of the Mary, the principal part of* her cargo was taken on board [*124] the Cadet, carried into the District of Massachusetts, and, in the District Court of said district, condemned to the Cadet as prize of war.

On the morning of the 26th of December, after sunrise, the Cadet and Mary being then in company, an armed brig, the Paul Jones, was discovered by them, under such suspicious circumstances as to induce them to believe her to be a British cruiser, and, in consequence, to part, and steer different course. The sails of the Paul Jones were of English canvas. She pursued the Mary, firing at her, until between 4 and 5 o'clock, P. M. of the 26th of December; the Mary had then arrived in a bay of the United States, to wit, Wheeler's Bay, a bay frequented by American vessels. The Mary being within half a mile of the shore, and within the same distance of the Paul Jones, and being in such a situation as rendered it certain that she must be intercepted by the Paul Jones, the prize-master and crew, considering it certain, from her appearance and actions, that the Paul Jones was an English cruiser, left the Mary for the shore, after having thrown over her anchor, and ordered the British captain, and his son of twelve years of age, who were left on board, to pay away the cable.

Ten minutes after the prize crew left the Mary, she was boarded by a boat from the Paul Jones, when the English captain informed them [125*] that the *Mary was an English vessel, prize to the Cadet, when the Paul Jones immediately stood off from the land with the Mary in company, with English colors still flying.

A boat, then out to the windward of the Mary, and within musketshot, or a quarter of a mile distant from her (the crew then lying on their oars, the sea smooth, and the wind light), repeatedly hailed the Mary, both before and after she was boarded by the Paul Jones, and received no answer.

The prize-master of the Mary, immediately on his getting on shore, dispatched a boat on board her to ascertain the national character of the vessel by whom she was boarded, and claim her if the boarding vessel should prove American; but, before the boat could get off, the Paul Jones had sailed with the Mary in company.

Libels against the Mary and cargo were filed in the District Court for the district of Maine, by David Elwell, in behalf of himself, and the owners, officers, and crew, of the private armed schooner Cadet, and by John Thomson Hilton, in behalf of himself, and the owners, officers and crew of the private armed brigantine Paul Jones. The Mary and cargo were condemned in the District Court for the district of Maine, to John Thomson Hilton, and the owners, officers and crew of the Paul Jones. An appeal was entered from said decree by David Elwell, and the owners, officers and crew of the Cadet, in the Circuit Court of Massachusetts. In consequence of the affinity of the judges to the parties, the decree of the District Court of [126*] Maine was, *by consent of parties, affirmed pro forma, and the cause brought, by appeal, to this court.

Jones, for the appellants. This is a case of novel impression as to the circumstances, but long since settled in principle. The prize crew of the Cadet were driven out of the Mary by the terror or the force of the Paul Jones. It is not the case of a prize abandoned and taken as res nullius, nor retaken by the original British crew, and recaptured by the Paul Jones. The prize was in a place of safety, infra præsidia; not constructively, as of a fleet, or a neutral port, but of a port of the captor's country. In order to constitute a dereliction of the property acquired in the thing captured, the abandonment must be voluntary, and with intent to relinquish the right acquired. The origin of this principle is to be found in the Roman code, which distinguishes between a voluntary and compulsory abandonment of possession; the first changing the right of property, whilst the latter has no such effect.¹ It is applied to *the law of prize by the different elementary writers.² It was practically enforced in the case of The Lord Nelson,³ and by this court in the case of The Mary Ford.⁴ Striking the colors is to be deemed the real deditio, and the consummation of the capture.⁵ So, also, the capture is held to be consummated where the prize is completely under the dominion of the captor, has no ability to resist, and no prospect of escape.⁶ Here was no recapture by the enemy *crew, because no resistance nor [128] escape; and the British master could clearly not have maintained a claim for salvage in the courts of his own country had the Paul Jones turned out to be a British privateer.

Webster, contra. This is a case of voluntary relinquishment of the prize; and even if it was produced by terror of a supposed enemy, that will not make it involuntary. The case of The Lord Nelson does not determine the present case; but Sir William Scott there puts the very case now before the court, and decides it by asking, "Suppose, therefore, that after this voluntary abandonment, the ship had been met with by some French cruiser, and that by means of jury-masts they had succeeded in carrying her into a French port, can there be any doubt that she would have been prize to the second captor?" In the case of The Ann, which was a question of jurisdiction in a revenue cause, the seizure being abandoned before adjudication, this court illustrate their opinion by analogy to the prize law, holding that capture gives no authority to proceed to adjudication, if abandoned before judicial proceedings are commenced.⁷ So, also, in the case of The Astrea,

1.—Just. Inst. L. 2, t. 1, sec. 46, 47. Alla sane causa est earum rerum, quæ in tempestate levandæ navis causa ejiciuntur. Hæ enim dominorum permanent: quia palam est, eas non eo animo ejici, quod quis eas habere nolit, sed quo magis cum ipsa navis maris periculum effugiat. Qua de causa, si quis eas fluctibus expulsas, vel etiam in ipso mari nactus, lucrandi animo abstulerit, furtum committit. So also d'Habreu, in commenting on the 9th article of the French prize ordinance (which prescribes that, if a captured vessel, not having been recaptured, is abandoned by the enemy, or if by storms or other accidents, it returns into the possession of French subjects, before having been carried into any enemy's port, it shall be restored to the former owner, if claimed within a year and a day, although the possession of the enemy may have continued more than twenty-four hours), makes the following observation: "Quoique l'article de l'ordonnance ne paraisse pas faire la différence entre un vaisseau abandonné par les ennemis, et celui qui l'a été par l'effet d'une tempeste ou de quelque autre accident imprévu; il est néanmoins certain qu'il y en a quelque une. Nous n'entreprendrons point ici de la faire sentir: outre que cela nous écarterait de notre objet, il n'est personne tant soit peu versé dans la jurisprudence, qui ignore que l'abandon volontaire fait perdre la propriété, tout au contraire de celui Wheat. 2.

In that case the true distinction on this subject is alluded to by Lord Mansfield, that by whatever length of time, or other circumstance the property in prizes is vested, so as to bar the former owner in case of recapture or sale, "the instant the captor has got possession, no friend, no fellow-soldier, or ally, can take it from him; because it would be a violation of his property." And it is in this sense must be understood what is repeated by so many writers from the civil law, Quæ ex hostibus capiuntur, STATIM captivum fiunt. An inchoate title immediately accrues as against any cruiser of the same nation or its allies in the war, which title cannot be divested but by a voluntary abandonment on the part of the first captor. it was determined that an interest acquired by possession, is divested by the loss of possession from the very nature of a title acquired in war.¹ The case of The Adventure is likewise in point.² There was no fraud on the part of the Paul Jones. She had a right to [129*] chase under any colors; *but she neither chased nor fired under enemy's colors; whilst the prize showed no colors, and therefore invited pursuit; and was found in the possession of her original British master, and therefore authorized detention. She was not infra præsidia whilst lying in Wheeler's Bay; but even supposing she had been, if she was afterwards abandoned by her original captor, the Paul Jones had a right to take possession. The prize master did not think it worth while to risk being taken prisoner, and therefore abandoned his prize.

Jones, in reply. The case supposed by Sir William Scott, in delivering his judgment in The Lord Nelson, is of a voluntary abandonment, and not one produced by the application of force or terror. In the case of The Ann, this court, though incidentally describing the general doctrine, adhere to their accustomed accuracy and precision of language. "A voluntary abandonment" is the phrase used by the learned judge who delivered the opinion of the court; and he proceeds to state, "It is not meant to assert that a tortious ouster of possession, or fraudulent rescue or relinquishment after seizure, will divest the jurisdiction." The precedent of The Astrea, does not apply. In that case there was a capture and recapture and a second recapture; but no question whether the abandonment by the first captors was voluntary or not. The case of The Adventure was not a question of derelict; but whether the belligerent may invest a neutral with his rights at sea, in fraud of the contingent right of recapture by the [130*] *other belligerent. The question here is not whether fraud was used, but whether force was used. The prize crew supposed they were surrendering to British captors; but the Mary was not in a situation to be captured by a cruiser of the United States; she was not derelict, but lying in a roadstead, which is a præsidium, though not guarded by forts and castles.

JOHNSON, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We are of opinion that the facts stated, in this appeal, make a clear case of tortious dispossession on the part of the Paul Jones. The privateer Cadet had, with great gallantry, captured the Mary, and been in possession of her part of a night and day. The prize was close in upon the American coast, and making for a port which was open before her. It was not until the superior sailing of the Paul Jones made it manifest that the prize must be cut off from this port, and until she had been repeatedly fired upon, that the prize crew abandoned her. There exists not a pretext in the case that this abandonment was voluntary, or would have taken place but for the hostile approach of the Paul Jones. Whether the vis major acted upon the force or the fears of the prize crew is immaterial, since actual dispossession ensued.

But it is argued that the Paul Jones showed American colors; the Mary ought not therefore to have feared her; the Mary showed no colors, she, therefore, invited pursuit; and, finally, that the Paul Jones found her in the actual possession of her *original master, and, [*131 therefore, could not have done otherwise than detain her.

We think otherwise. It was more probable that an enemy would show false than true colors. The circumstance of the Mary standing in for a friendly shore was less equivocal evidence of her character than the exhibition of colors; and, after boarding the Mary, and learning that she was a prize to the Cadet, it was the duty of the captor to have repaired the injury he had done, and, either by making signals, sending a boat on shore, or a message by the boat that did come off, to have recalled the prize crew of the Cadet. But, instead of this, she instantly mans the prize, bears away from the harbor, which was close under their lee, and, by carrying English colors until out of sight, completes the conviction of the prize crew that the recapture was by an enemy.

We are of opinion that the decision of the circuit and district courts should be reversed; that the prize should be adjudged to the Cadet; and the case remanded for the assessment of reasonable damages in favor of the Cadet. But, considering that the prize arrived in safety, and probably in a more secure harbor than that for which she was sailing when seized by the Paul Jones (although it is certainly a case for damages), we are of opinion the damages should be moderate.

THE SAN PEDRO. VALVERDE, Claimant.

Under the judiciary act of the 24th of September, 1789, ch. 20, and the act of the 3d of March, 1803, ch. 93, causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, or in equity, cannot be removed, by writ of error, from the Circuit Court for re-examination in the Supreme Court.

The appropriate mode of removing such causes, is by appeal; and the rules, regulations, and restrictions contained in the 22d and 23d sections of the judiciary act, respecting the time within which a writ of error shall be brought, and in what instances it shall operate as a supersedeas; the citation to the adverse party, the security to be given by the plaintiffs in error for prosecuting his suit, and the restrictions upon the Appellate Court as to reversals in certain enumerated cases, are applicable to appeals under the act of 1803, and are to be substantially observed; except that where the appeal is prayed at the same term when the decree or sentence is pronounced, a citation is not necessary.

ERROR to the Superior Court of the Mississippi territory.

This was a libel of information filed in that court, against the schooner San Pedro and cargo, alleging: 1st. That the San Pedro departed, on the 1st February, 1813, from Mobile for the island of Jamaica, a colony of Great Britain, in violation of the embargo act of the 22d December, 1807, and the several acts supplementary thereto; of the non-intercourse act of the 1st of March, 1809; and of the laws of the United States. 2d. That sundry goods, wares and merchandise were imported in the San Pedro, 133*] into *the district of Mobile on the first day of May, 1813, from the said island of Jamaica, in violation of the non-intercourse act. 3d. That sundry goods, wares and merchandise "were intended to be imported in the San Pedro, from the said island of Jamaica, into the United States, and into the district of Mobile, contrary to the provisions of the non-intercourse act," &c.

The San Pedro was originally a vessel of the United States, called the Atlas, and the property of Mr. Philip A. Lay, of New Orleans, but had given up her register, and (as alleged) was transferred to Mr. Valverde, a Spanish subject, resident at Pensacola. On the 1st of February, 1813, she sailed from Mobile, with a cargo of cotton and tobacco, for Jamaica, which was disposed of there; and on the 10th of April, 1813, she sailed from Jamaica, with a cargo, on her return voyage for the coast of Florida. On the 23d of April she was captured and brought into Mobile by an American gun-boat, and on the 29th of the same month was liberated by the commander of the flotilla, and seized by the collector of the port, in whose name the libel was filed. It was contended by the libelants that the transfer of the vessel was collusive and fraudulent, and that she, together with the cargo, belonged to citizens of the United States.

A claim was interposed on behalf of Mr. Valverde, and the vessel and cargo were decreed to be restored in the court below, from which decree the cause was brought by writ of error to this court.

The Attorney-General, for the United States, 134*] argued *in support of the first count in the libel, that the non-intercourse act was to be considered as in force after the declaration of war, being cumulated upon the law of war as administered in the prize court, by which all trade and intercourse with the enemy is prohibited, under the penalty of confiscation. It therefore became immaterial whether the property was Spanish or belonged to citizens of the United States. If Spanish, it was confiscable as the property of neutrals, trading with a British colony from the United States, contrary to the non-intercourse. If the property of citizens of the United States, it was liable to seizure and condemnation, being taken in trade with the public enemy. The general allegation in this count, of a breach of the laws of the United States, was sufficient to cover the latter offense. Mobile was, at the time of this transaction, a port in possession of the United States, having been annexed to their territories by the acts of Congress of the 14th of May, 1812, and the 12th of February, 1813.

Harper, contra. 1. The embargo laws had ceased to exist at the time of this transaction, and therefore the first count in the libel, alleging a breach of those laws, cannot be supported. 2. The non-intercourse laws had merged in the act declaring war. By the law of war, all commercial intercourse with the enemy is prohibited, and the court has considered the laws, restricting trade, as superseded by the law of war.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. The court has never *considered the non-intercourse law as [*135 merged in the law of war as to neutrals.

Harper. 3. But supposing the non-intercourse laws to be in force, they can only apply in two cases: First. To British goods put on board with an intention to import the same into the United States. Second. To British goods actually imported. The third count of the libel is fatally defective in alleging, not that they were put on board with intention to import, &c., but that they were intended to be imported, and under the second count there is no proof of the growth, produce or manufacture of the goods. If a presumption arises of their British origin, from the circumstance of their being laden in a British colony, it is a case of further proof, and the court will not condemn without first allowing the claimants an opportunity to repel that presumption. 4. The act of Congress of the 12th February, 1813, did not, proprio vigore, make the port and district of Mobile the territory of the United States. The legal right ought to have been asserted by actual possession, in order to consummate the title.¹ But possession was not taken until after the sailing of the vessel from Mobile, although before her return to the coast of Florida from Jamaica; and there is no proof that *this [*136 change of dominion was known to the parties when the goods were shipped at Jamaica. 5. The question, whether the ship and cargo are confiscable as a droit of admiralty for the offense of trading with the enemy, depends upon the question of fact, whether they are the property of a citizen or a neutral; and it being an admiralty cause, the claimants are entitled to the privilege of further proof, if there be doubt upon the fact. 6. There is a fatal irregularity in form in bringing up the cause by writ of error, which is a common law process, not applicable to admiralty or chancery causes, which are to be brought up by appeal under the judiciary act of the 24th February, 1789, and the act of the 3d March, 1803.

The Attorney-General, in reply. The laws of non-intercourse were no further merged in the law of war than as concerned captors. If the property be that of a citizen, it is confiscable as a droit of admiralty under the law of war.² If it be neutral, then *the non- [*137

1.—See, on this subject, an instructive case in 5 Rob. 97, The Fama, in which Sir William Scott determined that the national character of Louisiana, agreed to be surrendered by the treaty of St. Ildefonso, in 1795, by Spain to France, but not actually transferred, continued as it was under the ceding country.

2.—8 Cranch 382, The Sally. In that case it was determined that the municipal forfeiture, under the non-intercourse act, of enemy's property, or of the property of citizens taken in a trade with the enemy, was absorbed in the more general operation of the law of war, and that the prize act of the 20th June, 1812, ch. 107, operates as a grant from the United States, of all property rightfully captured by commissioned privateers, as prize of war. The same doctrine had been before settled by Sir William Scott, in the case of The Nelly. 1 Rob. 219; in a note to The Hoop, where the court held that the same course of decisions which had established that the property of a subject taken trading with the enemy is forfeited has decided also that it is forfeited as prize. The ground of the forfeiture intercourse act still applies to it, and it must be confiscated under the seizure by the revenue officers. If the port of Mobile had become, de facto, a possession of the United States, before the offense of importation was committed, it is immaterial whether the party had a previous knowledge of this transfer of territory or not; and the fact of the goods coming from a British port is conclusive evidence of their origin, and ought to exclude further proof on this point.

WASHINGTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an admiralty cause brought into this court from the Superior Court of the Mississippi Territory by writ of error, and a preliminary question has been made, and is now to be decided, whether this is the proper process for removing a cause of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction into this court for re-examination. A similar objection has been taken in a number of equity cases standing on the docket, removed into this court by similar process from the circuit courts. The questions which these objections have given rise to, resolve themselves into the two following: *1. Whether the decree or sentence of a circuit court, in cases of equity and of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, can be removed into the Supreme Court for re-examination, by writ of error. 2. If they cannot, then by what rule are appeals in those cases to be governed?

In deciding these questions, our attention is confined to a few sections of the act of the 24th September, 1789, ch. 20, and to the 2d section of the act of March 3, 1803, ch. 93.

The 22d section of the former of these laws declares, that from any final judgment or decree in civil actions and suits in equity brought in a circuit court by original process, or removed there from a state court, or by appeal from a district court, a writ of error may be brought to the Supreme Court, at any time within five years, the citation being signed by a judge of such circuit court, or by a justice of the Supreme Court, and the adverse party having at least thirty days' notice. This section, then, provides that the judge who signs the citation shall take sufficient security that the plaintiff in error shall prosecute his writ to effect, and answer all damages and costs, if he fail to do so. The 23d section declares under what circumstances a writ of error shall operate as a supersedens.

The act of 1803 declares, that from all final judgments or decrees in a circuit court in cases of equity, of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and prize or no prize, an appeal shall be allowed to the Supreme Court; that a transcript of the libel, bill, answers, depositions and all other proceedings in the cause shall be 139 transmitted to the Supreme Court, and that no evidence shall be admitted on such new appeal, except in admiralty and prize causes. The act then provides that such appeals shall be subject to the same rules, regulations, and restrictions, as are prescribed by law in cases of writs of error, and it repeals so much of the 19th and 22d sections of the act of 1789 as comes within the purview of this act.

1. The first question depends upon the meaning attached by the legislature to the word "purview." It is contended by the plaintiff in error that it ought to be confined to such parts of the 19th and 22d sections as are inconsistent with the provisions of the act of 1803. If this be the correct interpretation of the term, it is then insisted that there is no incongruity between the two remedies, by appeal and writ of error, even in admiralty and equity cases, and, consequently, that the former remedy is to be considered as merely cumulative.

But the court does not yield its assent to that interpretation. Wherever this term is used, it is manifestly intended to designate the enacting part or body of the act, in contradistinction to the other parts of it, such as the preamble, the saving, and the proviso. And an attentive consideration of the subject-matter of the two laws to which our inquiries are confined, will lead very strongly to the conclusion that Congress meant to use the term in this sense. It is obvious that the 22d section of the act of 1789 was so intimately connected with the 19th section, so far as it respected the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, in admiralty and equity cases, that the remedy *provided by the for- [*140] mer would have been, in most cases, inoperative without the aid of the latter. Had the law merely provided the remedy by writ of error in those cases, nothing but the proceedings, together with the sentence or decree, would have been open to the inspection and re-examination of the Supreme Court. But, as in a great majority of those cases, the correctness or incorrectness of the decision of the Inferior Court would depend upon the evidence given in the cause, the remedy by writ of error, without some further legislative provision for carrying before the Appellate Court the facts or the evidence, would have been altogether defective and illusory. We find, accordingly, that the 19th section provides, that the circuit courts, in cases of equity and of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, shall cause the facts on which they found their sentence or decree fully to appear upon the record, either from the pleadings and decree itself or a case agreed by the parties, or their counsel, or if they disagree, by a stating of the case by the court. Thus, upon a writ of error in equity and admiralty cases, the Supreme Court was furnished with the facts upon which the Inferior Court decided, though not with the evidence, and might, therefore, correct the errors of that court, so far as they existed in wrong conclusions of law, from the facts stated.

Now, the 19th section contains but the single provision which has been just mentioned, and, consequently, if any part of it be repealed by is, that it is taken adhering to the enemy, and therefore the proprietor is, pro hac vice, to be considered as an enemy. In the case of The Etrusco, the Lords of Appeal had reserved the question, whether the property claimed by a British subject should be condemned to the crown or the captors; but the illegality of trade in that case was of a different nature, that being a trade in violation of the charter of the East India Company. It was finally determined by the lords in The Etrusco, that the property should be condemned, not to the individual captor, but to the king. 4 Rob. 256. The Caroline, in a note.

the act of 1803, the whole must be; and if the whole, then the writ of error provided by the 141*] 22d section in admiralty *and equity cases would be rendered, as before observed, altogether ineffectual for the purpose for which it was intended in every case where the error complained of in the sentence, or decree, existed in wrong conclusions from the evidence or the facts.

Even the provisions of the 29th section were, in the view of Congress, defective, and must appear so to every person conversant with the practice of courts proceeding according to the forms of the civil law. The error of the Inferior Court may frequently consist, not in wrong conclusions of law from the facts, but in wrong conclusions of fact from the evidence. We are warranted in saying that this defect in the former law was perceived by the legislature, and was intended to be remedied by the provision in the act of 1803, that the evidence (instead of the facts) should accompany the record into the Appellate Court.

Upon the whole, it is manifest that the subject of the two laws is the same, namely, the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, and the manner of exercising it. The manner of exercising it, as prescribed by the act of 1789, is essentially changed by the act of 1803, and is consequently repealed by it because it is within the purview of the latter law, being provided for in a different way. By this construction, the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is made to conform with the ancient and well-established principles of judicial proceedings. The writ of error, in cases of common law, remains in force, and submits to 142*] the revision of the Supreme *Court only the law. The remedy by appeal is confined to admiralty and equity cases, and brings before the Supreme Court the facts as well as the law.

2. The second question is attended with much less difficulty. The act of 1803, after requiring that the libel bill, answers, depositions, and all other proceedings in the cause, shall be transmitted to the Supreme Court, and that no new evidence shall be admitted on such appeal except in admiralty and prize causes, provides that such appeal shall be subject to the same rules, regulations, and restrictions, as prescribed in cases of writs of error. These rules, regulations, and restrictions, are contained in the 22d and 23d sections of the act of 1789, and respect the time within which a writ of error may be brought, and in what instances it shall operate as a supersedeas; the citation to the adverse party; the security to be given by the plaintiff in error for prosecuting his suit; and the restrictions upon the Appellate Court as to reversals in certain enumerated cases. All these are, in the opinion of a majority of the court, applicable to appeals under the act of 1803, and are to be substantially observed, except that where the appeal is prayed at the same term when the decree or sentence is made, a citation is not necessary. (Reilly v. Lamar and others, 2 Cranch, 349.) It follows that an appeal, in admiralty, equity, and prize causes, may be taken at any time within five years from the final decree or sentence being pronounced, subject to the saving contained in the 22d sect. of the act of 1789, which is one of the points that was discussed at the bar.

Wheat. 2.

*This opinion is consistent with the [*143 case of The United States v. Hooe (3 Cranch, 73), although from the report of that case it would seem to be otherwise. The record has been examined, from which it appears that that case came up upon an appeal, and not upon a writ of error.

The writ of error, in this case, must therefore be dismissed.¹

GODDARD ET AL., Claimants.

The sailing under the enemy's license constitutes, of itself, an act of illegality, which subjects the property to confiscation, without regard to the object of the voyage or the port of destination.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court for the District of Pennsylvania.

This vessel, belonging to citizens of the United States, and laden with a cargo of flour also belonging to citizens of the same, was captured on the 15th day of October, 1812, on a voyage from Alexandria to Cadiz, with a license or passport of protection from the British Admiral, Sawyer. The vessel and cargo were restored in the District Court; *but on appeal, [*144 sentence of condemnation was pronounced by the Circuit Court, from which sentence an appeal was entered to this court.

G. Sullivan, for the appellants and claimants, offered to read further proof, taken under the standing rule of the court (25th rule, Feb. term, 1816).

Woodward and Ingersoll, for the captors, denied the authority of the rule under which the further proof was taken. They argued that the act of Congress did not provide for taking depositions to be used as further proof in prize causes, except where the course of prize practice authorizes it; that further proof is never admissible until the cause is heard on the original evidence.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., called on the claimant's counsel to show what facts the further proof tended to establish, and stated, that if the case could be distinguished from the former determinations respecting licenses, a foundation would be laid for the admission of the depositions as further proof.

Webster, for the appellants and claimants, contended, that this case could be distinguished from those which had been decided. In the case of The Julia,² the court had said: "We hold that the sailing on a voyage under the license and passport of protection of the enemy, in furtherance of his *views or interests, [*145 constitutes such an act of illegality as subjects the ship and cargo to confiscation as prize of war; and that the facts of the present case afford irrefragable evidence of such an act of illegality." This proposition, as a doctrine of law, would be equally true, leaving out all that it contains relative to a license. A voyage prosecuted in furtherance of the enemy's interests is undoubtedly illegal, and it was on this illegality of the voyage itself that the judgment of the court proceeded. The court say they are satisfied from the facts that the voyage was illegal. In the case now before the court the captors insist that the court shall shut out the facts connected with the voyage, and go merely on presumption. The Julia cannot be an authority for such a decision. *The Aurora*¹ was decided expressly on the grounds which had been before stated in The Julia, and carries the doctrine no further. In the case of *The Hiram*² no evidence was offered on the part of the claimants to repel the presumption arising from the license. That case, then, only decides, that from the possession of the license the court may presume, until the contrary appears, that the voyage was in furtherance of the enemy's objects.

1.—The cause was afterwards re-entered, by consent of parties, and continued for further proof, as if it had been removed by appeal.

2.—9 Cranch, 181.

In all these cases the court seems to have rested its decision on the ground that the voyages in which the vessels were engaged were, of themselves, illegal voyages, undertaken and prosecuted for the promotion of the enemy's [146*] interests; and that *this illegality was shown by the facts which the cases disclosed. But it is not understood to have decided that it would hear no proof to make out the innocence of the voyage, notwithstanding the unfavorable inferences which might be drawn from the possession of the license. In the present case such proof is offered, and the claimants are ready to show that the voyage originated in no intention to further, and from its nature could not further, the objects of the enemy. It was a voyage from Baltimore to Cadiz, with flour, at a time when neither the British nor the Spanish armies drew supplies from that city. They expect to prove it to have been, in all respects, as innocent as a voyage from Baltimore to Boston, with a similar cargo. Upon this application for permission to give proof, and until the court should hear the proof, the only question will be, whether, in the most innocent voyage which can be imagined, the having such a license is, per se, cause of confiscation; and cannot in any case, by any evidence, admit of explanation or excuse. On this point, the claimant's counsel wish to be heard, unless the court considers itself as having recently solemnly decided the precise question. We will contend, that although the possession of such a license might create a presumption of unlawful trade, yet, like presumptions in other cases, it is capable of being repelled by proof; and that the judgment of the court must rest, after all, on the real nature and object of the voyage, as disclosed by the facts connected with it, and not on the mere terms of the passport. In a case of this sort, the [147*] court will *not incline to hold itself bound by former decisions beyond their clear and manifest extent. No case appears to have gone so far as to prevent the court from hearing proof of the lawfulness of the voyage,

1.—8 Cranch, 283.

2.—8 Cranch, 444; 1 Wheat. 440.

independent of the license, or to have decided that such proof, when full and satisfactory, should not avoid confiscation.

Woodward and Ingersoll, on the other side, were stopped by the court.

WASHINGTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The view of the court is, that this case cannot be distinguished from those already decided. It is alleged that the flour was not actually destined to the use of the enemy; but whether any part of it went to his use or not, is immaterial. It is, indeed, possible that Cadiz might have fallen without the aid of these supplies; and therefore, in fact, Great Britain and her ally may have been relieved, by these supplies, from the pressure of the war in that quarter. The court, however, in the cases alluded to, proceeded on a broader ground; all the judges who concurred in those decisions were of opinion that the mere sailing under an enemy's license, without regard to the object of the voyage, or the port of destination, constituted, of itself, an act of illegality which subjected the property to confiscation. It was an attempt by one individual of a belligerent country to clothe himself with a neutral character *by the [*148] license of the other belligerent, and thus to separate himself from the common character of his own country.

Sentence affirmed.

DAVIS ET AL., Claimants.

Under the embargo act of the 22d December, 1807, the words "an embargo shall be laid," not only imposed upon the public officers the duty of preventing the departure of registered or sea-letter vessels on a foreign voyage, but, consequently, rendered them liable to forfeiture under the supplementary act of the 9th of January, 1808.

In such case, if the vessel be actually and bona fide carried by force to a foreign port, she is not liable to forfeiture.

The court being of opinion, under the facts and circumstances of the case, that the capture under which it was alleged the vessel was compelled to go to a foreign port was fictitious and collusive; the decree of condemnation in the court below was affirmed.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court for the District of New York.

A libel was filed against this vessel in the District Court of New York, March, 1809, for a breach of the act of the 22d of December, 1807, laying an embargo, and the several acts supplementary thereto, alleging that she proceeded from Baltimore, without any clearance or permit, bound on a voyage *to Exu- [*149] ma, one of the Bahama Islands, where she took in a cargo of six thousand bushels of salt, with which she returned to New York. The claimants admitted the fact of going to Exuma, and bringing away the salt, but alleged that it was from necessity; that the brig was regularly bound to Boston, but being captured soon after she left Hampton Roads, by a British privateer, was sent to Jamaica, where she sold the cargo of flour which she had on board, the government of that colony not allowing it to be brought off. That she then went to Exuma.

The testimony in the case exhibits the following summary: About the middle of October, 1808, the vessel arrived at Baltimore from Boston. At Baltimore she took on board a cargo of upwards of sixteen hundred barrels of flour, and sailed again, ostensibly for Boston, about the first of November. On reaching Hampton Roads, she stopped a few days, being, as was asserted, windbound. While there, a British privateer, of ten guns and twelve men, called the Ino, arrived in the Roads. On the eighth of the month the brig put to sea, the Ino following her. On the afternoon of the same day the Ino captured her, within ten leagues of the shore, putting a prize-master and one man on board. The vessels then proceeded for the West Indies. During the voyage no attempt was made by the crew either to retake the brig or to escape, though favorable opportunities were not wanting. Her crew consisted of nine persons. After a short separation from the privateer, the brig arrived off St. Nicholas Mole. Here 150 the privateer joined her, and thence the two went to Kingston. No prize proceedings were instituted against the brig; but, on the contrary, the supposed captors relinquished all claim to their prize, on reaching Kingston. From Kingston she went to Exuma, as above stated. The District Court, on the hearing, pronounced a sentence of condemnation. A decree of affirmance, pro forma, was entered in the Circuit Court, from which the cause was brought, by appeal, to this court.

Hoffman, for the appellants and claimants, stated, that this case was governed by the authority of The Short Staple,¹ the William King having sailed from Hampton Roads in company with that vessel, and both were seized by the British privateer Ino, and compelled to go to the West Indies. The two cases are perfectly coincident in their circumstances, and restitution having been decreed in the case of The Short Staple, the same judgment must, consequently, be pronounced in the present case. He argued that the whole plan and system of the revenue laws indicated that it was not the legislative intention to cumulate a forfeiture of the ship (being a registered vessel) upon the penalty of the bond, which had been given for relanding the cargo in the United States.

The Attorney-General and Hopkinson, contra. The court expressly overruled the point made 151 as to the construction of the embargo laws, in the case of The Short Staple,² although that case was determined, on its peculiar circumstances by a majority of the court, in favor of the claimants. But the restitution of the Short Staple, on the facts of her case, forms no ground for the acquittal of the William King, even should the facts be precisely similar. Principles of law form precedents. But an inference from evidence is not conclusive as to facts, in another cause, whether the testimony be the same or different; certainly not if it be different.

Hoffman, in reply, argued, that the court could not, without judicial inconsistency, decide this case differently from that of The Short Staple, unless there was some substantial and important difference in the facts of the two cases; that the opinion of a majority of the court was the opinion of the court, and a rule of conduct, whether formed upon an abstract point of law or upon a mixed question of fact and law; and that to maintain the contrary position would be to assent to an assertion, which had been hazarded in another place, that the decisions of this court are not binding as legal precedents on themselves and on others.

This case comes up on appeal from the Circuit Court of New York. The vessel is the same which makes her appearance in the case of The Short Staple, decided in this court at February term, 1815; and it has been contended that the acquittal in that case is conclusive upon this.

But we think otherwise. It might with more propriety be contended, that had the hearing of this cause come on together with that of The Short Staple, the latter would have found much more difficulty in escaping. As it was, the division of the court, and the acknowledgment of the judge who delivered the opinion, show that the vessel in that case was "hardly saved." In the present cause there is very material evidence which did not appear in, and could not affect the former. We shall, therefore, dispose of this case altogether upon the evidence that is peculiar to it.

It will be recollected that this vessel, as well as the Short Staple, were libeled for a violation of the embargo act of the 22d of December, 1807, and the supplementary act of the 9th of January, 1808, the former of which enacts, "that an embargo shall be laid on all ships and vessels in the ports of the United States, bound on a foreign voyage," and the latter forfeits the vessel that shall proceed to any foreign port or place, "contrary to the provisions of this act, or of the act to which this is a supplement." As the majority of the court were of opinion that no offense was committed in the case of The Short Staple, it was unneces- [153 sary to express any opinion on the application of the law. They, therefore, waived it.

But in this case it becomes necessary to lay down the following principles: There can be no doubt that if the William King was carried off to Jamaica by actual force, it was an act which wanted the concurrence of the will, and, therefore, innocent. But, whatever is done in fraud of a law is done in violation of it; and if a vessel, with an original intention to go to a foreign port, complied with afford irrefragable evidence of such an act of illegality." This proposition, as a doctrine of law, would be equally true, leaving out all that it contains relative to a license. A voyage prosecuted in furtherance of the enemy's interests is undoubtedly illegal, and it was on this illegality of the voyage itself that the judgment of the court proceeded. The court say they are satisfied from the facts that the voyage was illegal. In the case now before the court the captors insist that the court shall shut out the facts connected with the voyage, and go merely on presumption. The Julia cannot be an authority for such a decision. *The Aurora*¹ was decided expressly on the grounds which had been before stated in The Julia, and carries the doctrine no further. In the case of *The Hiram*² no evidence was offered on the part of the claimants to repel the presumption arising from the license. That case, then, only decides, that from the possession of the license the court may presume, until the contrary appears, that the voyage was in furtherance of the enemy's objects.

2.—In delivering the opinion of the court in that case, Marshall, Ch. J., stated that this point had "been pressed with great earnestness by the counsel for the claimants; but the court is not convinced that his exposition of the embargo acts is a sound one. On this point, however, it will be unnecessary to give an opinion; because we think the necessity under which the claimants justify their going into St. Nicholas Mole is sustained by the proofs in the cause." 9 Cranch, 60.

In all these cases the court seems to have rested its decision on the ground that the voyages in which the vessels were engaged were, of themselves, illegal voyages, undertaken and prosecuted for the promotion of the enemy's [146*] interests; and that *this illegality was shown by the facts which the cases disclosed. But it is not understood to have decided that it would hear no proof to make out the innocence of the voyage, notwithstanding the unfavorable inferences which might be drawn from the possession of the license. In the present case such proof is offered, and the claimants are ready to show that the voyage originated in no intention to further, and from its nature could not further, the objects of the enemy. It was a voyage from Baltimore to Cadiz, with flour, at a time when neither the British nor the Spanish armies drew supplies from that city. They expect to prove it to have been, in all respects, as innocent as a voyage from Baltimore to Boston, with a similar cargo. Upon this application for permission to give proof, and until the court should hear the proof, the only question will be, whether, in the most innocent voyage which can be imagined, the having such a license is, per se, cause of confiscation; and cannot in any case, by any evidence, admit of explanation or excuse. On this point, the claimant's counsel wish to be heard, unless the court considers itself as having recently solemnly decided the precise question. We will contend, that although the possession of such a license might create a presumption of unlawful trade, yet, like presumptions in other cases, it is capable of being repelled by proof; and that the judgment of the court must rest, after all, on the real nature and object of the voyage, as disclosed by the facts connected with it, and not on the mere terms of the passport. In a case of this sort, the [147*] court will *not incline to hold itself bound by former decisions beyond their clear and manifest extent. No case appears to have gone so far as to prevent the court from hearing proof of the lawfulness of the voyage, independent of the license, or to have decided that such proof, when full and satisfactory should not avoid confiscation.

Woodward and Ingersoll, on the other side were stopped by the court.

WASHINGTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The view of the court is, that this case is not to be distinguished from those already decided. It is alleged that the flour was not actually destined to the use of the enemy; but whether any part of it went to his use or not, is immaterial. It is, indeed, possible that Cadiz might have fallen without the aid of these supplies, and therefore, in fact, Great Britain and America may have been relieved, by these supplies, from the pressure of the war in that quarter. The court, however, in the cases alluded to, proceeded on a broader ground; all the judges who concurred in those decisions were of opinion that the mere sailing under an enemy's license, without regard to the object of the voyage, or the port of destination, constituted, of itself, an act of illegality which subjected the vessel to confiscation. It was an attempt by an individual of a belligerent country to clothe himself with a neutral character *by the aid of the license of the other belligerent, and separate himself from the common danger of his own country.

Sentence affirmed.

THE WILLIAM KING

DAVIS ET AL., Claimant.

Under the embargo act of the 22d of March 1807, the words "an embargo shall be laid upon the public officers the preventing the departure of registered vessels on a foreign voyage, but, rendered them liable to forfeiture under a supplementary act of the 9th of January 1808.

In such case, if the vessel be actually carried by force to a foreign port, she is liable to forfeiture.

The court being of opinion, under the circumstances of the case, that the vessel which it was alleged the vessel was carried to a foreign port was fictitious and that the decree of condemnation in the case was affirmed.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the District of New York.

A libel was filed against the William King in the District Court of New York, M. D. 1807, laying an embargo, and a supplementary thereto, alleging that she proceeded from Baltimore, without license or permit, bound on a voyage to Nassau, one of the Bahama Islands, in a cargo of six thousand bushels of salt, which she returned to New York, and the claimants admitted the fact of going away the salt, but alcollusively, by the privateer Washington, of 24 80-95 tons, one gun and fifteen men, belonging to Portland, in the District of Maine, and commanded by William Malcomb. They were taken in sight of each other; the Jahnstoft first, within about three hours, and the Bothnea, within about nine hours after leaving Halifax. At the time of the capture, there were on board the Bothnea seven persons, and on board of the Jahnstoft five persons, composing their respective crews, and one American passenger. The whole of the crews were taken from each vessel, and landed in a boat at Ragged Islands. The American passengers were retained on board, and under the superintendence of prize-masters and crews. The Bothnea was conducted into Salem, and the Jahnstoft into Plymouth, in the District of Massachusetts. Immediately on their arrival they were seized by the collectors of those ports, for an alleged violation of the non-importation act. Prize proceedings were also commenced by the captors against both vessels, before the District Court of Massachusetts. The American passengers were examined on the standing interrogatories, and the papers found on board deposited in court by the prize-masters. The papers found on board the Bothnea were the Swedish simulated papers. Two bills of lading of the cargo, dated the 23d of November, 1813, purporting that the whole cargo was shipped by John Moody & Company, merchants, of Halifax, for New London, consigned to order. A clearance from Halifax, dated on the same day. A British license from Sir John Sherbrooke, Governor, &c., dated on the 9th day of November, 1813, authorizing John Moody and others to export in any vessel, not belonging to France, to any port in the United States, any British goods, on British or American account, which license was to continue in force for two months. And two letters dated at Halifax on the 23d November, 1813; one purporting to be addressed to the consignee of the cargo, the other to be addressed to the master of the Bothnea. These letters are as follows: "Halifax, November 23d, 1813. Dear Sir, We now only inclose you a bill of lading of the cargo shipped on our joint account per the Bothnea, agreeable to the memorandum left with us by Vandervelt, when last here. The invoices we forwarded in duplicate, one by P. Jones, and the other by Schonesburg, which you will have received before this. Z. has our particular instructions how to proceed when in with the squadron. We have settled for A.'s share of the compensation. B. 2 will pay his. We have fixed on $200, exclusive of the freight, which we have also arranged for. Most sincerely do we wish this speculation to succeed, at the same time request your earliest advice how to proceed with the next. Do not trust too much paper. We have directed Z., in case of meeting with an American cruiser, to destroy all. We are very truly your friends and obedient servants, John Moody & Company."

"Halifax, Nov. 23, 1813.—Captain J*. K*, schooner Bothnea. Sir, We hand you here with sundry inclosures respecting the cargo of the Bothnea, to your most particular care. You will perceive the necessity of using every possible caution. We are only apprehensive of Shaving Mills. You will, of course, secrete everything respecting the transaction. "In case of British interruption we [172 must recommend your being well assured that there is no deception, as you must be aware of the facility with which American cruisers may pass for English. The invoices of the goods are already forwarded. You will make the best of your way to N. When in with any of the B. B. squadron, come forward with your Ex. Li. which will safely pass you, and then nothing will remain but activity and dispatch in getting the goods on shore. We should not have embarked ourselves so largely in this concern, but from the ease with which dry goods can be smuggled into those places if properly managed. The bill of lading is to order, you will, therefore, receive instructions from our friends, A. 1 and B. 2. We expect your best place will be to lay off under the protection of H. M. ships, and deliver the cargo in boats and lighters without proceeding further; and as our friends are already advised on the subject, no doubt every necessary step will be taken. Should, however, any unexpected casualty happen, we recommend your getting out of the way, as we would rather the whole should be sacrificed than any mischief happen to —. But, above all, keep out of sight your Ex. Li. clearance and this letter. Do not confide too much. If you have any suspicions destroy all at once, and, after committing this to memory, be sure to put it perfectly out of danger. As to the return cargo we need not say anything on the subject, having the fullest confidence that a voyage to St. Barts may be profitably effected with certain articles; flour out of the question, unless rye. B *No. 2 will pay you the compensation agreed, exclusive of the freight we have allowed. A.'s proportion we will settle with our own. If it is possible to obtain conveyance we will, but it is doubtful. We are your friends and humble servants, John Moody & Co. P. S.—Do not write, for fear of accidents. Let your communications be verbal." The papers on board of the Jahnstoft were the Swedish simulated papers. A British license and clearance, of the same date and purport as in The Bothnea. Two bills of lading of the cargo, dated the 23d November, 1813, on the same account, destination and consignment as in the case of The Bothnea. And two letters dated at Halifax on the same day, one addressed to Messrs. B. 2 and A. 1, at New London; and the other to the master of the Jahnstoft. The first of these letters is as follows: "Halifax, Nov. 23d, 1813. Dear Sir, We now inclose you a bill of lading of the cargo shipped on our joint account per the brig Jahnstoft, agreeable to the memoranda left with us by Vandervelt, when last here. The invoice we forwarded in duplicate, one by P. Jones, and the other by Schonesburg, which you will have received before this. Z. has our particular instructions how to proceed when in with the squad. We have settled for A.'s share of the compensation; B. No. 2 will pay his. "not trust too much paper. We have directed 174*] "Z. in case of meeting *with an American cruiser, to destroy all." The other letter is an exact transcript of that addressed to the master of the Bothnea, except that the direction is varied.

At the hearing in the District-Court, a claim was interposed by the district-attorney, in behalf of the United States, and of the collector, praying a condemnation to them, upon the ground of a collusive capture and fraudulent breach of the non-importation act. That court dismissed the captor's libel, and condemned the vessels and their cargoes to the United States; from which sentence an appeal was interposed to the Circuit Court, which court affirmed the condemnation, and the causes were brought to this court by appeal. Further proof was ordered at the last term, and the causes again came on for further hearing at the present term upon the proof exhibited by both parties, and directed to explain the several points indicated by the court as grounds of doubt on the original evidence.¹ Under the commissions taken out to examine witnesses, the following interrogatories were exhibited on the part of the captors: Have not some of the privateers, fitted out in the eastern ports, during the war of the revolution and the late war, been of very small burthen? Was it not usual for these privateers, armed sometimes with one carriage gun only, to proceed coastwise upon short cruises, and did they not capture prizes of great value? Was it not their practice to frequent the ports of the district of Maine and of the province of 175*] Nova Scotia, for the purpose of running out occasionally, capturing the British commerce bound in and out of Halifax and other enemy's ports, and were they not often successful? Did it not often happen that the crews of the vessels, captured by them, were put ashore by the privateers, instead of being brought in as prisoners? Has it not been the practice for sea-faring persons in the district of Maine to become owners of such privateers, and to go in them on short cruises? Did it frequently happen during the late war that unarmed vessels, under neutral or British colors, sailed without convoy from the port of Halifax, either to New London, Long Island Sound, or elsewhere? And, on the part of the United States, the following: Was it not the usual custom, during the late war, for the owners of privateers to stipulate with the officers and crew, that the latter should receive one moiety or some other definite proportion of the proceeds of all prizes? Were there any cases where the crews were engaged to serve on monthly wages, without participating in the prizes? Was it not usual for privateers to bring in the prisoners captured by them? What was the usual and adequate crew and armament of a privateer of about 25 tons burthen, intended for a cruise from the eastern ports, in the Bay of Fundy and along the coasts of Nova Scotia? Together with other interrogatories tending to show, or to negative collusion between the owners of the captured vessels and the privateer by which the capture was made. The answers to these interrogatories, by the various witnesses examined, were contradictory and inconsistent, *and it would be obviously [*176 impossible to present any intelligible abstract of their testimony without extending the case to an inconvenient length. But, among other circumstances, it was proved that nine out of fifteen of the prize crew were joint owners.

The causes were argued on the further proof by Harper and Winder for the appellants and captors, and by the Attorney-General, for the United States.

JOHNSON, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

After duly weighing the evidence in these cases, a majority of the court are of opinion that the vessel and cargo must be adjudged to the owners, officers, and crew of the capturing privateer. Independently of the act of landing the entire crews of the captured vessels, there was nothing in the case which necessarily led to suspicion. And this is explained on a ground that is very plausible, to wit, that having a course to run which swarmed with enemy's vessels, their intention was to personate the original crew, and pass off the prizes on the approach of an enemy, under their original character. It is not at all impossible that nothing but this ruse de guerre may have been in contemplation of the crew. There is, indeed, something in it peculiarly characteristic, when we consider the spirit of adventure, and great mental resources which distinguish the people of whom the crew was composed. It is to *be [*177 regretted that this talent for enterprise had not been always more happily applied than it was in the adventure of the Jahnstoff and Bothnea. These vessels had both been employed in transporting provisions from New Haven to Halifax, and were now returning with cargoes of dry goods to be smuggled into the United States in the vicinity of the same place. The documentary evidence shows an intimate correspondence between the shippers at Halifax and some persons resident in the United States. But who they were must remain unknown, as the merchants in Halifax have, in their examination, refused to betray them. That the voyages of these vessels was loaded with infamy no one pretends to deny. The reasoning of the courts below is unanswerable on this point. But the majority of this court are of opinion that the evidence is not sufficient to fasten on the captors a participation in the fraud. The whole may have been, for aught we know, a combination of machinery, the result of the most consummate art. It is certainly true that, in one view of the case, everything may be attributed to artifice, in another to natural conduct. Scarcely a feature of it may not be indifferently pronounced the lineament of guilt or innocence. In such a case a court of justice has no alternative. It must pronounce in favor of innocence.

The decrees below will, therefore, be reversed, and the vessels and cargoes adjudged to the captors.

LAIDLAW ET AL. v. ORGAN.

The vendee is not bound to communicate to the vendor of goods the intelligence of extrinsic circumstances, which might influence the price of the commodity, and which is exclusively within the knowledge of the vendee, particularly where the means of intelligence are equally accessible to both parties.

At the same time, each party must take care not to say or do anything tending to impose upon the other.

The question, whether any imposition was practised by the vendee upon the vendor, ought to be submitted to the jury.

ERROR to the District Court for the Louisiana District.

The defendant in error filed his petition or libel, in the court below, stating, that on the 18th day of February, 1815, he purchased of the plaintiffs in error one hundred and eleven hogsheads of tobacco, as appeared by the copy of a bill of parcels annexed, and that the same were delivered to him by the said Laidlaw & Co., and that he was in the lawful and quiet possession of the said tobacco, when, on the 20th day of the said month, the said Laidlaw & Co., by force, and of their own wrong, took possession of the same, and unlawfully withheld the same from the petitioner, notwithstanding he was at all times, and still was, ready to do and perform all things on his part stipulated to be done and performed in relation to said purchase, and had actually tendered to the said Laidlaw & Co., bills of exchange for the amount of the purchase money, agreeably to the said contract; to his damage, &c. Wherefore the petition prayed that the said Laidlaw & Co. might be cited to appear and answer to his plaint, and that judgment might be rendered against them for his damages, &c. And inasmuch as the petitioner did verily believe that the said one hundred and eleven hogsheads of tobacco would be removed, concealed, or disposed of by the 179*) *said Laidlaw & Co., he prayed that a writ of sequestration might issue, and that the same might be sequestered in the hands of the marshal, to abide the judgment of the court, and that the said one hundred and eleven hogsheads of tobacco might be finally adjudged to the petitioner, together with his damages, &c., and costs of suit, and that the petitioner might have such other and further relief as to the court should seem meet, &c.

The bill of parcels referred to in the petition was in the following words and figures, to wit:

"Mr. Organ Bo't of Peter Laidlaw & Co. 111 hhds. tobacco, weighing 120,715 pounds n't. fr. $7,544.69.

"New Orleans, 18th February, 1815."

On the 21st of February, 1815, a citation to the said Laidlaw & Co. was issued, and a writ of sequestration, by order of the court, to the marshal, commanding him to sequester 111 hogsheads of tobacco in their possession, and the same so sequestered to take into his (the marshal's) possession, and safely keep, until the further order of the court; which was duly executed by the marshal. And on the 2d of March, 1815, counsel having been heard in the case, it was ordered that the petitioner enter into a bond or stipulation, with sufficient sureties in the sum of $1,000, to the said Laidlaw & Co., to indemnify them for the damages which they might sustain in consequence of prosecuting the writ of sequestration granted in the case.¹

*On the 22d of March, 1815, the [*180 plaintiffs in error filed their answer, stating that they had no property in the said tobacco claimed by the said petitioner, or ownership whatever in the same, nor had they at any time previous to the bringing of said suit; but disclaimed all right, title, interest, and claim to the said tobacco, the subject of the suit. And on the same day, Messrs. Boorman and Johnston filed their bill of interpleader or intervention, stating that the petitioner having brought his suit, and filed his petition, claiming of the said Laidlaw & Co. 111 hogsheads of tobacco, for which he had obtained a writ of sequestration, when, in truth, the said tobacco belonged to the said Boorman & Johnston, *and was not the property of the said [*181 Laidlaw & Co., and praying that they, the said Boorman & Johnston, might be admitted to defend their right, title, and claim to the said tobacco, against the claim and pretensions of the petitioner, the justice of whose claim, under the sale as stated in his petition, was wholly denied, and that the said tobacco might be restored to them, &c.

On the 20th of April, 1815, the cause was tried by a jury, who returned the following verdict, to wit: "The jury find for the plaintiff, for the tobacco named in the petition, without damages, payable as per contract." Whereupon the court rendered judgment "that the plaintiff recover of the said defendants the said 111 hogsheads of tobacco, mentioned in the plaintiff's petition, and sequestered in this suit, with his costs of suit to be taxed; and ordered that the marshal deliver the said tobacco to the said plaintiff, and that he have execution for his costs aforesaid, upon the said plaintiff's depositing in this court his bills of exchange for the amount of the purchase money indorsed, &c., for the use of the defendants, agreeably to the verdict of the jury."

1—Sequestration, in the practice of the civil law is a process to take judicial custody of the res or persona in controversy to abide the event of the suit. It may be applied to real or personal property, the right to which is litigated between the parties, or even to persons, as to a married woman, in a cause of divorce, in order to preserve her from ill-treatment on the part of her husband, or to a minor in order to secure him from ill-treatment by his parents. Clerke's prax. tit. 43; Pothier, de la Procédure Civile, Partie I, Chap. 3, art. 2, sec. 1: Code Napoleon, Liv. 3 tit. 11., Des Dépôts et du Sequestre, art. 1961; Digest of the Civil laws of Louisiana, 419. The sequestration may be demanded, either in the original petition or in the progress of the cause at any time before it is set down for hearing, by a petition from the party demanding it, with notice to the opposite party, on which the judge, after hearing counsel, pronounces his interlocutory sentence or decree. This sentence is to be provisionally executed notwithstanding an appeal. The sequestration is usually ordered, in possessory actions, where the preliminary proofs of the parties appear to be nearly balanced; where an inheritance consisting of personal effects of great value is in controversy; where there is ground to apprehend that the parties may resort to personal violence in contesting the enjoyment of the mesne profits; in actions of partition, where the property in litigation cannot be quietly enjoyed by the respective owners; and sometimes in cases where the suit is likely to be of long duration. Pothier, Ib. and sec. 2.

On the 29th of April, 1815, a writ of error was allowed to this court, and on the 3d of May, 1815, the defendant in error deposited in the court below, for the use of the plaintiffs in error, the bills of exchange mentioned in the pleadings, according to the verdict of the jury and the judgment of the court thereon, which bills were thereupon taken out of court by the plaintiffs in error.

1. The first question is, whether the sale, under the circumstances of the case, was a valid sale; whether fraud, which vitiates every contract, must be proved by the communication of positive misinformation, or by withholding information when asked. Suppression of material circumstances within the knowledge of the vendee, and not accessible *to the [*185 vendor, is equivalent to fraud, and vitiates the contract.¹ Pothier, in discussing this subject, adopts the distinction of the forum of conscience, and the forum of law; but he admits that fides est servanda.² The parties treated on an unequal footing, as the one *party [*186 had received intelligence of the peace of Ghent,

2.—Pothier, De Vente, Nos. 233 to 241. He considers this question under the four following heads: 1st. Whether good faith obliges the vendor, at least in foro conscientiae, not only to refrain from practising any deception, but also from using any mental reservation. 2d. What reservation binds the party in the civil forum, and to what obligations. 3d. Whether the vendor is bound, at least in foro conscientiae, not to conceal any circumstances, even extrinsic, which the vendee has an interest in knowing. 4th. Whether the vendor may, in foro conscientiae, sometimes sell at a price above the true value of the article. As Pothier's discussion throws great light on this subject, a translation of this part of his admirable treatise may not be unacceptable to the reader.

"ARTICLE II. 233. Although, in many transactions of civil society, the rules of good faith only require us to refrain from falsehood, and permit us to conceal from others that which they have an interest in knowing, if we have an equal interest in concealing it from them; yet, in interested contracts, among which is the contract of sale, good faith not only forbids the assertion of falsehood, but also all reservation concerning that which the person with whom we contract has an interest in afford irrefragable evidence of such an act of illegality." This proposition, as a doctrine of law, would be equally true, leaving out all that it contains relative to a license. A voyage prosecuted in furtherance of the enemy's interests is undoubtedly illegal, and it was on this illegality of the voyage itself that the judgment of the court proceeded. The court say they are satisfied from the facts that the voyage was illegal. In the case now before the court the captors insist that the court shall shut out the facts connected with the voyage, and go merely on presumption. The Julia cannot be an authority for such a decision. *The Aurora*¹ was decided expressly on the grounds which had been before stated in The Julia, and carries the doctrine no further. In the case of *The Hiram*² no evidence was offered on the part of the claimants to repel the presumption arising from the license. That case, then, only decides, that from the possession of the license the court may presume, until the contrary appears, that the voyage was in furtherance of the enemy's objects.

In all these cases the court seems to have rested its decision on the ground that the voyages in which the vessels were engaged were, of themselves, illegal voyages, undertaken and prosecuted for the promotion of the enemy's [146*] interests; and that *this illegality was shown by the facts which the cases disclosed. But it is not understood to have decided that it would hear no proof to make out the innocence of the voyage, notwithstanding the unfavorable inferences which might be drawn from the possession of the license. In the present case such proof is offered, and the claimants are ready to show that the voyage originated in no intention to further, and from its nature could not further, the objects of the enemy. It was a voyage from Baltimore to Cadiz, with flour, at a time when neither the British nor the Spanish armies drew supplies from that city. They expect to prove it to have been, in all respects, as innocent as a voyage from Baltimore to Boston, with a similar cargo. Upon this application for permission to give proof, and until the court should hear the proof, the only question will be, whether, in the most innocent voyage which can be imagined, the having such a license is, per se, cause of confiscation; and cannot in any case, by any evidence, admit of explanation or excuse. On this point, the claimant's counsel wish to be heard, unless the court considers itself as having recently solemnly decided the precise question. We will contend, that although the possession of such a license might create a presumption of unlawful trade, yet, like presumptions in other cases, it is capable of being repelled by proof; and that the judgment of the court must rest, after all, on the real nature and object of the voyage, as disclosed by the facts connected with it, and not on the mere terms of the passport. In a case of this sort, the [147*] court will *not incline to hold itself bound by former decisions beyond their clear and manifest extent. No case appears to have gone so far as to prevent the court from hearing proof of the lawfulness of the voyage, independent of the license, or to have decided that such proof, when full and satisfactory, should not avoid confiscation.

Woodward and Ingersoll, on the other side, were stopped by the court.

WASHINGTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The view of the court is, that this case cannot be distinguished from those already decided. It is alleged that the flour was not actually destined to the use of the enemy; but whether any part of it went to his use or not, is immaterial. It is, indeed, possible that Cadiz might have fallen without the aid of these supplies; and therefore, in fact, Great Britain and her ally may have been relieved, by these supplies, from the pressure of the war in that quarter. The court, however, in the cases alluded to, proceeded on a broader ground; all the judges who concurred in those decisions were of opinion that the mere sailing under an enemy's license, without regard to the object of the voyage, or the port of destination, constituted, of itself, an act of illegality which subjected the property to confiscation. It was an attempt by one individual of a belligerent country to clothe himself with a neutral character *by the [*148 license of the other belligerent, and thus to separate himself from the common character of his own country.

Sentence affirmed.

DAVIS ET AL., Claimants.

Under the embargo act of the 22d December, 1807, the words "an embargo shall be laid," not only imposed upon the public officers the duty of preventing the departure of registered or sea-letter vessels on a foreign voyage, but, consequently, rendered them liable to forfeiture under the supplementary act of the 9th of January, 1808.

In such case, if the vessel be actually and bona fide carried by force to a foreign port, she is not liable to forfeiture.

The court being of opinion, under the facts and circumstances of the case, that the capture under which it was alleged the vessel was compelled to go to a foreign port was fictitious and collusive; the decree of condemnation in the court below was affirmed.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court for the District of New York.

A libel was filed against this vessel in the District Court of New York, March, 1809, for a breach of the act of the 22d of December, 1807, laying an embargo, and the several acts supplementary thereto, alleging that she proceeded from Baltimore, without any clearance or permit, bound on a voyage *to Exu- [*149 ma, one of the Bahama Islands, where she took in a cargo of six thousand bushels of salt, with which she returned to New York. The claimants admitted the fact of going to Exuma, and bringing away the salt, but alleged that it was from necessity: that the brig was regularly bound to Boston, but being captured soon after she left Hampton Roads, by a British privateer, was sent to Jamaica, where she sold the cargo of flour which she had on board, the government of that colony not allowing it to be brought off. That she then went to Exuma.

The testimony in the case exhibits the following summary: About the middle of October, 1808, the vessel arrived at Baltimore from Boston. At Baltimore she took on board a cargo of upwards of sixteen hundred barrels of flour, and sailed again, ostensibly for Boston, about the first of November. On reaching Hampton Roads, she stopped a few days, being, as was asserted, windbound. While there, a British privateer, of ten guns and twelve men, called the Ino, arrived in the Roads. On the eighth of the month the brig put to sea, the Ino following her. On the afternoon of the same day the Ino captured her, within ten leagues of the shore, putting a prize-master and one man on board. The vessels then proceeded for the West Indies. During the voyage no attempt was made by the crew either to retake the brig or to escape, though favorable opportunities were not wanting. Her crew consisted of nine persons. After a short separation from the privateer, the brig arrived off St. Nicholas Mole. Here 150 the privateer joined her, and thence the two went to Kingston. No prize proceedings were instituted against the brig; but, on the contrary, the supposed captors relinquished all claim to their prize, on reaching Kingston. From Kingston she went to Exuma, as above stated. The District Court, on the hearing, pronounced a sentence of condemnation. A decree of affirmance, pro forma, was entered in the Circuit Court, from which the cause was brought, by appeal, to this court.

Hoffman, for the appellants and claimants, stated, that this case was governed by the authority of The Short Staple; the William King having sailed from Hampton Roads in company with that vessel, and both were seized by the British privateer Ino, and compelled to go to the West Indies. The two cases are perfectly coincident in their circumstances, and restitution having been decreed in the case of The Short Staple, the same judgment must, consequently, be pronounced in the present case. He argued that the whole plan and system of the revenue laws indicated that it was not the legislative intention to cumulate a forfeiture of the ship (being a registered vessel) upon the penalty of the bond, which had been given for relanding the cargo in the United States.

The Attorney-General and Hopkinson, contra. The court expressly overruled the point made 151 as to the construction of the embargo laws, in the case of The Short Staple,² although that case was determined, on its peculiar circumstances by a majority of the court, in favor of the claimants. But the restitution of the Short Staple, on the facts of her case, forms no ground for the acquittal of the William King, even should the facts be precisely similar. Principles of law form precedents. But an inference from evidence is not conclusive as to facts, in another cause, whether the testimony be the same or different; certainly not if it be different.

Hoffman, in reply, argued, that the court could not, without judicial inconsistency, decide this case differently from that of The Short Staple, unless there was some substantial and important difference in the facts of the two cases; that the opinion of a majority of the court was the opinion of the court, and a rule of conduct, whether formed upon an abstract point of law or upon a mixed question of fact and law; and that to maintain the contrary position would be to assent to an assertion, which had been hazarded in another place, that the decisions of this court are not binding as legal precedents on themselves and on others.

This case comes up on appeal from the Circuit Court of New York. The vessel is the same which makes her appearance in the case of The Short Staple, decided in this court at February term, 1815; and it has been contended that the acquittal in that case is conclusive upon this.

But we think otherwise. It might with more propriety be contended, that had the hearing of this cause come on together with that of The Short Staple, the latter would have found much more difficulty in escaping. As it was, the division of the court, and the acknowledgment of the judge who delivered the opinion, show that the vessel in that case was "hardly saved." In the present cause there is very material evidence which did not appear in, and could not affect the former. We shall, therefore, dispose of this case altogether upon the evidence that is peculiar to it.

It will be recollected that this vessel, as well as the Short Staple, were libeled for a violation of the embargo act of the 22d of December, 1807, and the supplementary act of the 9th of January, 1808, the former of which enacts, "that an embargo shall be laid on all ships and vessels in the ports of the United States, bound on a foreign voyage," and the latter forfeits the vessel that shall proceed to any foreign port or place, "contrary to the provisions of this act, or of the act to which this is a supplement." As the majority of the court were of opinion that no offense was committed in the case of The Short Staple, *it was unneces- [153 sary to express any opinion on the application of the law. They, therefore, waived it.

But in this case it becomes necessary to lay down the following principles: There can be no doubt that if the William King was carried off to Jamaica by actual force, it was an act which wanted the concurrence of the will, and, therefore, innocent. But, whatever is done in fraud of a law is done in violation of it; and if a vessel, with an original intention to go to a foreign port, complied with

2.—In delivering the opinion of the court in that case, Marshall, Ch. J., stated that this point had "been pressed with great earnestness by the counsel for the claimants; but the court is not convinced that his exposition of the embargo acts is a sound one. On this point, however, it will be unnecessary to give an opinion; because we think the necessity under which the claimants justify their going into St. Nicholas Mole is sustained by the proofs in the cause." 9 Cranch, 60.

ground, therefore, Mr. Girrault was an inadmissible witness. 4. The only real question in the cause is, whether the sale was invalid because the vendee did not communicate information which he received precisely as the vendor might have got it had he been equally diligent or equally fortunate. And, surely, on this question there can be no doubt. Even if the vendor had been entitled to the disclosure, he waived it by not insisting on an answer to his question; and the silence of the vendee might as well have been interpreted into an affirmative as a negative answer. But, on principle, he was not bound to disclose. Even admitting that his conduct was unlawful, in foro conscientie, does that prove that it was so in the civil forum? Human laws are imperfect in this respect, and the sphere of mortality is more extensive than the limits of civil jurisdiction. The maxim of caveat emptor could never have crept into the law if the province of ethics had been co-extensive with it. There was, in the present case, no circumvention or manœuvre practiced by the vendee, unless rising earlier in the morning, and obtaining by superior diligence and alertness that intelligence by which the price of commodities was regulated, be such. It is a romantic equality that is contended for on the other side. Parties never can be precisely equal in knowledge, either of facts or of the infer-194*] ences *from such facts, and both must concur in order to satisfy the rule contended for. The absence of all authority in England and the United States—both great commercial countries—speaks volumes against the reasonableness and practicability of such a rule. C. J. Ingersoll, in reply. Though the record may not show that anything tending to mislead by positive assertion was said by the vendee, in answer to the question proposed by Mr. Girrault, yet it is a case of manœuvre; of mental reservation; of circumvention. The information was monopolized by the messengers from the British fleet, and not imparted to the public at large until it was too late for the vendor to save himself. The rule of law and of ethics is the same. It is not a romantic, but a practical and legal rule of equality and good faith that is proposed to be applied. The answer of Boorman & Johnston denies the whole of the petition, and consequently denies that payment was to be in bills of exchange; and their taking the bills out of court ought not to prejudice them. There is nothing in the record to show that the vendors were general merchants, and they disclosed their principals when they came to plead. The judge undertook to decide from the testimony that there was no fraud; in so doing he invaded the province of the jury: he should have left it to the jury, expressing his opinion merely.

The question in this case is, whether the intelligence of extrinsic circumstances, which might influence the price of the commodity, and which was exclusively within the knowledge of the vendee, ought to have been communicated by him to the vendor. The court is of opinion that he was not bound to communicate it. It would be difficult to circumscribe the contrary doctrine within proper limits, where the means of intelligence are equally accessible to both parties. But at the same time, each party must take care not to say or do anything tending to impose upon the other. The court thinks that the absolute instruction of the judge was erroneous, and that the question whether any imposition was practised by the vendee upon the vendor ought to have been submitted to the jury. For these reasons the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded to the District Court of Louisiana, with directions to award a venire facias de novo.

Venire de novo awarded.

RUTHERFORD v. GREENE'S HEIRS.

A question relative to the title of the late Major-General Nathaniel Greene, to 25,000 acres of land given to him, within the bounds of the land reserved for the use of the army, by the 10th section of the act of the legislature of North Carolina, passed in 1782, as a mark of the sense entertained by that state of his eminent services.

THIS was a bill in chancery, filed in the Circuit Court for the District of Tennessee, by the appellant, against the heirs of the late Major-General Greene.

The cause was argued by Campbell and Harper for the appellant, and by Law and Jones for the appellees.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

As this case depends entirely on the validity of Greene's title, the court will notice only so much of the record as respects that title.

In the year 1777 the state of North Carolina opened a land-office, for the purpose of selling all the vacant lands east of a line described in the act.

In the year 1780 an act passed reserving a certain tract of country for the officers and soldiers of the line of that state.

This act is lost.

*In the year 1782 an act passed "for [*197 the relief of the officers and soldiers in the continental line, and for other purposes therein mentioned." This act gives certain specified quantities of land to the officers and soldiers; then the 7th section commences thus: "And, whereas, in May, 1780, an act passed at Newburn, reserving a certain tract of country to be appropriated to the aforesaid purposes, and it being represented to this present assembly that sundry families had, before the passing the said act, settled on the said tract of country, Be it enacted," &c. The section then proceeds to grant 640 acres of land to each family which had so settled. The 8th section appoints commissioners to lay off, in one or more tracts, the land allotted to the officers and soldiers. The 10th section enacts, that "25,000 acres of land shall be allotted for, and given to, Major-General Nathaniel Greene, his heirs and assigns, within the bounds of the lands reserved for the use of the army, to be laid off by the aforesaid commissioners, as a mark of the high sense this state entertains of the extraordinary services of that brave and gallant officer."

This is the foundation of the title of the appellees.

On the part of the appellant it is contended that these words give nothing. They are in the future, not in the present tense; and indicate an intention to give in future, but create no present obligation on the state nor present interest in General Greene.

The court thinks differently. The words are words of absolute donation, not, indeed, of any 198 specific *land, but of 25,000 acres in the territory set apart for the officers and soldiers.

"Be it enacted, that 25,000 acres of land shall be allotted for and given to Major-General Nathaniel Greene." Persons had been appointed in a previous section to make particular allotments for individuals out of this large territory reserved, and the words of this section contain a positive mandate to them to set apart 25,000 acres for General Greene. As the act was to be performed in future, the words directing it are necessarily in the future tense. "Twenty-five thousand acres of land shall be allotted for, and given to, Major-General Nathaniel Greene." Given when? The answer is unavoidable—when they shall be allotted. Given how? Not by any future act—for it is not the practice of legislation to enact that a law shall be passed by some future legislature—but given by force of this act.

It has been said that, to make this an operative gift, the words "are hereby" should have been inserted before the word "given," so as to read, "shall be allotted for, and are hereby given to," &c. Were it even true that these words would make the gift more explicit, which is not admitted, it surely cannot be necessary now to say that the validity of a legislative act depends in no degree on its containing the technical terms usual in a conveyance. Nothing can be more apparent than the intention of the legislature to order their commissioners to make the allotment, and to give the land, when allotted, to General Greene.

The 11th section authorizes the commissioners 199 to *appoint surveyors, for the purpose of surveying the lands given by the preceding sections of the law.

In pursuance of the directions of this act, the commissioners allotted 25,000 acres of land to General Greene, and caused the tract to be surveyed. The survey was returned to the office of the legislature, on the 11th of March, in the year 1783. The allotment and survey marked out the land given by the act of 1782, and separated it from the general mass liable to appropriation by others. The general gift of 25,000 acres, lying in the territory reserved for the officers and soldiers of the line of North Carolina, had now become a particular gift of the 25,000 acres contained in this survey.

Against this conclusion has been urged that article in the constitution of North Carolina which directs that there should be a seal of the state, to be kept by the governor and affixed to all grants. This legislative act, it is said, cannot amount to a grant, since it wants a formality required by the constitution.

Wheat. 2.

This provision of the constitution is so obviously intended for the completion and authentication of an instrument, attesting a title previously created by law, which instrument is so obviously the mere evidence of prior legal appropriation, and not the act of original appropriation itself, that the court would certainly have thought it unnecessary to advert to it, had not the argument been urged repeatedly, and with much earnestness, by counsel of the highest respectability.

After urging that these lands were not positively *granted to General Greene, the [*200] counsel for the appellant proceeded to argue that it was in the power of the legislature to retract its promise, and that the legislature had retracted it.

Before attempting the difficult task of describing the limits of the legislative power in cases where those limits are not fixed by a written constitution, the court will proceed to inquire whether the government of North Carolina has, in fact, revoked its promise or recalled its gift.

At a session begun on the 12th of April, 1783, the assembly passed "an act for opening the land-office," thereby extending the line describing the country in which lands might be entered so far west as to comprehend the territory reserved for the officers and soldiers of the North Carolina line.

The 11th section of this act contains a proviso saving from entry the lands within the bounds reserved for the officers and soldiers.

At the same session an act was passed "to amend the act for the relief of the officers and soldiers of the continental line, and for other purposes."

The first six sections of this act prescribe the mode of individual appropriation, and of obtaining titles.

The 7th section, "For prevention of disputes," enacts "that the officers and soldiers aforesaid shall enter and survey the lands within the following lines, Beginning," &c.

This section, it is said, changes the place reserved, and marks out a new territory for the officers and soldiers. It is, then, contended, that this act, and *the preceding act [*201] for opening the land-office are to be construed together, and the proviso of the 11th section of that act applies to the 7th section of this; by which operation the whole territory before reserved for the officers and soldiers, including the land surveyed for General Greene, is opened for entry.

The court does not concur with the counsel for the appellant in any part of this argument.

There is nothing in the law leading to the opinion that the place reserved for the officers and soldiers was changed. The fair construction of the acts is that the reserve was restricted to narrower limits, not transferred to different ground.

It has been contended that the court is restrained from giving this construction to the acts under consideration, because the bill avers that the place was changed,*and the demurrer admits the fact.

The court will not inquire whether this averment is founded on an apparent misconstruction of the law, and is, therefore, to be disregarded; or is the averment of a fact compatible with the law; because the fact itself does not essentially affect the case.

If the place in which lands were reserved generally for the officers and soldiers, but not individually appropriated, was changed, the individual appropriation made for General Greene, within their original limits, was not also changed. The act did not profess to remove him with them, and he consequently remained on the same ground, protected by his pre-existing title, whatever it might be.*

But it is contended that his title was annulled by the general authority given in the 9th section of the act, to enter all the lands within the enlarged limits then opened to purchasers.

To this argument it is answered,

1st. That the 11th section reserves the land allotted to the officers and soldiers, then comprehending the land surveyed for General Greene; and,

2d. That a general permission to enter lands within a given tract of country must, of necessity, be limited to lands not previously appropriated.

The positive exception contained in the 11th section, it is said by the appellant, must be applied to the land reserved to the officers and soldiers by the subsequent act changing their position, because the two acts must be taken together; and if so, there is no exception comprehending the lands of General Greene.

The two acts have distinct objects. The first opens a land-office for the purpose of redeeming the public debt by the sale of lands, and the second prescribes the manner in which officers and soldiers are to obtain titles for lands given to them by the state, and amends an act passed at a previous session on the same day. The legislature has not considered the reserve in the first act as transferred into the second; but has, by the 8th section of the second act, re-enacted in a modified manner the prohibition intended for the protection of those for whom this reserve was expressly made.

*203 But let it be conceded that the proviso of the 11th section was repealed by implication, when the position of the officers and soldiers was changed, and a new prohibition enacted and applied to the new reserve; still it would be difficult to maintain that this silent repeal, implied from the removal of the object for which it was originally and chiefly intended, should apply to another object originally preserved by the provision, and for which it continues to be necessary.

But the court does not found its opinion on this position, however well it may be supported by justice. The proposition is believed to be perfectly correct that the act of 1783, which opened the land-office, must be construed as offering for sale those lands only which were then liable to appropriation, not those which had before been individually appropriated. Whatever the legislative power may be, its acts ought never to be so construed as to subvert the rights of property, unless its intention so to do shall be expressed in such terms as to admit of no doubt, and to show a clear design to effect the object. No general terms intended for property to which they may be fairly applicable, and not particularly applied by the legislature—no silent, implied, and constructive repeals—ought ever to be so understood as to divest a vested right.

But it is contended that this construction of the acts of 1783 is forced upon us, because the rights of others, and not the right of General Greene, are exempted from the operation of that section which offers for sale all* *[204 the land within the described territory; and the exception of one object excludes others of the same character.

Without inquiring what would be the force of this argument, if, in point of fact, rights similar to those of General Greene were received, and his omitted, let the fact be examined.

The first reservation in the act for opening the land-office related to the lands of the Cherokee Indians.

Nothing could be more obvious than the necessity, as well as propriety, of prohibiting all entries on Indian lands lying within the boundary offered for sale, if the legislature intended they should not be entered. The Indian title was not derived from the state of North Carolina; and to infer from the recognition of this title that others actually derived from the state, if not also recognized, are annulled, is not admitted to be correct reasoning.

The only other reserve in this act is of the land within the limits allotted to the officers and soldiers, and within these limits was the land surveyed for General Greene.

Our attention is next directed to the act to amend the act “for the relief of the officers and soldiers,” &c. This act narrows the limits within which the military lands shall be surveyed, or changes them so that in either case the lands of General Greene are no longer within them. Nothing can be more obvious than that provisions relating to lands within this particular territory can have no implied application to a title previously acquired by* *[205 General Greene to lands not lying within it.

The 8th section of the act prohibits all persons from entering lands within the bounds allotted to the officers and soldiers.

The 9th section excepts out of this prohibition the commissioners and surveyors, &c., appointed to lay off the military lands, and prescribes the mode by which they may appropriate and acquire title to lands given to them by the legislature.

The 13th section enacts that Governor Martin and David Wilson be entitled, agreeably to the report of the committee, to two thousand acres of land each, adjacent to lands allotted to officers and soldiers, for which they may receive titles in the same manner as the officers and soldiers.

The insertion of this reservation in this act leads almost necessarily to the opinion that the lands granted to Martin and Wilson were a part of those to which the act related; and the words of the section show that their title was acquired by this act. By no course of just reasoning can it be inferred from these permissions to make appropriations within bounds not open to entry generally, that a vested right to lands not lying within the limits to which this act relates is annulled.

It is clearly and unanimously the opinion of this court that the act of 1782 vested a title in General Greene to 25,000 acres of land, to be laid off within the bounds allotted to the officers and soldiers, and that the survey made in pursuance of that act, and returned in March, 206*] 1783, gave precision to that title, *and attached it to the land surveyed. That his rights are not impaired by the acts of 1783, and the entry of the appellant, all of which are subsequent to his survey; and that it is completed by the grant which issued in pursuance of the act of 1784, and which relates to the inception of his title. The decree of the Circuit Court, dismissing the bill of the complainant, is affirmed with costs.

Decree affirmed.

JOHNSON v. PANNEL'S HEIRS.

It is essential to the validity of an entry that the land intended to be appropriated should be so described as to give notice of the appropriation to the subsequent locators.

In taking the distance from one point to another on a large river, the measurement is to be with its meanders, and not in a direct line.

In ascertaining a place to be found by its distance from another place, the vague words "about" or "nearly" and the like, are to be rejected, if there are no other words rendering it necessary to retain them; and the distance mentioned is to be taken positively.

Entries made in a wilderness, most generally referring to some prominent and notorious natural object, which may direct the attention to the neighborhood in which the land is placed, and then to some particular object exactly describing it, the first of these is denominated the general or descriptive call, and the last the particular locative call of the entry. Reasonable certainty is required in both; if the descriptive call will not inform a subsequent locator in what neighborhood he is to search for the land, the entry is defective, unless 207*] *the particular object is one of sufficient notoriety. If, after having reached the neighborhood, the locative object cannot be found within the limits of the descriptive calls, the entry is also defective. A single call may, at the same time, be of such a nature (as, for example, a spring of general notoriety) as to constitute within itself both a call of description and of location; but, if this call be accompanied with another, such as a marked tree at the spring, it seems to be required that both should be satisfied.

The call for an unmarked tree of a kind which is common in the neighborhood of a place sufficiently described by the other parts of the entry to be fixed with certainty may be considered as an immaterial call.

Therefore, where the entry was in the following words: "D. P. enters 2,000 acres on a treasury warrant on the Ohio, about twelve miles below the mouth of Licking, beginning at a hickory and sugar tree on the river bank, running up the river from thence 1,060 poles, thence at right angles to the same, and back for quantity," it was held that the call for a sugar tree might be declared immaterial, and the location be sustained on the other calls.

The entry was decreed to be surveyed, beginning 12 miles below the mouth of Licking on the bank of the Ohio, and running up that river 1,060 poles; which line was to form the base of a rectangular parallelogram to include 2,000 acres of land.

THIS cause was argued by Talbot for the appellants, and M. B. Hardin for the respondents.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Wheat. 2.

This case depends on the validity and construction of an entry made in the state of Kentucky by David Pannel, the ancestor of the appellees, in these words: "David Pannell enters 2,000 acres on a treasury warrant on the Ohio, about twelve miles below the mouth of Licking, beginning at a hickory and sugar tree on the river bank, running up the *river [*208 from thence 1,060 poles, thence at right angles to the same and back for quantity."

The appellant having obtained an elder patent for the same land on a junior entry, the appellees brought a bill in the Circuit Court for the District of Kentucky, sitting in chancery, praying that the defendant, in that court, might be decreed to convey to them. The Circuit Court directed the entry of the complainant to be surveyed, beginning twelve miles below the mouth of Licking on the bank of the Ohio, and running up that river 1,060 poles; which line was to form the base of a rectangular parallelogram, to include 2,000 acres of land. So much of this land as was within Pannell's patent, and also within Johnson's patent, the court decreed the defendant to convey to the plaintiffs. From this decree the defendant has appealed to this court.

He contends that the decree is erroneous, because,

1st. It affirms the validity of this entry, which is too uncertain and defective to be established.

2d. If the entry be established, it ought to be so surveyed that the whole land should lie twelve miles below the mouth of Licking.

First. It is undoubtedly essential to the validity of an entry that it shall be made so specially and precisely that others may be enabled, with certainty, to locate the adjacent residuum. The land intended to be appropriated must consequently be so described as to give notice of the appropriation to subsequent locators. In obtaining this information, however, it would seem to be the plain dictate of common sense that the person about to take up adjoining *lands would read the whole of a pre- [*209 vious entry which he wished to avoid, compare together its different parts, and judge, from the entire description, what land was appropriated. If with common attention and common intelligence the land could be ascertained and avoided, the requisites of the law would seem to be complied with.

Test Pannel's entry by this standard.

The mouth of Licking is a place of acknowledged and universal notoriety, which no man in the country could be at a loss to find. When placed there, he is informed by the entry that Pannel's land lies twelve miles below him on the Ohio. He proceeds down the river twelve miles, and is there informed that the entry begins at a hickory and sugar tree on the river bank. He looks around him and sees hickory and sugar trees. Here, then, he would say, while uninformed of decisions which have since been made, is the beginning of the entry. In what direction does the land lie? The paper which is to give his information says, "running up the river from thence 1,060 poles, thence at right angles to the same, and back, for quantity." Would he say this description is repugnant in itself, containing equal and contradictory directions, neither of which is entitled to any preference over the other, and leaving the judgment in such a state of doubt and perplexity as to be incapable of deciding the real position of this land? Would he say the whole land must lie twelve miles from the mouth of Licking? This is so clearly and definitely required that the entry will admit of no other construction. That the subsequent words directing *him to run up the river from that point 1,060 poles, and thus approach the mouth of Licking, are not explanatory but contradictory? That the one or the other must be totally discarded? Were this the real impression which would be made on the mind, it cannot be denied that the state of uncertainty in which these equal and irreconcilable descriptions would place a subsequent locator, ought to vitiate the entry. But if, on the contrary, the obvious and natural construction would be that, since every part of the land cannot be placed precisely twelve miles below the mouth of Licking, the distance is applicable to any part of the tract, and this part of the description may be so explained and controlled by other parts as to receive a meaning different from that which it would have if standing alone, then the subsequent locator would take the whole description together, and if its different parts could, without difficulty, be reconciled, he would reconcile them. He would say the beginning must be twelve miles from the mouth of Licking, but the residue of the land must approach that place because the entry requires positively to run from the beginning up the river. This would, it is thought, be the manner in which this entry would be understood by a person guided by no other light than is furnished by human reason. But the courts of Kentucky have constructed a vast and complex system, on the entire preservation of which their property depends, and this court will respect that system as much as the courts of Kentucky themselves.

211* In applying the decisions of that country to this cause, we find many points now settled which were formerly controverted questions. In taking the distance from one point to another on a large river the measurement is to be with its meanders, not in a direct line. And in ascertaining a place to be found by its distance from another place, the vague words "about," or "nearly," and the like, are to be discarded, if there are no other words rendering it necessary to retain them; and the distance mentioned is to be taken positively. A subsequent locator, then, must look for the beginning called for in this entry twelve miles below the mouth of Licking, measured by the meanders of the Ohio.

In construing locations some other principles have been established which seem to be considered as fundamental. Entries made in a wilderness would most generally refer to some prominent and notorious object which might direct the attention to the neighborhood in which the land was placed; and then to some particular object which should exactly describe it. The first of these has been denominated the general or descriptive call, and the last the particular or locative call of the entry. Reasonable certainty has always been required in both. If the descriptive call will not inform a subsequent locator in what neighborhood he is to search for the land, the entry is defective, unless the particular object be one of sufficient notoriety. If, after having reached the neighborhood, the locative object cannot be found within the limits of the descriptive call, the entry is equally defective. They must both be *found; and neither can be discarded [*212 unless deemed immaterial. A single call may be, at the same time, so notorious and so formed, as, for example, a spring of general notoriety, as to constitute in itself a call both of description and location; but if this call be accompanied with another, as a marked tree at the spring, it seems to be required that both calls should be satisfied.

Thus, in the case now under the consideration of the court, the call for a beginning twelve miles below the mouth of Licking would be sufficiently descriptive, and is sufficiently precise to be locative. It would be unquestionably good were it not accompanied with the additional call for a hickory and sugar tree. Whether it is vitiated by this additional call is to be determined by a reference to the decisions in Kentucky.

The case of Grubbs et al. v. Rice (2 Bibb, 107), depended on the validity of an entry made in these words: "James Thomas enters 300 acres of land, &c., on the south side of Kentucky, about two miles below the mouth of Red River, beginning at a tree marked I. S. on the bank of the river, and running down the river for quantity."

No tree marked I. S. was found at or near the distance required. It was proved that a tree had been marked I. S. by the person who afterwards made the entry for Thomas, and that it stood on the south side of Kentucky; but instead of being two miles it was three miles and a quarter, by the meanders of the river, and two miles and two-thirds of a mile on a direct course, below the mouth of Red River. *The inferior court disregarded the call [*213 for the tree, and fixed the beginning of the entry at the termination of two miles below the mouth of Red River. On an appeal this decree was reversed, and Judge Wallace, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "This rejection of the call for the tree marked I. S. is certainly subversive of the well-established principle that no part of an entry ought to be rejected unless what is evidently mere surplusage, or absolutely repugnant to other expressions which are more important; because, to do more would not be construing entries, but making them. But the expression 'about two miles below the mouth of Red River' is obviously only a general call, and to substitute this in the place of the expression 'beginning at a tree marked I. S.,' &c., which is the only special or locative call in the entry, is still more inadmissible."

The case of Kincaid v. Blythe and others (2 Bibb, 479) turned on the validity of an entry made "on a branch of Silver Creek, about four miles from the little fort on Boone's old trace, including a tree marked D. B." In this case, too, the inferior court disregarded the call for the tree, which could not be proved to have existed when the location was made, and directed the land to be surveyed at the termination of the distance of four miles from the little fort. On appeal, this decree also was reversed, and, in delivering the opinion of the court, Judge Wallace said: "It is evident that when the entry was made, Boone's old trace, the little fort, and Silver Creek, were all well known by those names to the generality of 214*] those who were conversant in *the vicinity. And it further appears that about four miles from the little fort, on a southern direction, Boone's old trace struck Hayes' fork of Silver Creek, which may be presumed to be the branch of Silver Creek intended; and, if the entry contained no other calls, it would deserve serious consideration whether the place where the trace crossed Hayes' fork of Silver Creek ought not to be assumed as the center of the survey to be made thereon. But this entry calls to include a tree marked D. B., which is obviously a locative and material call, and, therefore, conformably to the uniform decisions of this court on similar entries, must be taken into consideration in deciding on this entry."

These cases are admitted to have settled the law to be that a material locative call, as for a marked tree, cannot be disregarded; and that, if the existence of the tree cannot be proved, the entry cannot be sustained. The only distinction between these cases and that under the consideration of the court is that, in them, the entries call for a marked tree; in this it calls for a sugar tree and hickory, not stating them to be marked. For the importance of this distinction we are again referred to the decisions of Kentucky.

The case of Greenup v. Lyne's heirs,¹ turned on an entry of land "lying on Kentucky River, opposite to Leesburg, beginning at a beech tree and running up the river and back for quantity." The validity of this entry was affirmed in the inferior court, and, on an appeal, was 215*] also affirmed in the Superior Court. *In delivering the opinion of the superior court, Judge Logan said: "Had the only call in the entry been to lie on the river opposite to Leesburg we should have concurred with the Circuit Court in the manner of surveying it, by running up and down the river equal distances from a point opposite the centre of Leesburg; and if the call to begin at "a beech tree" had been the only other call, we should still have thought that opinion correct, as the common growth of the timber there is beech, and a tree of the description could have been had at almost any point within the limits of the claim. This circumstance, we conceive, ought not to affect the entry; for whether the call is regarded or rejected, in the construction of the entry, is totally immaterial; because, it seems to the court that where an uncertainty arises from the number of objects presented, answering the calls of an entry, and it has other calls sufficiently precise to sustain it, that, of the many doubtful objects, that should be taken as intended, which will best preserve the consistency of the others; and in this case it seems the call for the tree could be complied with without changing in the least the position given by the first call, so that it is left as an immaterial call. We are more confirmed in this opinion when we consider that the entry, from any other view, must be invalid for uncertainty, although we believe no one could doubt, from a liberal and just construction of it, as to the general body and position of the land it calls for."

*This case, if not overruled, certainly- [*216 ly goes far in distinguishing between a call for a marked tree, and for a tree not marked, provided such trees as the call requires are found about the place where the entry must begin. It goes further, and strongly indicates the opinion that an unmarked tree was an object of less importance in the mind of the locator than one selected from all others by a mark peculiar to itself. While the latter must have been deemed important, and have strongly fixed his attention, the former may have been thought not very essential. Coming to the place where he intended to begin, looking around him when there, and seeing trees of a particular kind from the common growth, he might suppose it unimportant at which of these trees he should commence and call for one of them. In such a case, a court may well say "whether the call is regarded or rejected in the construction of the entry is totally immaterial." There is much reason for this opinion. Certainty is required in entries for the purpose of giving notice to subsequent locators. The subsequent locator who comes to the place described in the entry, in order to find the land he wishes to avoid, will, if a marked tree be called for, search for that marked tree; and, if it cannot be found, may well conclude that this is not the land intended to be appropriated; but if only a tree is called for, and trees stand all around him, he will naturally suppose that the nearest may be taken as a beginning, and that to him it is quite immaterial whether the commencement be at the spot on which he stands or within ten feet or ten yards of him. *The subsequent [*217 locator is not misled by this call; nor is there any danger of his mistaking the position of the land. It is not without reason, therefore, that the call is pronounced immaterial, and one which may be regarded or rejected. The entry may be sustained by other calls which are sufficiently precise to sustain it.

If in the case at bar it had been proved that sugar trees and hickories were as common at the termination of twelve miles from the mouth of Licking as the beech tree opposite to Leesburg, the two cases would, in this respect, be precisely alike. But this is not proved. Only one witness has been examined to this point, and his testimony is that there are sugar trees on the bank of the Ohio, in the neighborhood, and that the maple or sugar tree might be found for many miles above and below the corner, standing within fifty yards of each other, on the second bank of the river. The report of the surveyor shows that three elms and a hickory stood at the termination of the twelve miles from the mouth of Licking.

There would certainly be much difficulty in supporting this as a locative call, although it is not absolutely certain that it might not be so supported. The not less important question is, whether it may be considered as an immaterial call. No case has been cited in which the call for an unmarked tree has been thought material; and there are cases in which a circumstance not important in itself has been dispensed with. The difference between calling for a marked and an unmarked tree has been *al- [*218 ready noticed. It is difficult to suppose that they are viewed as equally important by the person making the entry, or by a subsequent locator. If the person making the entry designed to select for the beginning a particular tree, in exclusion of all others, it is in a high degree improbable that he should omit to mark it. If he made the entry from memory, then the place only, and not the particular tree, would be the object to which his mind would attach importance. So with the subsequent locator. The distance would bring him to the place, or sufficiently near to it for every beneficial purpose, and whether a sugar tree and hickory stood at the end of twelve miles as measured by his chain, or within thirty, forty, or fifty yards, would not essentially vary his views with respect to adjacent lands. He could not doubt, to use the expression of the court in the case of Greenup v. Lyne's heirs, "as to the general body and position of the land" described in the entry. The opinion that the call for an unmarked tree of a kind which is common in the neighborhood of a place sufficiently described by other parts of the entry to be fixed with certainty may be considered as an immaterial call, is supported by the decision of the court in the case which has been last mentioned. Although in that case the judge shows that a tree might be found to satisfy the call at the place fixed as the beginning, yet it is apparent that different places within a few yards of each other would answer equally well for the beginning, and that different trees might be selected for that purpose. And the judge, after stating 219*] that this call *might either be considered as satisfied, or in itself immaterial, proceeds to show that he thought it immaterial. "Regarding," he proceeds to say, "the call for a beech tree as immaterial, we come to consider," &c.

Upon the authority of the case of Greenup v. Lyne's Heirs, then, and upon a view of the whole of this entry, it would seem that the call for the sugar tree and hickory may be declared immaterial, and the location be sustained on its other calls.

The second question is, in what manner ought this entry to be surveyed?

It is admitted to be a general principle that, where a location calls for land to lie a given distance from a given point, the whole land must be placed at or beyond that distance, if there be no other words in the location which control this construction. But it is not admitted that this call can overrule the plain meaning of the whole entry taken together. It is believed to be unquestionably decided that every material part of the entry is to be considered, and that such construction is to be put upon the whole as is best adapted to all its material calls.

This principle was laid down in Greenup v. Lyne's Heirs, which, on this point, bears a strong analogy to that under the consideration of the court. In Greenup v. Lyne's Heirs the entry called for land "lying on Kentucky River, opposite to Leesburg, beginning at a beech tree, and running up the river and back for quantity."

It is perfectly settled in Kentucky, that on a call for land lying opposite to Leesburg, the center of the land would be placed opposite to the center of the town, and a square would be formed on a base line running up and down the river to include the quantity. The entry could not otherwise be sustained. The inferior court laid off this entry in that manner; and the Appellate Court declared that it would be the proper manner were there not other words in it which controlled this general description by one which was more particular. That more particular description was, "running up the river and back for quantity."

These cases are in principle the same. The one calls for land twelve miles below the mouth of Licking, which description would require land the nearest part of which is at the given distance; the other calls for land lying opposite Leesburg, which requires a tract the center of which is opposite to the center of the town. The one calls for a beginning at a sugar tree and hickory, without naming a place for the beginning otherwise than by the description of the position of the land; the other calls for a beech tree under precisely the same circumstances. In the case of Greenup v. Lyne's Heirs the words "running up the river and back for quantity" have changed the place of beginning from the center to the lower end of the town, and the position of the land, so that instead of lying above and below Leesburg, in equal quantities, it lies entirely above that place. Why shall not the same words influence in the same manner, the position of Pannel's land?

From the language of Pannel's entry, every man would expect the survey to begin at the place called *for, twelve miles below [*221 the mouth of Licking. If that is not the beginning the location is unquestionably uncertain and void. If that is the beginning it is the plain mandate of the entry to run up the river 1,060 poles and back for quantity.

It is the opinion of the majority of the court that the decree ought to be affirmed with costs.

Decree affirmed.

PATTERSON v. THE UNITED STATES.

A verdict is bad if it varies from the issue in a substantial matter, or if it find only a part of that which is in issue; and, though the court may give form to a general finding, so as to make it harmonize with the issue, yet, if it appears that the finding is different from the issue, or is confined to a part only of the matter in issue, no judgment can be rendered upon the verdict.

In an action of debt, upon a bond to the United States, with condition that certain merchandise imported, and reshipped for exportation, should not be reloaded within the United States, and that the certificate and other proofs required by law, of the delivery of the same, without the limits of the United States, should be produced at the collector's office within one year from the date of the bond, an issue was formed upon the defendant's plea, that the merchandise was not reloaded, &c., and that the certificates and other proofs required by law, of the delivery of the same at Archangel, in Russia, were produced, &c., within one year from the date of the bond. The jury found a verdict that, "the within-mentioned writing obligatory is the deed of the within-named R. P., &c., and they find there is really and *justly due upon the [*222 said writing obligatory the sum of $23,000 58."

Wheat. 2.

Held, that the verdict was so defective no judgment could be rendered upon it.

A circuit court has no authority to issue a certiorari, or other compulsory process, to the District Court, for the removal of a cause from that jurisdiction, before a final judgment or decree is pronounced.

In such a case, the District Court may, and ought, to refuse obedience to the process of the Circuit Court, and either party may move the Circuit Court for a procedendo, after the transcript of the record is removed into that court, or may pursue the cause in the District Court as if it had not been removed.

But if the party, instead of properly taking advantage of the irregularity in the proceedings, enters his appearance in the Circuit Court, takes defense, and pleads to issue, it is too late, after verdict, to object to the irregularity, and the Supreme Court will, on error, consider the cause as an original suit in the Circuit Court.

THIS cause was argued by Ogden and Harper for the plaintiff in error, and by the Attorney-General and Glenn, for the United States. But as the points made were not considered by the court, and judgment was pronounced on other grounds, the argument is omitted.

WASHINGTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of debt instituted in the District Court of Maryland by the United States, against Robert Patterson, the plaintiff in error, upon a bond, dated the 2d of August, 1809, in the penalty of $35,000, with condition that certain merchandise, which had been imported into the United States, and which the said Patterson had then reshipped, in order to export the same to Tonningen, should not be relanded in any port or place within the United States, and that the certificate and other proofs required [223*] *by law of the delivery of the same, at some place without the limits of the United States, should be produced at the collector's office of the port of Baltimore, within one year from the date of the bond.

After the declaration was filed in the District Court, and the defendant had entered his appearance and taken defense, a writ of certiorari, issued from the Circuit to the District Court, in obedience to which the record of the proceedings in that court was certified and sent up to the Circuit Court. In this court the defendant again took defense, and after sundry imparlances, and having had oyer of the bond and condition, he pleads, 1st. Performance generally of the condition 2d. That the merchandise mentioned in the condition of the bond was not relanded in the United States, and that the certificate and other proofs required by law of the delivery of the same at Archangel, in Russia, were produced at the said collector's office within one year from the date of the said bond. 3d. That the said merchandise, or any part thereof, was not relanded in the United States, and that the certificates and other proofs required by law of the delivery of the same at Archangel, in Russia, were produced to the said collector's office on the 11th day of November, in the year 1811. The replication to the first plea alleges a breach of the condition of the bond in not producing to the said collector's office the certificate and other proofs required by law of the relanding in some place without the limits of the United States, within one year from the date of the said bond, to which a rejoinder was put in affirming that the certificate and other *proofs were produced at the said office within the said year, upon which an issue is tendered and joined. The same issue is formed upon the second plea, and to the third plea a general demurrer was put in.

The demurrer was, upon argument, sustained, and judgment was entered against the defendant for the penalty of the bond.

A jury was afterwards impaneled to try the issue who found the following verdict, viz.: "That the within-mentioned writing obligatory is the deed of the within-named Robert Patterson, &c., and they find there is really and justly due upon the said writing obligatory the sum of $23,989.58."

Upon this verdict the court gave judgment in favor of the United States, for $35,000, to be released on the payment of the above sum assessed by the jury, from which judgment a writ of error was obtained to remove the cause to this court.

The court considers it to be unnecessary to decide the questions which were argued at the bar, as the verdict is so defective that no judgment can be rendered upon it.

The issue which the jury were sworn to try was, whether the certificate and other proofs required by law, of the delivery of the cargo at some place without the limits of the United States, were produced at the collector's office at Baltimore within one year from the date of the bond. The verdict does not find the matter in issue one way or the other, but finds that the bond in the declaration mentioned is the deed of the defendant, and that there is justly due to the United States, upon the said bond, a certain sum of money. But whether the bond [225] was the deed of the defendant or not was not a matter in issue between the parties, and, consequently, it was a false conclusion to say that, because it was his deed, therefore he was indebted to the United States.

The rule of law is precise upon this point. A verdict is bad if it varies from the issue in a substantial matter, or if it find only a part of that which is in issue. The reason of the rule is obvious; it results from the nature and the end of the pleading. Whether the jury find a general or a special verdict, it is their duty to decide the very point in issue; and although the court in which the cause is tried may give form to a general finding, so as to make it harmonize with the issue, yet, if it appears to that court, or to the Appellate Court, that the finding is different from the issue, or is confined to a part only of the matter in issue, no judgment can be rendered upon the verdict.

It is true that if the jury find the issue and something more, the latter part of the finding will be rejected as surplusage; but this rule does not apply to a case where the facts found in the verdict are substantially variant from those which are in issue.

The court deems it proper to take some notice of the mode of proceeding, for removing this cause from the District to the Circuit Court. It is believed to be novel in the practice of the courts of the United States; and it certainly wants the authority of law to sanction it. There is no act of Congress which authorizes a Circuit Court to issue a compulsory process to the District Court, for the removal of a cause from 226] that jurisdiction, before a final judgment or decree is pronounced. The District Court, therefore, might, and ought to have refused obedience to the writ of certiorari issued in this case by the Circuit Court, and either party might have moved the circuit for a procedendo after the transcript of the record was removed into the Circuit Court, or might have pursued the cause in the District Court in like manner as if the record had not been removed.

But if, instead of taking advantage of this irregularity at a proper time, and in a proper manner, the defendant enters his appearance to the suit in the Circuit Court, takes defense, and pleads to issue, it is too late, after verdict, to object to the irregularity in the proceedings. This court will consider the suit as an original one in the Circuit Court, made so by the consent of parties. Had a new declaration been filed in the Circuit Court, no doubt could be entertained as to the correctness of this conclusion. And it is not going too far to consider the declaration sent from the District Court in the same light, after appearance, issue, and verdict. This is the opinion of the majority of the court.

The judgment is to be reversed, and a venire de novo to be issued by the Circuit Court.

Judgment affirmed.

THE PIZARRO

HIBBERSON and YONGE, Claimants.

If the court below deny an order for further proof when it ought to be granted, or allow it when it ought to be denied, and the objection is taken by the party, and appears on the record, the Appellate Court can administer the proper relief.

But, if evidence in the nature of further proof be introduced, and no formal order or objection appear on the record, it must be presumed to have been done by consent, and the irregularity is waived.

Concealment or spoliation of papers is not, per se, a sufficient ground for condemnation in a prize court. It is calculated to excite the vigilance and justify the suspicions of the court, but is open to explanation, and if the party, in the first instance fairly, frankly, and satisfactorily explains it, he is deprived of no right to which he is otherwise entitled. If, on the contrary, the spoliation is unexplained, or the explanation is unsatisfactory; if the cause labor under heavy suspicions or gross prevarications, further proof is denied, and condemnation ensues from defects in evidence which the party is not permitted to supply.

Under the Spanish treaty of 1795, stipulating that free ships shall make free goods, the want of such a sea-letter or passport, or such certificates as are described in the 17th article, is not a substantive ground of condemnation. It only authorizes capture and sending in for adjudication, and the proprietary interest in the ship may be proved by other equivalent testimony. But if, upon the original evidence the cause appears extremely doubtful and suspicious, and further proof is necessary, the grant or denial of it rests on the same general rules which govern the discretion of prize courts in other cases.

The term "subjects" in the 15th article, when applied to persons owing allegiance to Spain, must be construed in the same sense as the term "citizens," or "inhabitants," when applied to persons owing allegiance to the United States, and extends to all persons domiciled in the Spanish dominions.

*The Spanish character of the ship being [*228 ascertained, the proprietary interest of the cargo cannot be inquired into, unless so far as to ascertain that it does not belong to citizens of the United States, whose property, engaged in trade with the enemy, is not protected by the treaty.

A PPEAL from the Circuit Court of the District of Georgia.

The ship Pizarro, under Spanish colors, was captured on the 23d of July, 1814, by the private armed schooner Midas, Alexander Thompson, commander, on a voyage from Liverpool to Amelia Island, and brought into the port of Savannah for adjudication. Prize proceedings were instituted in the District Court of Georgia against the ship and cargo, and a claim was duly interposed by Messrs. Hibberson and Yonge, merchants, of Fernandina, Amelia Island, for the ship and cargo, as their sole and exclusive property. Upon the final hearing in the District Court, the ship and cargo were decreed to be restored, and this decree was, upon an appeal to the Circuit Court, affirmed; and from the decree of the Circuit Court the cause was brought by appeal to this court.

It appears from the evidence that during the voyage a package, containing papers respecting the cargo, directed to Messrs. Hibberson and Yonge, was thrown overboard by the advice and assent of the master and supercargo. The reason alleged for this proceeding is that they were then chased by a schooner, which they supposed to be a Carthaginian privateer. The ship's documents, however, were *retained [*229 ed, in which her Spanish character is distinctly asserted.

These documents were as follows: 1. A certificate of the Spanish consul at Liverpool, dated the 11th of September, 1813, certifying that the Pizarro was a Spanish ship, bound to Corunna. 2. A certificate from the same, of the same date, that Messrs. Hughes and Duncan had shipped 250 tons of salt on board the Pizarro for Corunna, consigned to Messrs. Hibberson & Yonge. 3. A certificate of health, dated at Fernandina, the 20th of December, 1813. 4. A letter from Messrs. Hibberson & Yonge, of the 10th January, 1814, to J. Walton, the navigator or sea pilot, ordering him to sail to Liverpool. 5. A bill of lading, signed by Martinez, the master, for the outward cargo. 6. The affidavit of Messrs. Hibberson & Yonge, that they had shipped the same cargo on their own account, consigned to Messrs. Hughes & Duncan, &c. 7. The shipping articles from Amelia Island to St. Augustine, or any other port in Europe, and back, dated the 11th of January, 1814. 8. Shipping articles from Liverpool to St. Augustine, and back to Liverpool, without a date. 9. A license from the Governor of East Florida, authorizing Messrs. Hibberson & Yonge to buy a vessel in the United States, and the copy of a bill of sale from Messrs. S. & W. Hale, of New Hampshire, by their agent Kimbell, dated the 24th of February, 1813, together with an order of the governor, of the 6th of March, 1813, naturalizing the ship, or permitting her to sail under Spanish colors.

*In the District Court, the cause was [*230 heard not merely upon the ship's papers, and the testimony of the master and supercargo (who were twice examined in open court), but the claimants were also permitted to introduce new proofs and testimony in support of their claim, without any order for further proof.

Winder, for the appellants and captors. 1. The proprietary interest in the claimants is not proved. 2. They are excluded from the benefit of further proof by the spoliation of papers. The court below made no order for further proof; yet it seems to have been admitted and considered by that court, and has crept into the transcript of the record. This was an irregularity which will be corrected by the appellate tribunal, since the case on the original evidence was free from doubt or difficulty, and condemnation ought to have ensued. The spoliation of papers is not satisfactorily accounted for by the master and supercargo, who have prevaricated in their examinations; and the spoliation being unexplained, inevitably leads to the exclusion of further proof, and, consequently, to condemnation. In the case of The Two Brothers,¹ spo-

2.—ARTICLE XV.—It shall be lawful for all and singular the subjects of His Catholic Majesty, and the citizens, people, and inhabitants of the said United States to sail with their ships, with all manner of liberty and security, no distinction being made who are the proprietors of the merchandises laden thereon, from any port to the places of those who now are, or hereafter shall be, at enmity with His Catholic Majesty or the United States. It shall be likewise lawful for the subjects and inhabitants aforesaid to sail with the ships and merchandises aforesaid, and to trade with the same liberty and security from the places, ports, and havens, of those who are enemies of both or either party, without any opposition or disturbance whatsoever, not only directly from the places of the enemy aforesaid, to neutral places but also from one place belonging to an enemy to another place belonging to an enemy, whether they be under the jurisdiction of the same prince or under several, and it is hereby stipulated that free ships shall also give freedom to goods, and that everything shall be deemed free and exempt which shall be found on board the ships belonging to the subjects of either of the contracting parties, although the whole lading, or any part thereof, should appertain to the enemies of either; contraband goods being always excepted. It is also agreed that the same liberty be extended to persons who are on board a free ship, so that although they be enemies to either party, they shall not be made prisoners or taken out of that free ship, unless they are soldiers, and in actual service of the enemies.

ARTICLE XVI.—This liberty of navigation and commerce shall extend to all kinds of merchandises, excepting those only which are distinguished by the name of contraband: and under this name of contraband, or prohibited goods, shall be comprehended arms, great guns, bombs, with the fuses and the other things belonging to them, cannon-ball, gunpowder, match, pikes, swords, lances, spears, halberds, mortars, petards, grenades, saltpetre, muskets, musket-ball, bucklers, helmets, breast-plates, coats of mail, and the like kinds of arms, proper for arming soldiers, musket rests, belts, horses with their furniture, and all other warlike instruments whatever. These merchandises which follow shall not be reckoned among contraband or prohibited goods; that is to say, all sorts of cloths, and all other manufactures woven of any wool, flax, silk, cotton, or any other materials whatever; all kinds of wearing apparel, together with liation of papers, not being avowed with sufficient frankness by the master, was held to destroy his credit; and the defect of proof thereby induced, together with other circumstances, was deemed a cause of condemnation. In the present case, all the documents relative [*231 to the cargo were thrown overboard, and the excuse is the same which was rejected by the English Court of Admiralty in The Rising Sun. Destroying the papers which might show the Spanish character of the cargo could not diminish the danger of capture by Carthaginian privateers, since the ship would still appear to be Spanish, and this, together with the want of documentary evidence as to the cargo, would involve both in the same fate. This explanation of the suppression of the papers is, therefore, weak and futile, and such as cannot relieve the parties from the imputation of mala fides. 3. The claimants contend that the cargo is exempt from confiscation by the Spanish treaty of 1795, which recognizes the rule that free ships make free goods.² But the term "subjects," in the 15th and 16th articles, must be un- [*232 derstood of subjects who owe a permanent allegiance to the crown of Spain, *not of [*233 mere domiciled merchants, such as the claimants. ARTICULO XV.—Se permitirá a todos y a cada uno de los súbditos de S. M. Católica, y a los ciudadanos pueblos y habitantes de dichos Estados, que puedan navegar con sus embarcaciones con toda libertad y seguridad, sin que haya la menor excepcion por este respecto, aunque los propietarios de las mercaderías cargadas en las referidas embarcaciones vengán del puerto que quierán, y las traygan destinadas a qualquiera plaza de una potencia actualmente enemiga o que lo sea despues, así de S. M. Católica como de los Estados Unidos. Se permitirá igualmente a los súbditos y habitantes mencionados navegar con sus buques y mercaderías, y frecuentar con igual libertad y seguridad las plazas y puertos de las potencias enemigas de las partes contratantes, o de una de ellas sin oposicion u obstáculo, y de comerciar no solo desde los puertos de dicho enemigo a un puerto neutro directamente, si no tambien desde uno enemigo a otro tal, bien se encuentre baxo su jurisdiccion, o baxo la de muchos; y se estipula tambien por el presente tratado que los buques libres asegurarán igualmente la libertad de las mercaderías, y que se juzgarán libres todos los efectos que se hallasen a bordo de los buques que perteneciesen a los súbditos de una de las partes contratantes, aun quando el cargamento por entero o prate de él fuese de los enemigos de una de las dos, bien entendido sin embargo que el contrabando se exceptua siempre. Se ha convenido así mismo que la propia libertad gozarán los sujetos que pudiesen encontrarse a bordo del buque libre, aun quando fuesen enemigos de una de las dos partes contratantes; y por lo tanto no se podrá hacerlos prisioneros ni separarlos de dichos buques a menos que no tengan la qualidad de militares, y esto hallandose en aquella sazon empleados en el servicio del enemigo.

ARTICULO XVI.—Esta libertad de navegacion y de comercio debe extenderse a toda especie de mercaderías exceptuando solo las que se comprenden baxo nombre de contrabando, o de mercaderías prohibidas, quales son las armas, canones, bombas con sus mechas, y demas cosas pertenecientes a lo mismo, balas, pólvora, mechas, picas, espadas, lanzas, dardos, alabardas, morteros, petardos, granadas, salitre, fusiles, balas, escudos, casquetes, corazas, cotas de malla, y otras armas de esta especie propias para armar a los soldados, portamosquetes, bándoleras, caballos con sus armas y otros instrumentos de guerra sean los que fueren. Pero los generos y mercaderías que se nombrarán ahora, no se comprenderán entre los de contrabando o cosas prohibidas, a saber: toda especie de paños y qualesquiera otras telas de lana, lino, seda, algodón, u otras qualesquiera materias, toda especie de vestidos con las telas de que se acostumbra hacer, el

So, also, in this case, the Spanish character of the ship cannot be established, because the claimants have forfeited the privilege of further proof by the misconduct of their own agents, and consequently cannot furnish the equivalent testimony required by the 17th article. The justifiable inference is, that the property in the ship and cargo belongs to the enemy, or to citizens of the United States trading

Even the total want of papers is not a substantive ground of condemnation: it may be explained, as Sir William Scott¹ observes in The Betsey, alluding to the ancient French law. 2. all species whereof they are used to be made; gold and silver, as well coined as uncoined, tin, iron, latten, copper, brass, coals; as also wheat, barley and oats, and any other kind of corn and pulse; tobacco, and likewise all manner of spices, salted and smoked flesh, salted fish, cheese and butter, beer, oils, wines, sugars, and all sorts of salts: and in general, all provisions which serve for the sustenance of life; furthermore, all kinds of cotton, hemp, flax, tar, pitch, ropes, cables, sails, sail-cloths, anchors, and any parts of anchors, also ships' masts, planks and wood of all kind, and all other things proper either for building or repairing ships, and all other goods whatever, which have not been worked into the form of any instrument prepared for war, by land or by sea, shall not be reputed contraband, much less, such as have been already wrought and made up for any other use; all which shall be wholly reckoned among free goods. As likewise all other merchandises and things which are not comprehended and particularly mentioned in the foregoing enumeration of contraband goods. So that they may be transported and carried in the freest manner by the subjects of both parties, even to places belonging to an enemy, such towns or places being only excepted as are at that time besieged, blocked up, or invested. And except the cases in which any ship of war or squadron shall, in consequence of storms or other accidents at sea, be under the necessity of taking the cargo of any trading vessel or vessels, in which case they may stop the said vessel or vessels, and furnish themselves with necessaries, giving a receipt, in order that the power to whom the said ship of war belongs, may pay for the articles so taken, according to the price thereof, at the port to which they may appear to have been destined by the ship's papers; and the two contracting parties engage, that the vessels shall not be detained longer than may be absolutely necessary for their said ships to supply themselves with necessaries: That they will immediately pay the value of the receipts, and indemnify the proprietor for all losses which he may have sustained in consequence of such transaction.

"ARTICLE XVII.—To the end that all manner of dissensions and quarrels may be avoided and prevented on one side and the other, it is agreed that in case either of the parties hereto should be engaged in a war, the ships and vessels belonging to the

which the agents of the owners acted is a proof that the latter did not participate in, nor can they be made penally responsible for, the misconduct of the former. 8. If the owner of the ship was a domiciled subject of Spain, the ship, and, consequently, the cargo, is entitled to protection under the treaty. Commercial domicile stamps a national character for every purpose in the view of a court of prize; and if the operation of the treaty were confined to Spanish subjects (properly so called), while it is extended to all persons inhabiting the United States, it would be unaccountably deficient in reciprocity. What fortifies the contrary construction is, that the term subjects is several times used indiscriminately in the treaty to signify the inhabitants of both countries. The purpose for which the documents prescribed by the treaty are required shows that a merely formal defect only authorizes detention and sending in for *adjudication, [*239 and if "equivalent testimony" is produced, restitution must follow, though the captors are exempt from costs and damages. Equivalent testimony is that which satisfactorily proves the same thing as that in which there was defective proof before; and the proof we have produced is testimony more than equivalent. The form of passport alluded to in the 17th article is not annexed to the treaty, nor is it to be found in the department of state. The Spaniards have relied on the good faith with which this country has always fulfilled its en-

Ademas toda especie de algodón, cánamo, lino, alquitran, pez, cuerdas, cables, velas, telas para velas, áncoras, y partes de que se componen. Mástiles, tablas, maderas de todas especies, y qualesquiera otras cosas que sirvan para la construcción y reparación de los buques, y otras qualesquiera materias que no tienen la forma de un instrumento preparado para la guerra por tierra ó por mar, no serán reputadas de contrabando, y menos las que están ya preparadas para otros usos. Todas las cosas que se acaban de nombrar deben ser comprendidas entre las mercaderías libres, lo mismo que todas las demas mercaderías y efectos que no están comprendidos y nombrados expresamente en la enumeración de los géneros de contrabando, de manera que podrán ser transportados y conducidos con la mayor libertad por los súbditos de las dos partes contratantes á las plazas enemigas, exceptuando sin embargo las que se hallasen en la actualidad sitiadas, bloqueadas, ó embestidas, y los casos en que algun buque de guerra ó esquadra que por efecto de avería, ú otras causas se halle en necesidad de tomar los efectos que conduzca el buque ó buques de comercio, pues en tal caso podrá detenerlos para aprovisionarse, y dar un recibo para que la potencia cuyo sea el buque que tome los efectos, los pague segun el valor que tendrían en el puerto adonde se dirigiese el propietario, segun lo expresen sus cartas de navegación; obligandose las dos partes contratantes á no detener los buques mas de lo que sea absolutamente necesario para aprovisionarse, pagar inmediatamente los recibos, é indemnizar todos los danos que sufra el propietario a consecuencia de semejante suceso.

"ARTICULO XVII.—A fin de evitar entre ambas partes toda especie de disputas y quejas, se ha convenido que en el caso de que una de las dos potencias se hallase empenada en una guerra, los buques y bastimentos pertenecientes á los súbditos ó pue-gagements; they have neglected the form, and relied on the spirit of the stipulation. The papers produced are, therefore, equivalent to a formal passport; and there is no rule by which they can be excluded as there was no attending circumstance of fraud in the destruction of the original documents, and, consequently, the case is unaffected by that mala fides which precludes explanation from extrinsic testimony.

STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court, and after stating the facts, proceeded as follows:

A preliminary objection has been taken in the argument at bar to the regularity of the proceedings in this cause, and it is urged with great earnestness and force that the further proof was not admissible except under an explicit order of the court for this purpose; and that the conduct of the master and supercargo in the suppression of the documents of the cargo, and in prevaricating in their examination, [240*] has *justly forfeited the claim which the owners might otherwise have to introduce the further proof.

The proceedings in the District Court were certainly very irregular; and this court cannot but regret that so many deviations from the correct prize practice should have occurred at so late a period of the war. The ship's papers ought to have been brought into court, and verified, on oath, by the captors, and the examinations of the captured crew ought to have been taken upon the standing interrogatories, and not circa voce in open court. Nor should the captured crew have been permitted to be re-examined in court. They are bound to declare the whole truth upon their first examination; and if they then fraudulently suppress any material facts, they ought not to be indulged with an opportunity to disclose what they please, or to give color to their former statements after counsel has been taken, and they know the pressure of the cause. Public policy and justice equally point out the necessity of an inflexible adherence to this rule.

It is upon the ship's papers, and the examinations thus taken in preparatory, that the cause ought, in the first instance, to be heard in the District Court; and upon such hearing it is to judge whether the cause be of such doubt as to require further proof; and if so, whether the claimant has entitled himself to the benefit of introducing it. If the court should deny such order when it ought to be granted, or allow it when it ought to be denied, and the objection be taken by the party and appear upon the record, the Appellate Court can administer the proper relief. *If, however, evidence [*241 in the nature of further proof be introduced, and no formal order or objection appear on the record, it must be presumed to have been done by consent of parties, and the irregularity is completely waived. In the present case, no exception was taken to the proceedings or evidence in the District Court; and we should not, therefore, incline to reject the further proof, even subjects or people of the other party must be furnished with sea-letters or passports, expressing the name, property, and bulk of the ship, as also the name and place of habitation of the master or commander of the said ship, that it may appear thereby that the ship really and truly belongs to the subjects of one of the parties, which passport shall be made out and granted according to the form annexed to this treaty. They shall likewise be recalled every year, that is, if the ship happens to return home within the space of a year.

"It is likewise agreed, that such ships being laden, are to be provided not only with passports as above mentioned, but also with certificates, containing the several particulars of the cargo, the place whence the ship sailed, that so it may be known whether any forbidden or contraband goods be on board the same; which certificates shall be made out by the officers of the place whence the ship sailed, in the accustomed form. And if anyone shall think it fit or advisable to express in the said certificates the person to whom the goods on board belong, he may freely do so. Without which requisites they may be sent to one of the ports of the other contracting party, and adjudged by the competent tribunal, according to what is above set forth, that all the circumstances of this omission having been well examined, they shall be adjudged to be legal prizes, unless they shall give legal satisfaction of their property by testimony entirely equivalent.

"ARTICLE XVIII.—If the ships of the said subjects, people, or inhabitants, of either of the parties, shall be met with, either sailing along the coasts or on the high seas, by any ship of war of the other, or by any privateer, the said ship of war or privateer, for the avoiding of any disorder, shall remain out of cannonshot, and may send their boats aboard the merchant ship, which they shall so meet with, and may enter her to number of two or three men only, to whom the master or commander of such ship or vessel shall exhibit his passports, concerning the property of the ship, made out according to the form inserted in this present treaty, and the ship when she shall have showed such passport, shall be free and at liberty to pursue her voyage, so as it shall not be lawful to molest or give her chase in any manner, or force her to quit her intended course."

Todos los años deberán renovarse estos pasaportes en el caso de que el buque vuelva á su país en el espacio de un año.

"Igualmente se ha convenido en que los buques mencionados arriba, si estuviesen cargados, deberán llevar no solo los pasaportes sino tambien certificados que contengan el pormenor del cargamento, el lugar de donde ha salido el buque, y la declaración de las mercaderías de contrabando que pudiesen hallarse a bordo, cuyos certificados feberán expedirse en la forma acostumbrada por los oficiales empleados en el lugar de donde el navio se hiciese á la vela, y si se juzgase útil y prudente expresar en dichos pasaportes la persona propietaria de las mercaderías se podrá hacer libremente, sin cuyos requisitos sera conducido a uno de los puertos de la potencia respectiva, á juzgado por el tribunal competente, con arreglo á lo arriba dicho, para que examinadas bien las circunstancias de su falta, sea condenado por de buena presa si no satisficiese legalmente con los testimonios equivalentes en un todo.

"ARTICULO XVIII.—Quando un buque perteneciente á los dichos súbditos pueblos y habitantes de una de las dos partes fuese encontrado navegando a lo largo de la costa ó en plena mar por un buque de guerra de la otra ó por un corsario, dicho buque de guerra ó corsario, á fin de evitar todo desórden, se mantendrá fuera del tiro de canon, y podrá enviar su chalupa á bordo del buque mercante, hacer entrar en él dos ó tres hombres á los quales enseñará el patron ó comandante del buque su pasaporte y demas documentos, que deberán ser conformes á lo prevenido en el presente tratado, y probará la propiedad del buque, y despues de haber exhibido semejante pasaporte y documentos, se les dexará seguir libremente su viage, sin que les sea licito el molestarle ni procurar de modo alguno darle caza, ú obligarle á dexar el rumbo que seguia."

if we were of opinion that it ought not, in strictness, to have been admitted.

The objection which is urged against the admission of the further proof would, under other circumstances, deserve great consideration. Concealment, or even spoliation of papers, is not of itself a sufficient ground for condemnation in a prize court. It is, undoubtedly, a very awakening circumstance, calculated to excite the vigilance and justify the suspicions of the court. But it is a circumstance open to explanation, for it may have arisen from accident, necessity, or superior force; and if the party in the first instance fairly and frankly explains it to the satisfaction of the court, it deprives him of no right to which he is otherwise entitled. If, on the other hand, the spoliation be unexplained, or the explanation appear weak and futile; if the cause labor under heavy suspicions, or there be a vehement presumption of bad faith or gross prevarication, it is made the ground of a denial of further proof, and condemnation ensues from defects in the evidence which the party is not permitted to supply.

In the present case there can be no doubt that there has been a gross prevarication and 242 suppression of testimony by the master and supercargo. Nothing can be more loose and unsatisfactory than their first examinations; and the new and circumstantial details given upon their second examinations are inconsistent with the notion of perfect good faith in the first instance. The excuse, too, for throwing the packet of papers overboard is certainly not easily to be credited; for the ship's documents which still remained on board would, in the view of a Carthaginian privateer, have completely established a Spanish character. It is not, indeed, very easy to assign an adequate motive for the destruction of the papers. If the ship was Spanish, it was, as to American cruisers, immaterial to whom the cargo belonged; for, by our treaty with Spain (treaty of 1795, art. 15), declaring that free ships shall make free goods, the property of an enemy on board of such a ship is just as much protected from capture as if it were neutral. The utmost, therefore, that this extraordinary conduct can justify on the part of the court is to institute a more rigid scrutiny into the character of the ship itself. If her national Spanish character be satisfactorily made out in evidence, the spoliation of the documentary proofs of the cargo will present no insuperable bar to a restitution. Very different would be the conclusion if the case stood upon the ground of the law of nations, unaffected by the stipulations of a treaty.¹

*Upon a full examination of the evidence we are of opinion that the Spanish character of the ship is entirely sustained, and, therefore, the claimants are entitled to a decree of restitution. Two objections have been urged against this conclusion: 1. That the ship is not documented according to the requisitions of the treaty with Spain, and, therefore, not within the protection of that treaty. 2. That it does not appear that Mr. 244 Hibberson (who is a native of Great Britain) has ever been naturalized in the dominions of Spain, and therefore he is not a subject of Spain, within the meaning of the treaty.

As to the first objection, it is certainly true that the ship was not furnished with such a scalletter, or passport, or such certificates as are described in the 17th article of the treaty. But the want of such documents is no substantive ground for condemnation. It only justifies the capture, and authorizes the captors to send the ship into a proper port for adjudication. The treaty expressly declares that when ships shall be found without such requisites they may be sent into port, and adjudged by the competent tribunal; and "that all the circumstances of this omission having been well examined, they shall be adjudged to be legal prizes, unless they shall give legal satisfaction of their property by testimony entirely equivalent." It is apparent, from this language, that the omission to comply with the requisites of the treaty was not intended to be fatal to the property. And, certainly, by the general law of nations, as well as by the particular stipulations of the

1.—By the ancient French law, spoliation of papers was a substantive ground of condemnation. Thus, by the ordinances of 1543, art. 43, and of 1584, art. 70, the throwing overboard of the charter-party, or other papers respecting the lading of the vessel, is declared cause of condemnation. And by the ordinance of August, 1681, Des Prises, art. 6, all vessels, on board of which no charter-party, bills of lading, or invoices are to be found, are, together with their cargoes, declared good prize. Doubts having arisen as to the application of this rule of evidence, in cases where sufficient papers were found remaining on board to furnish proof of the proprietary interest, the ordinance of the 5th Sept., 1708, was rendered; by which it was provided, that every captured vessel, from which papers have been thrown overboard, shall be good prize, together with the cargo, upon proof of this fact alone, without its being necessary to examine into the nature of the papers destroyed, nor to inquire whether sufficient papers were found remaining on board to furnish evidence that the ship and the goods of her lading belonged to allies or friends. But this decision appearing too vigorous in practice, Louis XIV., in a rescript of the 2d February, 1710, addressed to the Admiral of France, directed the council of prizes to apply the terms of this ordinance according to the peculiar circumstances, and the subsidiary proofs in each case. Valin is of the opinion that, though this rescript escaped the attention of the framers of the regulation of the 21st October, 1744, (the 6th article of which is entirely conformable to the ordinance of the 5th September, 1708,) yet it ought to be applied to temper the rigor of this article, according to circumstances. Valin, sur l'Ordonnance, Ib. And, according to the authority of a celebrated modern jurist of France, such regulations should always be tempered by wisdom and equity; they are improperly styled laws; and are essentially variable pro temporibus et causis. He cites in confirmation of his opinion, that even the want or suppression of papers is not conclusive, a sentence of the council of prizes of the 27th December, 1779, restoring the captured vessel, notwithstanding some papers had been thrown overboard, it being proved that the papers were not of such a nature as to show the property enemy's, and the master not being accessory to the spoliation. See the opinions of M. Portalis, in the cases of the Pigou and the Statira, 1 Cranch, 99, note, a. Ib. 104, note, a. The Spanish law as to spoliation, is conformable with that of France, and its application to the above case would probably have been urged by the counsel for the captors, upon the principle of reciprocity, had they not been precluded from resorting to that argument by a former decision of the court, in the case of the Nereide, 9 Cranch, 388; a majority of the judges being of opinion that the principle of reciprocity or amicable retaliation formed no rule of judicial decision in the courts of this country, until it was prescribed as such by the legislative will. Id. 422.

treaty, the parties would be at liberty to give further explanations of their conduct, and to make other proofs of their property. If, indeed, upon the original evidence, the cause should appear extremely doubtful or suspicious, and further proof should be necessary, the grant or denial of it would rest upon the same general principles which govern the discretion of prize courts in other cases. But in the present case there is no necessity for such further proof, since the documents and testimony now before us are, in our opinion, as to the proprietary interest in the ship, entirely equivalent to the passports and sea-letter required by the treaty.

As to the second objection, it assumes, as its basis, that the term "subjects," as used in the treaty, applies only to persons who, by birth or naturalization, owe a permanent allegiance to the Spanish government. It is, in our opinion, very clear that such is not the true interpretation of the language. The provisions of the treaty are manifestly designed to give reciprocal and co-extensive privileges to both countries; and to effectuate this object, the term "subjects," when applied to persons owing allegiance to Spain, must be construed in the same sense as the term "citizens," or "inhabitants," when applied to persons owing allegiance to the United States. What demonstrates the entire propriety of this construction [*246] is, that in the 18th article of the treaty, the terms "subjects," "people," and "inhabitants," are indiscriminately used as synonymous, to designate the same persons in both countries, and in cases obviously within the scope of the preceding articles. Indeed, in the language of the law of nations, which is always to be consulted in the interpretation of treaties, a person domiciled in a country, and enjoying the protection of its sovereign, is deemed a subject of that country. He owes allegiance to the country, while he resides in it; temporary, indeed, if he has not, by birth or naturalization, contracted a permanent allegiance; but so fixed that, as to all other nations, he follows the character of that country,

1.—It is obvious that the privilege of the neutral flag of protecting enemy's property, whether conferred by treaty or by the ordinances of belligerent powers, cannot extend to a fraudulent use of the flag to cover enemy's property in the ship as well as the cargo. The Minerva, 1 Marriott's Adm. Dec. 235; The Citadelle de Lisdoa, 6 Rob. 358; The Eendracht, 1b. note a. During the war of the American revolution the United States, recognizing the principles of the armed neutrality, exempted by an ordinance of Congress all neutral vessels from capture, except such as were employed in carrying contraband goods, or soldiers, to the enemy; it was held that this exemption did not extend to a vessel which had been guilty of grossly unneutral conduct, in taking a decided part with the enemy, by combining with his subjects to wrest out of the hands of the United States and of France the advantages they had acquired over Great Britain, by the rights of war in the conquest of Dominica. By the capitulation of that island, all commercial intercourse with Great Britain was interdicted. In the case in question the vessel was purchased by neutrals in London, who supplied her with false and colorable papers, and assumed on themselves the ownership of the cargo, for a voyage from London to Dominica. The continental Court of Appeals, in pronouncing the vessel and cargo liable to condemnation, observed: "Had she been employed in a fair commerce, such as was consistent with the rights of neutrality, her cargo, though the property of an enemy, could not be in war as well as in peace. The mischiefs of a different construction would be very great; for it might then be contended that ships owned by Spanish subjects could be protected by the treaty, although they were domiciled in a foreign country, with which we were at war; and yet the law of nations would, in such a predicament, pronounce them enemies. We should, therefore, have no hesitation in overruling this objection, even if it were proved that Mr. Hibberson was not a naturalized subject of Spain; but we think the presumption very strong that he had become, in the strictest sense of the words, a Spanish subject.

The Spanish character of the ship being ascertained, it is unnecessary to inquire into the proprietary interest of the cargo, unless so far as to ascertain that it does not belong to citizens of the United States; for the treaty would certainly not protect the property of American citizens trading with the enemy *in [*247 Spanish ships. There is no presumption, from the evidence, that any American interest is concerned in the shipment. The whole property belonged either to British subjects or to the claimants, and we think the proofs in the cause very strongly establish it to belong as claimed.

The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed with costs.

THE UNITED STATES v. TENBROEK.

The act of Congress of the 24th of July, 1813, imposing a duty, according to the capacity of the still, on all stills employed in distilling spirits from domestic or foreign materials, and inflicting a penalty of $100, and double duties, for using any still or stills, or other implements in distilling spirituous liquors without first obtaining a license, as required by the act, does not extend to the rectification or purification of spirits already distilled.

prize; because Congress had said by their ordinance, that the rights of neutrality should extend protection *to such effects and goods of an [*248 enemy. But if the neutrality were violated, Congress have not said that such a violated neutrality shall give such protection; nor could they have said so without confounding all the distinctions between right and wrong." The Eastern, 2 Dall. 36. The only treaties now subsisting between the United States and foreign powers, containing the stipulation that free ships shall make free goods, are the above treaty with Spain, that of 1782 with the Netherlands (which, it is presumed, still subsists, notwithstanding the changes in the political situation of that country), and the treaties with the Barbary states. The conventions between the latter and Christian powers always contain the stipulation that the flag and pass shall protect the cargo sailing under it. In the memorable case of The Nereide (9 Cranch, 388), it was contended by the counsel for the captors that this stipulation in the Spanish treaty, taken in connection with the law of Spain, necessarily implied the converse proposition that enemy's ships make enemy's goods, which is not expressed in the treaty. But this argument was overruled by the court, who held that the treaty did not contain, either expressly or by implication, a stipulation that enemy's ships shall make enemy's goods. Id. 418; see Ward on the Relative Rights and Duties of Belligerent and Neutral powers, 145.

249*] ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Pennsylvania.

This was an action of debt commenced in the District Court in Pennsylvania, by the United States against the defendant in error, to recover a penalty alleged to have been incurred for using a still, and distilling spirituous liquors, without having a license therefor, as required by an act of Congress passed on the 24th of July, 1813.

This act imposes a duty, according to the capacity of the still, on all stills employed in distilling spirits from domestic or foreign materials, and inflicts a penalty of $100, and double duties, on all persons who, after the first day of January then ensuing, should use any still, or stills, or other implements, in distilling spirituous liquors, without having first obtained a license, as required by the provisions of the act. For every license the act imposes a duty of nine cents for each gallon of the capacity of the still employed in distilling spirits from domestic materials for the term of two weeks, and in proportion for a longer period. And, on all stills employed in distilling spirits from foreign materials, a duty of 25 cents for each gallon of the capacity of the still for the time of one month.

To the declaration, which was in the usual form, the defendant, in proper person, plead nil debet, on which issue was joined. It was proved on the trial, and admitted by the defendant, that he was the proprietor of a distillery within the District of Pennsylvania, which he used, and for which he had not taken out a license, agreeably to the act of Congress 250*] before recited. It was also proved, on the part of the defendant, that his distillery was not used in distilling spirits from domestic materials, but in rectifying the said spirits after they had been distilled from domestic materials; that he is not a distiller, but a rectifier of spirits. He contended that distillation and rectification of spirits are distinct vocations; that rectifying such spirits is not a part of the process of distillation, but a mere purification of the spirits themselves from feculent or useless matter; and that he was not liable to the penalty of the act of Congress. The attorney for the United States contended, that rectification of spirits in a distillery is nothing more than distillation repeated, and in this repetition the spirits must be deemed, and in fact are, domestic materials.

The court charged the jury that the act of Congress, laying duties on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors, did not apply unless when the still is used for the purpose of distilling spirits from domestic or foreign materials; and that if the still, or other implement, be not employed in distilling spirits from domestic or foreign materials, there can be no penalty incurred for using a still for any other purpose, although no license be taken out; and that spirits cannot be considered as a domestic material. That penal laws must be construed strictly, and must not be amplified by intendment. That whether rectification be part of the process of distillation, was a fact to be left to the jury. The counsel for the United States excepted to this charge. There was a verdict and judgment for the defendant.

251*] The cause was removed by writ of error to the Circuit Court, when the judgment of the District Court was affirmed with costs.

It was brought before this court by writ of error, and submitted on the observations of the Attorney-General.

The Attorney-General now contended, for the United States, that the district judge ought not to have permitted witnesses to be examined. It was no case for the application of the maxim, quilibet in sua arte credendum est. If the witnesses knew nothing of the subject, their testimony could not enlighten others. If they did, it was plain that their knowledge was derived from being engaged in the same line of business, which gave them an interest in the construction of the law. In the case of the Cast-Plate Glass Company,¹ Chief Baron Eyre declares that in explaining an act of Parliament no evidence should be admitted; for that would be to make it a question of fact in place of a question of law. The judge alone must direct the jury on the point of law. In doing this, he must form his judgment of the meaning of the legislature, in the same manner as if the case had come before him by demurrer, where no evidence can be allowed. On demurrer, a judge may well inform himself, from dictionaries or books, on the particular subject concerning the meaning of any word. Yet, if he does so at Nisi Prius*, and shows [252 them to the jury, they are not to be considered as evidence, but only as the grounds on which he has formed his opinion, in the same manner as if he were to cite authorities for the point of law he lays down. The single question in the present case was, whether a person using a still for the purpose of rectifying spirits is within its true meaning. It is necessary to remark that the duty under this act was not upon the quantity of liquor distilled nor upon its removal. This, indeed, had been the case with some parts, and at other times, with this part of our excise system. But under the present act, the duty was upon the implement or still itself. To speak the language of the debates, it was upon the capacity, not the gallon; a distinction materially relevant to a right understanding of the point in controversy. By the first section of the act, a license is required to be taken out for all stills used for the purpose of distilling spirituous liquors. No exception is made as to any particular kind of still. The term spirituous liquors is so comprehensive that it must necessarily include all liquors that contain spirits, without any reference to the proportion or quantity which they may contain. By the second section, a certain amount of duty is laid on stills employed in distilling spirits from domestic materials, and a different amount on those that work on foreign materials. It is evident that no intention existed to define what was meant by materials, but barely to discriminate between foreign and domestic, with a view to make the duty lighter on spirits produced from the* latter than on the [253 former, according to the common policy of our legislation. Two points will be made for the United States: 1. That spirits are the materials upon which rectification operates. 2. That rectification is a branch of the process of distilling. The first point is so plain that the defendant himself must admit it. The second alone opens a door to argument. The question lies out of the ordinary track of legal discussion. To understand it, we must have recourse to books of art. It is these which will best fix the true meaning of the terms distillation and rectification. We shall then be enabled to determine, if there be any, the difference between them. Doctor Black, in his elements of chemistry, after speaking of fermentation, says: "The spirit is separated more or less perfectly from these substances by distillation, it being more volatile than most of them, especially the acid, mucilaginous and coloring matter. The water is but imperfectly separated at first, on account of the small difference of volatility between it and the spirit. To reduce the spirit to a state of purity, we must perform several other operations, such as distilling it again once or twice with a gentle heat, which is called rectifying. By this we separate the greater part of the water which had come over in the first distillation."¹ Fourcroy, in his elements,² defines rectification to be "a second distillation, in which substances are purified, by their most volatile parts being raised by heat carefully 254*] managed. The Attorney-General next referred to Hall's distiller (which, he said, was agreed to be a very accurate work upon this subject), and to the Encyclopedia, where the definitions were substantially the same as in Black and Fourcroy. Even the common dictionaries of the language, he said, defined rectification to be the act of "improving by repeated distillations." The point appearing to stand thus upon the score of authority, it was next to be inquired how it stood upon that of reason. The duty, as the law so plainly makes known, is laid, in the broadest manner, upon all stills used for distilling spirituous liquors. It is neither graduated by the strength of the spirits produced nor by the simplicity or complexity of the manufacture. The first process in distillation is understood to be that in which the wash is put into the still. From this low wines are drawn, or spirits of an inferior quality. From a case in Anstruther, 558, it would seem that in England the first duty attaches on the wash before distillation. For a still employed in the first process, it was on all hands admitted that a license must be taken out. The inferior spirits so drawn do not constitute marketable spirits. A second process is then used. This consists, for the most part, in putting them into a smaller still called a doubler. From the doubler they come out, having the quality of common marketable spirits. A license ought surely to be taken out for a still so employed, call it a doubler or by any other name. But the original matter, or material, is here clearly out of view, for it went into the first still. Nothing but the spirits extracted from it were carried over 255] to the doubler. Does not this, then, establish the point that inferior spirits may become domestic materials under the act? It cannot, with any show of reason, be pretended that they have lost the properties of matter merely by being separated from substances with which they were primarily combined. Between the derivatives of matter and materials it would be strange indeed to attempt any distinction, as applicable to the case under consideration. The spirits extracted by the doubler are understood to be generally about proof. For various purposes it is necessary to increase their strength. This is effected by a third or fourth distillation generally, though not necessarily, in the same stills. By this process, not only is the strength raised, but the purity is increased. Now, in what, may it be asked, does this operation differ from the second process in the doubler? Spirits of an inferior strength are the materials of distillation in the one case and in the other. The last, and any similar subsequent operations, may be called rectifications. But they are distillations, too. They impart to the spirits more strength as well as more purity. It is just so with the second process in the doubler. It may, perhaps, be said, that these subsequent processes are all carried on by the rectifier, on spirits previously distilled. That it is done merely to fit them for combination with other materials of which mixtures are made by persons not distillers, and that in such process extraneous matter is often introduced with a view to greater purity. To this it may be answered, first, that these processes in nowise destroy the *character of distillation, as they do not [*256 necessarily prevent an augmentation in the strength of spirits; and, secondly, that the introduction of extraneous matter is not confined to the higher process of distillation, as water, charcoal, and other ingredients, are not unfrequently used in the process by which low wines are converted into proof spirits. Suppose a patent to be taken out for carrying on the original process as well as rectification in the same still, how can the duty be made to attach even in the case of the doubler, except on the hypothesis assumed for the United States? It would be difficult, if not impracticable, to fall upon any other mode. Again, the duty on stills is properly considered as a commutation for that which might have been laid upon the liquor. Is it not, therefore, as just that the duty should be paid upon the still when used to produce rectified spirits as when it is used to produce any other kind of spirits? The English statutes in pari materia will be found to countenance the doctrine contended for on the part of the United States; particularly that of 2 Geo. III., ch. 5, from the twelfth section of which it appears that the rectifier who distills spirits and the common distiller are considered the same. Several of the other sections would also show that rectification and distillation, when an increase of strength was the object, were used as equivalent terms. The system, in England, contemplated the laying of a duty first on the low wines, and then on the spirits distilled from them. So Congress, with like equity, may have intended to impose *a duty first upon the still when used [*257 in the original manufacture of spirits, and again on its use in the manufacture of spirits of a higher proof. So far is such a principle from being at all repugnant to the general theory of American taxation, that it is sanctioned by the whole analogy of our impost revenue. Thus, under the present tariff, iron in bars, iron in sheets, and iron in bolts, is each charged with a different duty. Leather in different forms, as in boots, saddles, caps, slippers, pays differently. The duty levied upon imported spirits is graduated according to the degree of proof. Brown sugars, white sugars, lump sugars, powdered sugars, are all subject to different rates. Tobacco, under its different forms of manufacture, is chargeable with different duties, and the list might easily, if it were necessary, be extended. Other nations have refined somewhat more upon the principle. Mr. Brougham, in his Colonial Policy, mentions that there was once a particular sauce for fish used in Holland which was made to pay no less than thirty different duties of excise; a provident decree against the luxury of the palate, among a people as renowned for frugality as riches. Yet it may be that this sauce was a less noxious superfluity than the liquor of the still. Revenue laws are to be construed and applied with great exactness. They are framed for the security of great national interests, and the effect of such laws, founded on considerations of public policy, is not to be weakened by a minute tenderness to hardships, real or supposed, in particular instances. It is also a good rule, where doubts exist in a revenue case, to lean in favor of the revenue.¹

DUVALL, J., delivered the opinion of the court, and after stating the facts, proceeded as follows:

The court, in considering this question, must be governed by the language of the act of Congress of the 24th July, 1813. By this act a specific duty is laid on licenses to stills employed in distilling spirituous liquors from domestic or foreign materials, and a penalty is inflicted for distilling without a license.

The distillation of spirituous liquors is performed by a double process: by the application of heat to a still containing the material. The product of the first process, after running through the still, is commonly called low wines, or singlings; the low wines undergo a second process of distillation, by which spirits are produced; they are to be proof of the first, second, third, or fourth degree, as defined and required by law. These are marketable, and here the process ends. The material from which the spirits are extracted appears to be the object of the law. The rectification or purification of spirits, after their distillation has been complete, in order to fit them for certain purposes of combination with other materials, is no part of the process of distillation, and is not a breach of the provisions of the act of Congress. The distillation of spirits, and the rectification of them after they are distilled, appear to be distinct and separate acts. No duty is specifically laid by law on the rectification of spirits, nor does it appear that any was contemplated; and, if the process is confined to the rectification of spirits already distilled, no penalty is incurred, although a license is not previously obtained. It was evidently the intention of the legislature to exact one duty only on the distillation of spirits.

It is the opinion of this court that there is no error in the judgment of the Circuit Court.

This opinion is given on the request of the Attorney-General, it being probable that the same question may frequently occur. But, as this cause is improperly brought before this court by writ of error, having been first carried from the District to the Circuit Court by the same process, it is dismissed.²

Writ of error dismissed.

J. C. F. CHIRAC

v.

THE LESSEE OF A. F. CHIRAC ET AL.

J. B. C., a native of France, migrated into the United States in 1783, and became domiciled in Maryland. On the 22d September, 1795, he took the oaths of citizenship according to an act of Assembly of Maryland, passed in 1779, and the next day received a conveyance in fee of lands in that state. On the 6th July, 1798, he was naturalized under the laws of the United States; and, in July, 1799, died intestate, leaving no legitimate relations, other than the plaintiffs in ejectment, who were natives and residents of France. Upon the supposition that the lands were escheatable, the state of Maryland conveyed them to his natural son, J. C. F. C., with a saving of the rights of all persons claiming by devise or descent from the intestate; under which grant J. C. F. C. took possession of the lands, and remained in possession until the ejectment was brought. In March, 1809, the defendants in error, the heirs at law of J. B. C., French subjects, brought an action of ejectment for the lands in question; and, in May, 1815, obtained a verdict in their favor, and a judgment thereon, which was affirmed.

It was held that the power of naturalization is exclusively in Congress, but that the treaty of amity and commerce between the United States and France, of 1778, art. 11, enabled the subjects of France to purchase and hold lands in the United States.

Quære. What was the effect of this treaty under the confederation?

J. B. C. having died, seized in fee of the lands in question, his heirs being French subjects, the treaty of 1778 having been abrogated and the act of Maryland of 1789, permitting the lands of a French subject, who had become a citizen of Maryland, dying intestate, to descend on the next of kin being non-naturalized Frenchmen, with a proviso vesting the land in the state, if the French heirs should not, within ten years, become resident citizens of the state, or convey the lands to a citizen: it was determined, that the time for the performance of this condition having expired before the action was brought, the estate was terminated, unless supported in some other manner than by the act of Maryland.

But the convention of 1800, between the United States and France, enabling the people of one country holding lands in the other to dispose of the same by testament, or otherwise, and to inherit lands in the respective countries without being obliged to obtain letters of naturalization, it was held that it rendered the performance of this condition a useless formality, and that the conventional rule applied equally to the case of those who took by descent, under the act, as to those who acquired by purchase, without its aid.

The further stipulation in the convention "that in case the laws of either of the two states should restrain strangers from the exercise of the rights of property with respect to real estate, such real estate may be sold, or otherwise disposed of, to citizens or inhabitants of the country where it may be," was held not to affect the rights of a French subject who takes, or holds, by the convention, so as to deprive him of the power of selling to citizens of this country; and was held to give to a French subject, who had acquired lands by descent, or devise (and, perhaps, in any other manner), the right, during life, to sell, or otherwise dispose thereof, if lying in a state where lands purchased by an alien, generally, would be immediately escheatable.

Although the convention of 1800 has expired by its own limitation, it was determined that the instant the descent was cast on a French subject during its continuance his rights became complete under it, and could not be affected by its subsequent expiration.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland.

John Baptiste Chirac, a native of France, migrated into the United States in the year 1798, and settled in Maryland. On the 22d of September, 1795, he took the oaths of citizenship, according to the form prescribed by an act of Assembly of the state of Maryland, passed in the year 1779, and the next day received a conveyance in fee of land lying within that state.

On the 6th of July, 1798, he was naturalized as prescribed by the laws of the United States; and, in July, 1799, he died intestate, leaving no legitimate relations other than the plaintiffs, who are natives and residents of France.

Supposing the lands of which he died seized to be escheatable, the state of Maryland conveyed them to John Charles Francis Chirac, his natural son, with a saving of the rights of all persons claiming by devise or descent from the intestate. Under this act, John Charles Francis Chirac took possession of the land of his father, and has remained in possession ever since.

262*] *In March, 1809, the defendants in error, who are the heirs at law of John Baptiste Chirac, and subjects of the King of France, brought their ejectment for the land of which their ancestor died seized; and in May, 1815, under the instruction of the court, to which exceptions were taken, obtained a verdict in their favor, on which a judgment was rendered; which judgment is now before the court on a writ of error.

The act of Assembly of the state of Maryland, on the construction of which the cause mainly turned, was passed in 1780, and is entitled "An act to declare and ascertain the privileges of the subjects of France residing within this state." The 1st section gives to French subjects the capacity of holding lands within the state, on certain conditions. The 2d section gives to those subjects who may be resident in the state all the rights of free citizens thereof. The 3d section contains a proviso restricting and limiting the privileges granted by the act, and declaring that nothing therein contained "shall be construed: grant to those who shall continue subjects of His Most Christian Majesty, and not qualify themselves as citizens of this state, any right to purchase or hold lands, or real estate, but for their respective lives, or for years." The 4th section enacts, that if any French subject who shall become a citizen of Maryland "shall die intestate, the natural kindred of such decedent, whether residing in France or elsewhere, shall inherit his or her real estate, in like manner as if such decedent and his kindred were the citizens of this state," with 263*] a proviso, that *whenever any French subject shall, by virtue of the act, become seized in fee of any real estate, his or her estate, "after the term of ten years be expired, shall vest in the state, unless the person seized of the same shall, within that time, either come and settle in, and become a citizen of this state, or enfeoff thereof, some citizen of this or some other of the United States of America."

Harper, for the plaintiff in error, and the defendant in the court below. 1. The act of Congress abrogating the French treaties, in consequence of the non-fulfillment of their stipulations by France, and the second article of the convention of 1800, stipulating for further negotiation respecting the claims of the United States for indemnities, and respecting the revival of the treaties, drew after them a virtual repeal of the act of Maryland of 1780, that act being founded on the reciprocity stipulated by the treaties. The intervention of the local legislatures was deemed necessary to carry into effect treaties made by the national government under the confederation. The legislature of Maryland understood it to have been so, for their act is not a literal transcript of the treaty of 1778; it limits and controls the reciprocity stipulated by the treaty. As nobody at that period could conceive the possibility that we should ever cease to maintain the relations of friendship and alliance with France, no time for the duration of the act was limited; but when the treaty was annulled the act fell with it. Consequently, the heirs of John Baptiste Chirac had no *inheritable quality. 2. [264 He acquired no capacity to hold by his naturalization under the local law, since, by the constitution, Congress alone has the power of prescribing uniform rules of naturalization; and the act of Maryland is a general naturalization law, not a special act authorizing aliens to hold lands, or conferring other particular privileges. If the states could make such a law, the constitution of the United States would be completely evaded; as the citizens of one state are entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in every other state. 3. The heirs of John Baptiste Chirac have not conformed to the provisions of the act of Maryland by settling in the state and becoming citizens, nor by enfeoffing some person of the lands within ten years from the time when they became seized; and, consequently, their right was gone before the ejectment was brought. The term seizin in the act means, not a seizin in fact, a pedis possessio, but a legal seizin; and the ten years' limitation begins to run after the seizin in law. The technical word enfeoff, as here used, merely refers to the alienation of the land, which may be by bargain and sale, or any other usual mode of conveyance known in the state; and it was not necessary that they should come into the state in order to execute any of these conveyances, or even to make a feoffment.

Winder and Mercer, contra. 1. The constitution of the United States, and the laws made under it, do not, ipso jure, repeal a state law relative to the same matter, but only annul such parts of the latter as are inconsistent with the former. The respective *states still [265 preserve the right of making naturalization laws, giving certain civil rights to foreigners, without conferring universal political citizenship. 2. The act of Maryland was not founded on the treaty merely; the legislature had other objects of policy in view than a mere compliance with the stipulations of the treaty; the continuance of the act was wholly independent of the treaty. It is a part of the code of Maryland, abstracted from the treaty, and would exist with or without the treaty. It consequently remained in full force and vigor notwithstanding the abrogation of the French treaties in 1798. The time of limitation contained in the act, within which the party is obliged to come and reside in a state, or to enfeoff a citizen, does not refer to a mere seizin in law. The term "seized," if unconnected with other expressions qualifying its import, might, indeed, imply a legal seizin only; but with the injunction to "enfeoff," it necessarily imports a seizin in fact, because such a seizin is necessary to enable the party to make a feoffment. 4. But the convention of 1800, which was concluded whilst the defendant in error held an estate in fee-simple under the act of Maryland, determinable by their failure to comply with one of the alternative conditions contained in that act, is conclusive of this cause. That convention enables the citizens of both countries to dispose by testament, donation, or otherwise, of their property, whether real or personal, situate in the territories of either, to whomsoever they please; and to succeed as heirs ab intestato, 266] *without being naturalized.¹ The first clause of the article gives a new power to dispose of property held by citizens of either country in the dominions of the other, viz., the power to dispose by testament or in any other manner. It, of course, repeals so much of the act of Maryland as restricts the power of disposing to the mode of feoffment only; and not only does not prescribe any period of time within which it is to be done, but necessarily gives the life-time of the party, since it allows a disposition by last will and testament, which can only take effect after the death of the party. The second clause places the citizens of both countries in the same predicament as to inheritances as if they were naturalized. The defendants in error were, by the laws of the state, heirs to John Baptiste Chirac, subject to a liability to have their estate defeated unless they became naturalized. This clause superseded the necessity of naturalization, or, rather, naturalized them for this particular purpose. The further stipulation "that in case the laws of either of the two states should restrain strangers from the exercise of the rights of property with respect to real estate, such real estate may be sold, or otherwise disposed of, to citizens or inhabitants of the country where it may be," can only refer to the laws made by the two contracting parties, i. e., France and the United States; not any particular state of our domestic confederacy; for the states of the Union, as separate and independent sovereignties 267] are not included. *No act of theirs could affect the convention. It is to them the supreme law; and no state law incompatible with it can be valid; therefore, that part of the act of Maryland which prescribes only one mode of disposing of real property belonging to Frenchmen is void. The treaty secures the right to dispose of it in any mode.

Martin, in reply. 1. It is a general rule adopted by sovereign states that the real property within their dominions should not be owned by aliens; not that this universal rule is considered as a deprivation of property, the suffering a penalty, or the incurring of a forfeiture, but as an absolute disability to acquire, to hold, and to enjoy the property, founded upon reasons of public policy.¹ The act of Maryland merely dispenses with this rule to a certain extent, and upon certain conditions; it does not inflict any penalty or forfeiture on the kindred of the decedent; nor create in them any disabilities; nor deprive them of any property; nor infringe any of their rights whatsoever. Consequently, they must show that they have strictly complied with the terms on which this boon has been granted. 2. The moment the French subject, on whom the act confers a capacity to hold, dies, his kindred inherit; and the moment the kindred inherit, they become seized in fee; and the moment they become seized in fee, the time of limitation begins to run, within *which they must either [268 come and settle in the state, &c., or enfeoff a citizen. The policy of the legislature in prescribing this limitation was, that not more than ten years should elapse from the decease of the French proprietor, before the lands should again be held and owned by a citizen, whose interest it might be to cultivate and improve the same for the benefit of the community. It was, therefore, perfectly immaterial by what technical mode of conveyance the property should be conveyed, and whether the seizin of the heirs should be a seizin in fact, or a legal seizin. The conveyance might be by any sufficient deed; and even a feoffment might be made by an attorney, without obtaining actual possession. 3. The stipulation in the convention of 1800 does not, of itself, give to French citizens property which they had not before, nor enlarge or alter their estates in the lands held by them. They must have been legally entitled to property when the convention took place, or must have legally acquired it afterwards. The ancestor of the defendants in error had in his life-time a fee-simple, and died seized thereof; but of this estate he was seized, not as a French citizen, but as a citizen of Maryland; and upon his death his heirs, being aliens, could have had no legal claim to the property, and it would have escheated to the state had it not been for the act of Maryland. Under that act they became seized of an estate in fee-simple, but conditional and liable to be defeated, unless they complied with the terms of the act. Had they, within the ten years, become citizens of the state, they would not have wanted the protection *of the treaty, for their property [269 would have been protected as that of citizens. Had they, within the same time, enfeoffed a citizen, the estate would have vested in him, and the protection of the treaty would have been equally superfluous. As the heirs performed neither the one nor the other of these alternative conditions, their estate was defeated at the expiration of the term of ten years, and became vested in the state. From that time the defendants in error have not been seized of any estate to be operated on by the convention; and,

consequently, it can give them no right to recover the lands either from the state or from the plaintiff in error, who claims under the state.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The first point made by the plaintiff in error is, that the estate of which John Baptiste Chirac died seized was, in his life-time, escheatable, because it was acquired before he became a citizen of the United States; the law of the state of Maryland, according to which he took the oaths of citizenship, being virtually repealed by the constitution of the United States, and the act of naturalization enacted by Congress.

That the power of naturalization is exclusively in Congress does not seem to be, and certainly ought not to be controverted; but, it is contended that the act of Maryland, passed in the year 1780, "To declare and ascertain the privileges of the subjects of France residing [270*] within that state," gives to those *subjects the power of holding land on the performance of certain conditions prescribed in that act.

The 2d section gives to the subjects of France who may reside within the state of Maryland, all the rights of free citizens of that state. The 3d section contains a proviso restricting the privileges granted by the act, and declaring that nothing therein contained shall be construed to grant to those who should continue subjects of His Most Christian Majesty, and not qualify themselves as citizens of this state, any right to purchase or hold lands or real estate, but for their respective lives or for years.

This act certainly requires that a French subject who would entitle himself, under it, to hold lands in fee, should be a citizen according to the law which might be in force at the time of acquiring the estate. Otherwise he could only purchase or hold for life or years. John Baptiste Chirac was not a citizen according to that law when he purchased the land in controversy.

It is unnecessary to inquire into the consequences of this state of things, because we are all of opinion that the treaty between the United States and France, ratified in 1778, enabled the subjects of France to hold lands in the United States. That treaty declared that "The subjects and inhabitants of the United States, or any one of them, shall not be reputed Aubains (that is aliens) in France." "They may, by testament, donation, or otherwise, dispose of their goods, movable and immovable, in favor of such persons as to them shall seem [271*] good; *and their heirs, subjects of the said United States, whether residing in France or elsewhere, may succeed them ab intestat, without being obliged to obtain letters of naturalization. The subjects of the most christian king shall enjoy, on their part, in all the dominions of the said states, an entire and perfect reciprocity relative to the stipulations contained in the present articles."

Upon every principle of fair construction, this article gave to the subjects of France a right to purchase and hold lands in the United States.

It is unnecessary to inquire into the effect of this treaty under the confederation, because, before John Baptiste Chirac emigrated to the United States the confederation had yielded to our present constitution, and this treaty had become the supreme law of the land.

*The repeal of this treaty could not [272 effect the real estate acquired by John Baptiste Chirac, because he was then a naturalized citizen, conformably to the act of Congress; and no longer required the protection given by treaty.

John Baptiste Chirac having died seized in fee of the land in controversy, his heirs at law being subjects of France, and there being, at that time, no treaty in existence between the two nations, did his land pass to these heirs, or did it become escheatable?

This question depends on the law of Maryland. The 4th section of the act already mentioned enacts, among other things, that if any subject of France who shall become a citizen of Maryland, "shall die intestate, the natural kindred of such decedent, whether residing in France or elsewhere, shall inherit his or her real estate, in like manner as if such decedent and his kindred were the citizens of this state."

An attempt has been made to avoid the effect of this claim in the act, by contending that it was passed for the sole purpose of enforcing the treaty, and was repealed by implication when the treaty was repealed.

The court does not think so. The enactment of the law is positive, and in its terms perpetual. Its provisions are not made dependent on the treaty; and, although the peculiar state of things then existing might constitute the principal motive for the law, the act remains in force from its words, however that state of things may change.

But, to this enacting clause is attached a proviso *that whenever any subject of [273 France shall, by virtue of this act, become seized in fee of any real estate, his or her estate, "after the term of ten years be expired, shall vest in the state, unless the person seized of the same shall, within that time, either come and settle in, and become a citizen of this state, or enfeoff thereof some citizen of this or some other of the United States of America."

The heirs of John Baptiste Chirac, then, on his death, became seized of his real estate in fee, liable to be defeated by the non-performance of 1.—Before the French revolution the droit d'aubains (jus albinatus) was abolished, or rather modified, by the treaties between France and the greater part of the other civilized powers of the world. But, it seems, according to an observation of M. Tronchet, in the discussions on the civil code, that this conventional law only excluded the royal fisc from taking by escheat the property of foreigners deceased in France, but did not exclude their French relations from inheriting, in preference to their foreign heirs in the same or a nearer degree of affinity; because the foreign heirs had Wheat. 2.

not the active power of inheriting. This was given to all foreigners, without distinction, and, independent of treaties, by the national assembly in 1789. But this concession was repealed by the civil code, which again placed the matter upon its original footing of reciprocity, by enacting that foreigners should enjoy in France the same civil rights which are, or shall be, conceded to Frenchmen by the treaties with the nation to which such foreigners may belong. Liv. 1, chap. 1, De la Jouissance des Droits Civils, Art. II.; Discussions du Code Civil, par M. M., Jouanneau, &c., Tom. 1, p. 45.

the condition in the proviso above recited. The time given by the act for the performance of this condition expired in July, 1809, four months after the institution of this suit. It is admitted that the condition has not been performed, but it is contended that the non-performance is excused, because the heirs have been prevented from performing it by the act of law and of the party. The defendant, in the court below, has kept the heirs out of possession, under the act of the state of Maryland, so that they have been incapable of enfeoffing any American citizen; and, having been thus prevented from performing one condition, they are excused for not performing the other.

Whatever weight might be allowed to this argument, were it founded in fact, its effect cannot be admitted in this case. The heirs were not disabled from enfeoffing an American citizen. They might have entered, and have executed a conveyance for the land. Having failed to do so, their estate has terminated, 274 unless it be supported in some other manner than by the act of Maryland.

This brings the court to a material question in the cause. While the defendants in error were seized of an estate in fee-simple, determinable by their failure to perform the condition contained in the act of 1780, another treaty was entered into between the United States and France, which provides for the rights of French subjects claiming lands by inheritance in the United States. This treaty enables the people of one country, holding lands in the other, to dispose of the same by testament or otherwise, as they shall think proper. It also enables them to inherit lands in the respective countries without being obliged to obtain letters of naturalization.

Had John Baptiste Chirac, the person from whom the land in controversy descended, lived till this treaty became the law of the land, all will admit that the provisions which have been stated would, if unrestrained by other limitations, have vested the estate of which he died seized in his heirs.

If no act had been passed on the subject, and the appellees had purchased lands lying in the United States, it is equally clear that the stipulations referred to would have operated on these lands so as to do away that liability to forfeiture to which the real estates of aliens are exposed.

Has it the same or any effect on the estate of which the appellees were seized when it was entered into?

It has been argued that the treaty protects 275 existing estates, and gives to French subjects a capacity to dispose and to inherit; but does not enlarge estates.

This is true. But the estate of the defendants in error requires no enlargement. It is already a fee, although subject to be defeated by the non-performance of a condition. The question is, does this treaty dispense with the condition, or give a longer time for its performance? The condition is, that those who hold the estate shall become citizens of the United States, or shall enfeoff a citizen within ten years. Does the treaty control or dispense with this condition?

The direct object of this stipulation is, to give French subjects the rights of citizens, so far as respects property, and to dispense with the necessity of obtaining letters of naturalization. It does away the incapacity of alienage, and places the defendants in error in precisely the same situation, with respect to lands, as if they had become citizens. It renders the performance of the condition a useless formality, and seems to the court to release the rights of the state as entirely in this case as in the case of one who had purchased, instead of taking by descent. The act of Maryland has no particular reference to the case of Chirac, but is a general rule of state policy prescribing the terms on which French subjects may take and hold lands. This rule is changed by the treaty; and it seems to the court that the new rule applies to all cases as well to those where the lands have descended by virtue of the act as to those where lands have been acquired [276] without its aid. The general power to dispose "without limitation," which is given by the treaty, controls the particular power to enfeoff within ten years, which is given by the act of Maryland.

But the treaty proceeds to stipulate, "that in case the laws of either of the two states should restrain strangers from the exercise of the rights of property with respect to real estate, such real estate may be sold, or otherwise disposed of, to citizens or inhabitants of the country where it may be."

In many of the states—perhaps in all of them—the laws do "restrain strangers from the exercise of the rights of property with respect to real estate;" consequently, this provision limits, to a certain extent, the principles antecedently granted. What is the extent of this limitation?

It will probably prevent a French subject from inheriting or purchasing the estate of a French subject, who is not also a citizen of the United States; but it cannot affect the right of him who takes or holds by virtue of the treaty, so as to deprive him of the power to do that for which this clause stipulates; that is, "to sell or otherwise dispose of the property to citizens or inhabitants of this country." This general power to sell, according to the principles of our law, and, it is presumed, of that of France, endures for life. A subject of France, then, who had acquired lands by descent or devise (perhaps also by any other mode of purchase), from a citizen of the United States, would have a right, during life, to sell or otherwise dispose of those lands, if lying in a state where lands purchased by an alien generally would be immediately escheatable on account [277] of alienage. The court can perceive no reason for restraining this construction in the application of the treaty to the state of Maryland, where the law, instead of subjecting the estate to immediate forfeiture, protects it for ten years. The treaty substitutes the term of life for the term of ten years given by the act.

If, then, the treaty between the United States and France still continued in force, the defendant would certainly be entitled to recover the land for which this suit is instituted. But the treaty is, by an article which has been added to it, limited to eight years, which have long since expired. How does this circumstance affect the case?

The treaty was framed with a view to its being perpetual. Consequently, its language is adapted to the state of things contemplated by the parties, and no provision could be made for the event of its expiring within a certain number of years. The court must decide on the effect of this added article in the case which has occurred. It will be admitted that a right once vested does not require, for its preservation, the continued existence of the power by which it was acquired. If a treaty, or any other law, has performed its office by giving a right, the expiration of the treaty or law cannot extinguish that right. Let us, then, inquire, whether this temporary treaty gave rights which existed only for eight years or gave rights during eight years which survived it.

The terms of this instrument leave no doubt on this subject. Its whole effect is immediate. 278] The instant *the descent is cast, the right of the party becomes as complete as it can afterwards be made. The French subject who acquired lands by descent the day before its expiration has precisely the same right under it as he who acquired them the day after its formation. He is seized of the same estate, and has precisely the same power during life to dispose of it. This limitation of the compact between the two nations, would act upon, and change all its stipulations, if it could affect this case. But the court is of opinion that the treaty had its full effect the instant a right was acquired under it; that it had nothing further to perform; and that its expiration or continuance afterwards was unimportant.

Judgment affirmed.

THE GEORGE.

A question of collusive capture. The capture pronounced to be collusive, and the property condemned to the United States.

THIS is the same cause which is reported in the first volume of these Reports, p. 408, and which was ordered to further proof upon the points there stated.

279*] *The cause was argued by Webster and G. Sullivan for the captors, and by the Attorney-General for the United States.

JOHNSON, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is one of those cases which too often occur in courts exercising admiralty jurisdiction, in which the court is left to decide between the most positive testimony on the one hand, and the most obstinate circumstances on the other.

The privateer Fly had captured the schooner George and carried her into the province of Maine. But various circumstances having excited a suspicion that the capture was collusive, a claim was filed in behalf of the United States, and she was adjudged to the government, in opposition to the right set up by the captor.

Wheat. 2.

In all the courts through which this case has passed, the most ample opportunities have been given for the production of testimony. But, unfortunately, this indulgence has only served to thicken the difficulties of the case.

We have now before us the most positive depositions of the supercargo and the shippers of the George (men whose veracity stands unimpeached), denying, in every point, the collusion, and contradicting, in almost every material point, the evidence upon which the adjudications took place in the courts below. On the other hand, the characters of Thomas and Rodick, who swear to positive confessions on the subject of the fraud, are amply supported by *the most respectable testimony, whilst [280 the veracity of Wasgate and Stanwood, who testify to the same point, stands wholly unimpeached.

It is painful to a court ever to express an opinion that results in an imputation of willful perjury, and, as much as it is possible in this case, we will put out of view the clashing testimony of individuals, and consider the case upon those facts concerning the truth of which the evidence leaves no doubt.

It is a notorious fact, and is expressly and repeatedly sworn to in this case, that during the restrictive system and the late war, English manufactures, in immense quantities, were accumulated in the small ports on the west coast of Nova Scotia, and it is a melancholy truth, which this court has had but too much cause to know, that many unprincipled individuals were actively engaged in introducing those goods into the United States, under innumerable artifices, and to an immense amount. The protection of the British government was openly given to this intercourse, and there were found but too many in our country who countenanced and encouraged it. Hence this illicit intercourse was actively carried on, and naturally casts a suspicion on such shipments made in that quarter. On the other hand, although an effort has been made to show that a trade in the same articles was carried on between those provinces and the Havanna, but one instance can be shown of such a shipment. All the witnesses agree that the exports from St. Johns to the Havanna consisted of fish and lumber. Indeed, from the course of trade at that time, it is notorious that the Havanna *as well [281 as other Spanish ports to the southward were crowded with British manufactures, for the same unprincipled trade carried on at Amelia Island. The shipment, then, in the first instance, is a suspicious one, and leads to the opinion that the dry goods were intended for the United States, whilst the fish and lumber were to be used only as the cover under which they were to be introduced. But this reasoning may be consistent with the idea of a destination to any port of the United States, as well as the ports in that vicinity with which this privateer appears to have been connected. Let us, then, examine if the George was equipped for a voyage of any duration. And here the evidence is irresistible to show that she was not. She had no dunnage, or platform, for the purpose of preserving the goods from damage by water, and nothing was stowed or packed in such a manner as to indicate preparation for a protracted voyage. Her sails and rigging were old, worn, and deficient in quantity, and her mainsail too large both for mast and boom. Her wood, and water, and provisions very scanty; and her crew, before the mast, not more than one-half of what were necessary for a long and a winter's voyage. Add to this that her captain is proved to have been a very young man, scarcely twenty-one years of age, altogether unknown to the shippers, and engaged only four days before the vessel's sailing. It cannot be believed that so valuable a cargo could have been destined for so long a voyage with such defective equipments; no court, upon 282] such evidence, would *have hesitated to avoid a policy on either vessel or cargo.

We therefore think that her real destination must have been to some port in the vicinity of that at which her voyage commenced. How, then, was the cargo to be introduced?

Here I regret that it is necessary to notice a part of the testimony of Gregory Vanhorne, which certainly casts a shade upon all the rest of his testimony. The George, it appears, had actually sailed under convoy of the Beaver as far as Etang Harbor. There the vessel lay in a secure port, under the protection of the Martin sloop of war, and at a place occasionally assigned as a place of rendezvous to vessels that were to sail under convoy. Yet Vanhorne swears that he heard the commander of the Martin expressly order the captain of the George to depart for the place where she was captured, an open road, without protection, only fifteen miles from Etang Harbor and there to wait the indefinite arrival of some unascertained convoying vessel. This cannot be true. For, independently of the fact, which appears to be satisfactorily established, that Long Island Harbor, in the island of Grand Magnan, when this vessel was captured, had never been used as a place of rendezvous for a convoy, it is very clear that such an order would not have been obeyed by a vessel that feared exposure to capture; for it is proved to have been a place often visited by American privateers.

We therefore consider the vessel's departure from Etang Harbor to the place where she was 283] *captured as voluntary, and her patient stay at that place as manifesting that she did not fear exposure to American capture. Yet it does not follow necessarily that it was the Fly privateer that she was waiting for, nor that she expected to be captured at all. The cargo intended for the American market may, by possibility, have been intended to be introduced into the United States, by being transhipped into some smuggling vessel. So far everything comports perfectly with the innocence of this capture.

But the privateer Fly also draws suspicion upon herself in the very inception of her voyage. We find, what we pronounce absolutely unprecedented, notwithstanding every effort to prove the contrary, that the captain, Dekoven, is sole owner of the privateer, and every man under him, from the lieutenant down, is engaged on wages. In the case of The Washington, privateer, it was a circumstance of great weight with this court that nine out of fifteen of the ship's company were joint owners, and it was thought improbable that such a transaction, if there was fraud in it, would have been confided to so many witnesses.¹ But here no man but the captain is to participate in the prize money, and he thus presents himself as the most convenient agent possible to be intrusted with such an undertaking. Perhaps this circumstance may give a leaning to the mind of the court in considering the effect which ought to be *given to other evidence in the cause; [284 but if so, it is Dekoven's misfortune, and one which he has himself furnished the cause for.

It then becomes necessary to consider whether the arrival of Captain Dekoven was the object of this vessel in taking the position she did, in the island of Grand Magnan. And here it is proper to remark that Etang Harbor, lying up the bay of Passamaquoddy, N. W., and by W. of St. Johns, where this vessel took in her cargo, is off the course to Cuba, and a very convenient situation for intelligence with Machias, in the province of Maine, by means of a chain of islands extending across the bay. One of these islands is Moose Island, about five leagues distant from Grand Magnan, and something less from Etang Harbor. Now, the evidence is very satisfactory to prove that the Fly lay, some time in December, at Machias; that during that time Sebor, the lieutenant and brother-in-law of Dekoven, was absent from the vessel. And Jabez Mowry, who resides on Moose Island, swears, that during that time Sebor was on Moose Island, and holding communication with certain notorious smugglers from the states; to one of which, of the name of Toler, from New York, he had a letter. Again, the pilot who was on board the Fly swears that from all he saw on the occasion of the capture he concluded it was amicable; and Aaron Gale, a witness, resident upon the island of Grand Magnan, who saw the whole transaction, swears to the same fact, and adds, that after the capture, the captain of the privateer and his prize-master came on shore to *a neighboring house, where [285 the witness then was, and got something to drink. This looks very little like a consciousness of being among enemies. To this he adds that he heard a British officer, who was at the time recruiting upon the island, threaten Vanhorne, the supercargo, who, together with all the crew except the supposed captain, were immediately put on shore, to put him in irons for the fraud in thus colluding with the enemy.

I will notice but two more pieces of testimony which the case affords, and which, taken with the rest, we think too strong to be resisted. The first is that of Richard Higgins, who testifies that, on the arrival of the George off the harbor called Frenchman's Bay, or, as he expresses himself, at Mount Desert, he, the deponent, was the first person who boarded her; that Sebor, the lieutenant of the Fly, who was the prize-master, told him where they had captured the George; upon the witness's inquiring what she was loaded with, he replied, fish and lumber. The witness remarked that she floated very light for such a load, upon which Sebor replied he did not know what the cargo consisted of, and that he wanted to get further to the westward. The witness then told him, distinctly, "that he presumed the capture had been made by some previous understanding, and that, if such were the case, he thought he would be likely to fare better, and undergo a less rigorous scrutiny, if he put into this dis-strict than he would if he went into any of the more western districts, upon which, after consulting with some one of his crew, he went [286*] in." This testimony is important in two views: 1st. The plot here develops itself, and we find the fish and lumber actually resorted to as the means of cloaking the introduction of the British goods. And the resort of Sebor to this deception (for he must have known it to be such, had it been only from the inspection of the invoice) shows his privity to the secrets of the machinery. 2d. Going into the port after the suggestion of Higginson amounts to a passive acquiescence in the correctness of his suggestions, and an acceptance of the facilities held out to him to induce him to enter that port.

1.—Vide ante, p. 169, The Bothnea and Jahnstoff.

The last and only remaining piece of testimony that we shall notice is that of Joseph Grindel, of Penobscot, who swears that he was in St. Johns at the time the George was lading; that he was familiarly acquainted with Van-horne, the supercargo, and that he held a conversation with him, respecting a passage, and the shipment of a hogshead of molasses to the states, and remitting the money to his mother at Penobscot, which, if it be true, (and we have no cause to doubt his veracity,) puts to rest every question relative to the fraudulent design with which this adventure was undertaken. And the same witness further swears that, after consenting to take his adventure on board (an adventure that never could have been intended for the Havanna market), Van-horne sailed a day or two sooner than he had intimated to the witness. That upon this he complained to Nehemiah Merrit, the shipper, and received from him this notable answer: "He suspected your politics, and was afraid you would betray him."

[287*] *Upon the whole, we are of opinion that it was a case of collusive capture, and that the decree below should be affirmed.

Decree affirmed.

[PRACTICE.]

THE ARGO.

The provision in the judiciary act of 1789, ch. 20, section 30, as to taking depositions de bene esse, does not apply to cases pending in this court, but only to cases in the district and circuit courts. Testimony by depositions can be regularly taken for this court only under a commission issuing according to its rules.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts.

This was an information for a violation of the non-importation acts. On the part of the appellants it was alleged that the vessel, (which sailed from Portland, in the District of Maine, in April, 1813, and returned to that port, laden with a cargo of molasses, in the month of August, of the same year,) instead of going to Cumana, her ostensible port of destination, had proceeded to Guadaloupe, then a British possession, and there took in her cargo. This was the sole question of fact in the cause; on which the court below decreed restitution to the claimant, from which decree an appeal was entered on behalf of the United States to this court.

*Webster, for the claimants, objected to [288 the reading of the depositions taken de bene esse in this cause. He argued, that there is no provision in the laws by which testimony in writing can be taken, to be used here, without a commission issuing from this court. The provisions of the judiciary act of 1789, ch. 20, section 30, do not extend to the Supreme Court; and the act of 1803, ch. 93, does not prescribe any new mode of taking testimony, but only declares that new evidence may be used in prize and instance causes. Ex-parte testimony may be taken to be used in the courts below, but here it may not; because this is the tribunal of last resort, and the other party might be surprised by the production of such proof to his irretrievable injury. It was to guard against this consequence that the laws omitted any provision for such testimony to be used in this court.

The Attorney-General, contra, stated that it had been the uniform practice to take testimony to be used in this court in the same manner as if taken for the district and circuit courts; and that the practice had been uniformly acquiesced in. He argued that this court, sitting as a court of admiralty, had a right to receive ex-parte affidavits, in the same manner as the circuit and district courts, or the courts of admiralty abroad, who received affidavits and permitted them to be read, whether taken ex parte or under a commission.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

*On considering the 30th section of [289 the judiciary act of 1789, the court is of opinion that the provision, as to taking depositions de bene esse, does not apply to cases pending in this court. In terms, the provision refers to cases in the district and circuit courts. Testimony, by depositions, can be regularly taken for this court only under a commission issuing according to its rules. A practice has hitherto prevailed to take depositions de bene esse in causes pending here, and, as no objection has been made at the bar, it has passed sub silentio. Under such circumstances we cannot say that the United States are in default in taking depositions according to the usual practice. We shall, therefore, continue this cause to the next term, to enable the parties, if they choose, to take testimony under commissions issued under the rules prescribed by this court.

MORGAN'S HEIRS v. MORGAN ET AL.

The jurisdiction of the Circuit Court, having once vested between citizens of different states, cannot be divested by a change of domicile of one of the parties, and his removal into the same state with the adverse party, pendente lite.

In a suit demanding the specific performance of a contract, by conveying lands in the state of Ohio, stipulated to be conveyed as the consideration for other lands sold in the state of Kentucky, or, in lieu thereof, requiring indemnification by the payment of money; it was held that all the co-heirs of the vendor, deceased, ought to be made parties to the bill, and that the death of one of the heirs ought to be proved in order to excuse his omission as a party to the bill.

It is a universal rule of equity that he who asks for a specific performance must be in a condition to perform himself.

Therefore, the vendor, being unable to make a title free from incumbrances, to the lands sold in Kentucky, was held not to be entitled to a decree for a specific performance.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of Kentucky.

This was a bill in equity, filed by the complainants in the court below, (who are the defendants here) founded on a bond, conditioned for the conveyance of 5,000 acres of land, to be situated within certain bounds of the state of Ohio; for which land a conveyance was prayed, if the defendant was possessed of, or had the means of acquiring, the title thereto, and, in the event of such inability on the part of the defendant to comply specifically with his stipulation, a compensation in damages in lieu thereof; [291] of; *and, in this latter case, that a tract of 1,000 acres of land, situate in the county of Bourbon, in the state of Kentucky, which formed the consideration on the part of the complainants, for the 5,000 acres of Ohio land, and for the conveyance of which the ancestor of the complainants had, contemporaneously with the first bond, executed his own obligation to the defendant, should be sold for the purpose of completing such indemnity, upon the suggestion of the insolvency of the defendant; on the ground of the equitable lien existing on the part of the complainants in that land, for the purpose of such indemnity. The bill further alleged that the ancestor of the complainants, discovering the inability or unwillingness of the defendant to fulfil the stipulations of his said bond, for the purpose of his ultimate indemnity against the consequences of such failure, had instituted an ejectment in the Fayette Circuit Court, against James Patton, to whom the defendant had many years before sold, and invested with the possession of the said 1,000 acre tract, against whom judgment had been rendered in his favor. That subsequent to such judgment, an adjustment of the accounts of improvements, rents, and profits, had been effected between them, which was shown by an agreement in writing, in which it was stipulated that the said Patton should pay to the ancestor of the complainants the sum of $80, in full for rents, and should yield up the possession of the premises on a day therein named. But that in violation of the spirit and true intention of this agreement of compromise, he, the said Patton, *had fraudulently [292] prosecuted a writ of error to the said judgment in ejectment; and having procured, in the appellate court, a reversal of the said judgment, had secretly, illegally, and by combination with Chilton Allen and others procured a sale, under color of an execution for the costs, on the reversal aforesaid, for the sum of $13.72½, and sacrificed 666½ acres of the said tract, worth many thousand dollars, for that trivial sum; the said Allen having become the purchaser, and subsequently conveyed 500 acres thereof to Patton, and the residue to James Scoby, all of whom are made parties to the bill. The complainants, for the purpose of giving legal effect to the lien given them by equity, on this tract of 1,000 acres of land for the satisfaction of their demand, pray that the sale, and all other proceedings on the execution for costs, be vacated on account of the fraud and illegality by which the same was effected.

Morgan, the defendant, in his answer, admits that he was unable to comply with the contract to convey the lands N. W. of the Ohio; alleges fraud in the original contract, &c.

Allen, Patton, and Scoby, deny fraud, &c., and allege a good title under the sheriff's deed.

On the hearing, the court, at their November term, in 1814, dismissed the bill as to Allen, Patton, and Scoby; but decided that the defendant, Morgan, was responsible for the value of the lands in Ohio, and directed a jury to ascertain its value. At the May term, 1815, a jury estimated the Ohio land to be worth, on the 11th day of December, 1795, *$5,- [293] 000; on the 11th of December, 1796, $6,250; and at that date, $20,000. At the November term, 1815, a motion for a rehearing having been overruled, a decree was rendered, on behalf of the complainants, for $6,250, with interest from the 11th December, 1796, and costs against the defendant, Morgan, and execution ordered against his estate. Commissioners were also appointed to sell the land, if the money could not be made by execution, and the commissioners directed to convey to the purchaser. The complainants were also directed to join in the conveyance, and to stipulate to pay, at the rate of 20 shillings per acre, for any of the land that might be lost by a superior title.

By a copy of the will of C. Morgan, of Pennsylvania, exhibited in the cause, it appeared that the testator had a son, William Morgan, who was one of his heirs, and who is no party in the cause. It also appeared that there are two other executors not named in the bill.

During the progress of the suit, Daniel Morgan, one of the complainants, removed to, and became a citizen of, Kentucky. This was shown to the court, and a motion made to dismiss the suit for the want of jurisdiction, and overruled.

M. B. Hardin and Jones, for the appellants. 1. The voluntary change of citizenship by one of the complainants, pendente lite, is a waiver of the privilege of maintaining a suit in the Circuit Court, which exists only between citizens of different states, and ceases by the parties becoming 294 citizens of the same state. The general rule is, that a court, once having jurisdiction of a cause, will keep it; but that relates to the subject-matter of the suit: here it is a personal privilege, which the party waives by removing into the same state with his adversary; and in this case, into any other state; because all the parties on one side must be citizens of one state, and all the parties on the other, citizens of another state. 2. There is a defect of proper parties to the bill. 3. This is, substantially, a bill by a vendor to compel the vendee to complete the contract, and ought not to be sustained; because the contract was unequal, and the vendor had himself disaffirmed it. Where there is inequality in the contract, a court of equity will not decree a specific performance even in a case where damages might be recovered at law, but will remit the parties to their legal remedy. 4. In order to obtain a specific performance, the vendor must show that he has a good title to give: which is not the case here, the land being incumbered by the judicial sale, which gives at least a presumptive title against the vendor's claim. 5. The decree is inequitable in its details. If damages ought to have been decreed, the estimated value of the land stated in the written contract was the true measure of damages, and not the sum stated in the decree. The order for the sale of the land under incumbrances was improper; as some of the complainants were infants, some femes covert, and one of the heirs not made a party to the suit; so that no legal title could be acquired by a purchaser without time, trouble, and expense.

Talbot*, contra. 1. The removal of [*295] one of the parties cannot oust the court of its jurisdiction. The citizens of different states have not an individual, peculiar, personal privilege; but it is a classification of persons who, under the constitution, have a right to sue in the national courts. 2. As it regards the primary object of the suit, the title to the Ohio land, the bill is that of daily and familiar use: that with a double aspect, requiring of the chancellor a specific execution of the stipulation for conveyance, in pursuance of the defendant's bond, or in the event of inability (in relation to which the complainant is ignorant), upon the ascertainment of such entire inability, compensation equivalent to the value of the land in lieu thereof. The enforcement of the equitable lien, held by the complainants on the Bourbon land; the possession of which (but not the title) their ancestor had transferred to the defendant, Morgan, is the peculiar and exclusive province of the equitable tribunal; and especially in Kentucky, by the laws of which the equitable claims to real estate are not made subject to execution. The equity of the lien on behalf of the complainants is irresistible, on the supposition of the inability of the defendant, Morgan, to convey the Ohio land; the Bourbon land constituting the entire consideration for the stipulation of the defendant for the conveyance of the other; and the ancestor of the complainants having taken no personal security, but retained the legal title as his only guarantee for the faithful execution of the stipulation on the part of the defendant, Morgan; and the embarrassments in which the title and possession of the Bourbon land had become involved by [*296] the acts of the defendant, Morgan, and those claiming through and under him, in relation to the fraudulent and illegal sale of that land, under color of the execution, forms another distinct and unquestionable ground for the interposition of equity jurisdiction; the tribunal of the chancellor alone possessing competent powers by a single suit (avoiding multiplicity of harassing litigation), to embrace all these various subjects of controversy, and by its decree, co-extensive with the matters in contest, ary parties to a suit against him by a stranger to defeat the trust in whole or in part; nor to a suit by him to recover trust property. Kerrison v. Stewart, 3 Otto, 155; Carey v. Brown, 2 Otto, 171.

But the jurisdiction of this court will not be ousted in equity cases by the joinder or non-joinder of merely formal parties. Worinley v. Wormley, 4 Wheat, 421.

The joinder of unnecessary parties, not capable of being sued in a federal court, because citizens of same state as plaintiff, will not prevent a decree against others capable of being sued. Cameal v. Bank, 10 Wheat, 181.

If the action can be completely decided as between the parties, an interest in another who cannot be reached by process should not prevent a decree. Elmendorf v. Taylor, 10 Wheat, 152; Story v. Livingston, 13 Pet. 359; West v. Smith, 8 How. 402.

to do final and complete justice to all the parties. 3. The subsequent, fraudulent, or illegal sale and purchase of the Bourbon land, effected through the agency of Patton claiming and holding possession of the same under the defendant; a sale effected not only in violation of the solemn stipulations between said Patton and the ancestor of the complainants, by the terms of which the proceedings under the ejectment and all matters in relation thereto were finally compromised between them, but, also, in defiance of the various provisions of the acts of the Kentucky legislature, authorizing the sales of real estate under execution, ought not to affect or prejudice the right of the complainants to recover of the defendant, Morgan, an indemnity for his failure to convey the Bourbon land. 4. The sale of the Bourbon land under color of the execution for costs was irregular and illegal in the following particulars: 1st. That the act of the Kentucky legislature, under which this sale is attempted to be justified, only authorizes the sale of real estate on execution for debt or damages, and 297] *not executions for costs alone, as was that from the Court of Appeals, in the present case. 2d. The act requires that the sale to be effected under such executions shall be advertised on the door of the court-house, on a court day; thereby clearly intending that such advertisement should be placed in that situation, in time to afford the requisite information to all persons attending court, for the entire day; which was not done on this occasion, the advertisement not having been put up until the latter part, or afternoon of the day. 3d. The said sale was not advertised at the court-house, and some meeting-house door, and at the other most public places, within the county, as required by the said act; in consequence of which omissions to comply with those important requisitions of the law, the land of the complainants, worth several thousand dollars, was sacrificed for a paltry and insignificant sum.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case two questions respecting the formal proceedings of the Circuit Court have been made by the counsel for the appellant.

The first is, that one of the complainants in the original suit having settled in the state of Kentucky after this bill was filed, that court could no longer entertain jurisdiction of the cause, and ought to have dismissed the bill.

We are all of opinion that the jurisdiction having once vested, was not divested by the change of residence of either of the parties.

298*] *2d. It appearing from the will that at its date the testator had a child who is not a party in this suit, the bill ought to be dismissed, or the decree opened and the cause sent back to make proper parties.

It is unquestionable that all the co-heirs of the deceased ought to be parties to this suit, either plaintiff or defendant; and a specific performance ought not to be decreed until they shall be all before the court. It would, perhaps, be not enough to say that the child named in the will, and not made a party, is most probably dead. In such a case as this, the fact of his death ought to be proved, not presumed.¹ But as the opinion of the court on the merits of the cause will render it unnecessary to decide this question, it is thought best for the interest of all parties to proceed to the consideration of another point which will finally terminate the contest, *so far as it is to be deter- [*299] mined in a court of equity.

This is a suit for the specific performance of a contract, either by conveying lands in the state of Ohio, stipulated to be conveyed as the consideration for land sold in the state of Kentucky, or, if that be out of the power of the obligor, by paying money in lieu thereof. Although the contract is not contained in one instrument, but consists of two bonds, the one given by Charles Morgan, of Pennsylvania, binding himself to convey the land in Kentucky, and the other by Charles Morgan, of Kentucky, binding himself to convey the land in Ohio; yet, it is essentially one contract; and it sufficiently appears that the land in Ohio forms the consideration for the lands in Kentucky. It is then a case standing on those general principles which govern all applications to a court of equity, to decree the specific performance of a contract.

In cases of this character no rule is more universal than that he who asks for a specific performance must be in a condition to perform himself. This point was fully considered in the cases decided in this court between Hepburn & Dundas and Colin Auld, as the agent of Dunlop & Co., and the principles laid down in those cases are believed to be entirely correct.²

Let us inquire, then, whether the plaintiffs in the court below have brought themselves within this rule.

It is incumbent on them to show an ability to convey to the defendant in that court a clear estate in *fee simple in the tract of one [*300] thousand acres lying in Kentucky, which was sold to him by their ancestors. Have they done so?

The co-heirs are, some of them, femes covert, and some of them infants. The decree against the defendant for the value of the Ohio land is not dependent on their making him a conveyance of the land in Kentucky, but is absolute. He is to pay the consideration money, and then obtain a title if he can. It is true that in the event of selling the Kentucky land, which is to take place after exhausting the personal estate of Charles, Morgan of Kentucky, the complain-

1.—The general rule, requiring all persons interested to be made parties to the suit, is confined to parties to the interest involved in the issue, and who must, necessarily, be affected by the decree. It is a rule of convenience merely, and may be dispensed with when it becomes extremely difficult or inconvenient. Wendell v. Van Rensselaer, 1 Johns. Ch. Rep. 349. And the want of proper parties is not a good plea, if the bill suggests that such parties are out of the jurisdiction of the court. Milligan v. Milledge et ux., 3 Cranch, 220; Travers v. Buckley, 1 Ves. 885; Cowslad v. Coley, 1 Vern. 140. In such a case, if the property in litigation be within the control of the party who is brought before the court, it may be acted upon by the court. Smith v. Hibernia Company, 1 Schoales & Lefroy, 240; Williams v. Whinyates, 2 Brown's Ch. Cas. 399. No person need be made a party, against whom, if brought to a hearing, the plaintiff cannot have a decree; as a residuary legatee, and a bankrupt in a suit brought against the assignees. De Golls v. Ward, in note 1 to 3 Pere Will. 311.

2.—Vide ante, Vol. I. p. 179.

ants are directed to join in the conveyance; but this contingency may not happen; and if it should, a decree that femes covert and infants who are plaintiffs, and against whom no cross bill has been filed, should convey, might not secure a conveyance.

This might be corrected by sending the case back with instructions to new model the decree so as to adapt it to the situation of the parties, did it appear to the court that the appellees are able to make such a title as the appellant ought to receive.

But the appellees appear to the court to be incapable of making an unincumbered title to the land sold by their ancestor. Six hundred and sixty-six acres have been sold under an execution, and conveyed by the officer making the sale. The terre-tenants have been brought before the court. The bill, as to them, has been dismissed, and from the decree of dismissal there has been no appeal. Can this 301 court close its eyes on their title, or declare it invalid?

It has been said that the sale is fraudulent, irregular, and illegal. But the court empowered to examine these allegations has decided against them, and from its decree no appeal has been taken. The incumbrance is an incumbrance in fact, and its legality can be inquired into by this court only in a suit to which the persons claiming the title are parties.

It might be urged, that as the appellant sold to Patton, and Patton holds also under the sheriff's sale, he is not now at liberty to consider Patton's title as an incumbrance on the land.

This argument would be entitled to great consideration were it applicable to the whole land sold by the sheriff. But it is inapplicable to one hundred and sixty-six acres, part of the tract which has never been sold by the appellant.

If the titles acquired under the sheriff's sale be such as would be annulled in a court of law or equity (concerning which this court gives no opinion), it was incumbent on the plaintiffs to annul them before they obtained a decree for a specific performance.

Other objections have been made to the decree of the Circuit Court. It has been said that the contract was in its origin unequal, and that the ancestor of the appellees had in his life-time, by his conduct, disaffirmed the contract. It is deemed unnecessary to examine these objections, because the court is of opinion that the inability of the appellees to make such* 302 a title to the land at this time as the appellant ought to accept, deprives them of the right to demand a specific performance. Neither party can at present claim the aid of this court, but ought to be left to pursue their legal remedies.

1.—There can be no doubt that the origin of the doctrine of the English Court of Chancery, as to the specific performance of agreements, is to be traced to the Roman law; although the commentators on that law are divided in opinion as to whether it would compel the actual delivery of the thing sold, or whether, in case of refusal, on the part of the vendor, his obligation resolves itself into the payment of pecuniary damages. Those civilians who are of the latter opinion, ground themselves, 1st. On the Code de act. vend. et empt. L. 4 tit. 49, sec. 4, which subjects the vendor to damages for refusing to deliver possession of the thing sold. 2d. On the maxim of law that nemo potest cogi præcise ad factum; from whence they conclude that nemo potest cogi ad traditionem. The contrary opinion is supported, among others, by Pothier, who states it to be conformable to the practice on the European continent to enforce a specific performance of the contract of sale. He answers the above objections drawn from the 4th law of the Code de act. vend. et empt. by stating that this law does indeed give to the vendee the action in id quod interest, against the vendor who refuses to deliver possession of the thing sold; but that it does not confine his remedy to this action alone. He cites Paulus, Sent. 1, 13, 4, as a precise authority that the vendor may be compelled to deliver the thing specifically, potest cogi ut tradat; but as it may not always be convenient or practicable for the vendee to cause himself to be put in possession manu militari, he is, by this law, permitted to resort to his action in id quod interest. He has the choice of the two remedies. As to the argument drawn from the maxim, that nemo potest cogi ad factum, and that those contracts which consist in the obligation to do a certain thing, resolve themselves in id quod interest actoris, Pothier answers, that this maxim is inapplicable, except where the act to be done is a mere personal act of the debtor, merum factum; as where a person contracts to copy a manuscript, or to excavate a ditch*, in which case, if the agreement be not performed, the obligation necessarily resolves itself into pecuniary damages. But that the act of delivering possession of the thing sold is not merum factum, sed magis ad dationem accedit; and that the debtor may be compelled to perform it specifically. De Vente, No. 68. This principle he extends even to personal property; but in the practice of the Wheat, 2.

English Court of Chancery agreements respecting chattels are not, in general, enforced, as has been before noticed. Ante, vol. 1, p. 154, note (a). So, also, that court refused to decree a specific performance of a covenant to make good a gravel pit. Scholefield v. Whitehead, 2 Vern. 127. And to refer a controversy to arbitration. Street v. Rigby, 6 Ves. 818. These last cases fall within the distinction stated by Pothier of a mere personal act, the obligation of which, in case of non-performance, resolves itself into pecuniary damages, to recover which the party must resort to his action at law. But Lord Hardwicke held, contrary to the principle of this distinction, in the case of the City of London v. Nash, 3 Atk. 512, that a covenant to build or rebuild might be specifically enforced, but not a covenant to repair. And the same case is mentioned as within the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery in the year book of 8 E. 4, 4, b., one of the earliest recognitions of the equitable powers of the court. But the modern authorities seem to lean against this doctrine. Lucas v. Commerford, 3 Brown's Ch. Cas. 167; S. C. 1 Ves., Jun., 236; Mosely v. Virgin, 3 Ves. 184; Flint v. Brandon, 8 Ves. 164; Errington v. Aynesley, 2 Brown's Ch. Cas. 343.

Although the vendee is not obliged to take a defective title, yet, if there be a mistake or misrepresentation as to the quantity or quality of the property sold, or of the estate of the vendor therein, the vendee may, if he elects so to do, have the difference deducted from the purchase money by way of compensation, and a specific performance as to the rest. There is a settled distinction, when a vendor comes into a court of equity to compel the vendee to a performance, and when a vendee seeks to compel a vendor to perform. In the first case, if the vendor is unable to make out a title as to part of the subject-matter of the contract, which was the principal object of the purchaser, equity will not compel the vendee to perform the contract pro tanto. In the second case, the vendee may, if he chooses, take the part to which a title can be made. Waters v. Travis, 9 Johns. Rep. 465; Milligan v. Cooke, 16 Ves. 1; Halsey v. Grant, 13 Ves. 77; Mortlocke v. Buller, 10 Ves. 316; Paton v.* 304 Rogers, 1 Ves. & Beat. 353. LITER ET AL. v. GREEN.

In a writ of right, brought under the statute of Kentucky, where the demandant described his land by metes and bounds, and counted against the tenants jointly, it was held that this was matter pleadable in abatement only, and that by pleading in bar, the tenants admitted their joint seizin, and lost the opportunity of pleading a several tenancy.

The tenants could not, in this case, severally plead, in addition to the mise, or general issue, that neither the plaintiff nor his ancestor, nor any other under or from whom he derived his title to the demanded premises, were ever actually seized or possessed thereof, or of any part thereof; because it amounted to the general issue, and was an application to the mere discretion of the court, which is not examinable upon a writ of error.

Quære. Whether the tenants could plead the mise severally, as to the several tenements held by them, parcel of the demandant's premises, without answering or pleading anything as to the residue.

Under such pleas, and the replication prescribed by the statute, the mise was joined, the parties proceeded to trial, and the following general verdict was found, viz.: "The jury find that the demandant hath more mere right to hold the tenement, as he hath demanded, than the tenants, or either of them, have to hold the respective tenements set forth in their respective pleas, they being parcels of the tenement in the count mentioned." It was held that this verdict, being certain to a common intent, was sufficient to sustain a judgment.

It was also held that a joint judgment against the tenants for the costs, as well as the land, was correct.

THIS cause was argued by Hughes for the plaintiffs in error, and by M. B. Hardin and Jones for the defendant in error.

entitled to an abatement in the price for a deficiency in the quantity of acres sold. Winch v. Winchester, 1 Ves. & Beat. 375. The Court of Chancery, in decreeing a specific execution of agreements, governs itself by a moral certainty, for it is impossible in the nature of things there should be a mathematical certainty of a good title. Therefore, it was held in England that a reservation in the grant of an estate by the crown of royal mines within the premises was not such a blemish in the title as would excuse the vendee from taking it; because it seems the crown had no power to grant a license to any person to come upon a subject's estate and search for such mines; and even if it had the power, it was extremely improbable that it would ever be exercised. Lyddal v. Weston, 2 Atk. 20. So, also, in this country, where A contracted to convey to B, "by a good and valid conveyance in law," a farm, which was originally parcel of a large tract of ground granted by the proprietor of a manor to the ancestor of A, in fee, "yielding and paying to the grantor, his heirs and assigns, the yearly rent of ten shillings," the proportion of which quitrent on the farm was 54 cents a year; the existence of the quitrent being known to B at the time of the contract, it was held that the existence of such an incumbrance (if it were any) was no objection to a decree for a specific performance of the contract. Ten Broek v. Livingston, 1 Johns. Chan. R. 357.

In general, the vendor may compel a specific performance, if he can make a good title at the time of the decree, although he had not a good title when the land ought to have been conveyed according to the terms of the contract. Langford v. Pitt, 2 Pere Will, 630; Mortlocke v. Buller, 10 Ves. 315; Coffin v. Cooper, 14 Ves. 205; Hepburn v. Auld, 5 Cranch, 262; Hepburn et al. v. Dunlop et al., Ante, vol. 1, p. 179. Where, after bill, answer, and replication, no further steps were taken in the cause for upwards of twenty years, this was held as not of itself a reason for refusing a specific performance, there being acquiescence on both sides. Cain v. Allen, 2 Dow. 289. And where an agreement for the sale of lands was suffered to remain unexecut-

This is a writ of right for the recovery of lands brought in the form prescribed by the statute of Kentucky, in which the demandant described his land by metes and bounds, and counted against the tenants jointly. To this count the tenants demurred, and upon a joinder the demurrer was overruled by the court, and upon motion of the tenants, leave was given to them to withdraw the demurrer and plead anew. A motion was then made to the court, by the tenants, to compel the demandant to count against them severally, upon the ground that they held separate and distinct tenements, parcels of the land demanded; which motion was overruled by the court. And, in our judgment, this was very properly done, for the matter was pleadable in abatement only; and by pleading in bar, the tenants admitted their joint seizin of the freehold, and lost the opportunity to plead a several tenancy. Assuming that at common law, a writ of right patent may be brought against divers tenants, who hold their lands severally, and that the demandant may count against them severally, it does not follow that this doctrine applies to a writ of right close; but, if it did, and the demandant should, in such case, count against the tenants jointly, and the tenants should plead to the merits, it would, for all the purposes of the suit, be an admission of the joint tenancy. And the clause in the statute of Kentucky, requiring that where several tenements are demanded, the contents, situation, and boundaries of each shall be inserted in the *count, has not affected this rule. It [*308 supposes that the several tenements are held by the same tenants. The tenants next moved the court to allow them severally to plead, in addition to the mise, or general issue, that neither ed for fourteen years, the vendee having taken, and continued to hold, possession; the court, under the peculiar facts of the case, decreed a specific performance of the contract. Waters v. Travis, 9 Johns. R. 466. But, as a general rule, the court will not suffer a party at the distance of [*305 years, to come to the court and say that he is ready to make a good title, and demand a specific performance. Jenkins v. Hiles, 6 Ves. 646; Wynn v. Morgan, 7 Ves. 205. And the parties may make time of the essence of the agreement, so that if there be a default at the day, without any just excuse, and without any waiver afterwards, the court will not interfere to help the party in default. Benedict v. Lynch, 1 Johns. Chan. Rep. 370.

The Court of Chancery will not, except under very particular circumstances, upon a bill for the specific performance of a contract, if the party be not entitled to a specific performance, direct an issue of quantum damnificatus, or a reference to the master to ascertain the damages. The plaintiff, if he chooses that remedy, must resort to law, it not being like the case of a defect of title as to part, or of quality, or quantity, where a specific performance may be decreed as to so much as the vendor is able to perform, and a compensation to the vendee for the residue. Todd v. Gee, 17 Ves. 273. But where the defendant has put it out of his power to perform the contract, the bill will be retained, and it will be referred to the master to assess the plaintiff's damages. Denton v. Stewart, 1 Fonb. 38, note y; and 165, note b; and 1 Ves. 329; 17 Ves. 276, note b; Greenaway v. Adams, 12 Ves. 395. And where a specific performance was refused, because the contract was within the statute of frauds, yet the plaintiff having sustained an injury for which he was entitled to compensation, and for which he had no remedy, or at best a doubtful and inadequate remedy at law, the court retained the bill and awarded an issue of quantum damnificatus to assess the damages sustained by the plaintiff by the acts of the defendants. Phillips v. Thompson et al., 1 Johns. Chan. Rep. 131.

the plaintiff nor his ancestor, nor any other under or from whom he derived his title to the demanded premises, were ever actually seized or possessed thereof, or of any part thereof; which motion the court refused to grant. And, in our judgment, this was very properly done. In the first place, this plea was clearly bad, as amounting to the general issue; and, indeed, for other manifest defects. In the next place, it was an application to the mere discretion of the court, which is not a subject of examination upon a writ of error. The court then permitted the tenants to sever in pleading, and to plead the mise severally as to several tenements held by them, parcel of the demanded premises, without answering or pleading anything as to the residue. Upon the propriety of this pleading we give no opinion, as it is not assigned for error by the demandant, and the error, if any, is in favor of the tenants. The replication prescribed by the act of Kentucky, was pleaded to the several pleas; and upon the mise so joined, the parties proceeded to trial. The court being divided upon several points made at the trial, the jury was discharged. At a subsequent term, the tenants again moved the court for leave to withdraw the mise joined, and to plead non-tenure as to some, and several tenancy as to others, in abatement, which was refused by the court; and in our judgment, for the reasons already stated, was properly refused. *The cause was then again tried by a jury, who returned a general verdict for the demandant, which, under the direction of the court, was amended by the jury, and recorded as follows: "The jury find that the demandant hath more mere right to hold the tenement, as he hath demanded, than the tenants, or either of them, have to hold the respective tenements set forth in their respective pleas, they being parcels of the tenement in the count mentioned."

It is objected by the tenants that this verdict is insufficient, because it does not contain a several finding upon the several issues of the tenants, but is a joint finding against them all; and only by inference and argument a finding of the several issues for the plaintiff. This objection cannot be sustained. The verdict expressly and directly affirms the right of the demandant, and denies the right of the tenants to the land contained in their respective pleas, the same being parcel of the land demanded. A verdict, certain to a common intent, is sufficient to sustain a judgment. At the trial, a bill of exceptions was taken. The first point in the exceptions is the refusal of the court, upon the prayer of the counsel for the tenants, to direct the jury that the demandant was not entitled to recover in the suit, upon the proof by the tenants, that they claimed their several tenements under distinct and several titles. This refusal was perfectly correct; for the matter did not go to the merits, and could be taken advantage of only, as has been already stated, by a plea in abatement.

*The next exception is, that the court [*310] allowed a copy of the survey of the land claimed by the demandant to go in evidence to the jury, for the purpose of identifying the same. No ground for this objection has been stated; and it seems to be utterly untenable.

Another exception is, that the court refused to allow, as evidence to the jury, to prove that the demandant did not hold the legal title to 2,000 acres, parcel of the land demanded in this suit, the copies of a certain record of a decree in chancery, in a suit between the demandant and third persons (with whom the tenants had no privity of title or estate), and, also, of a deed made in pursuance of such decree, by which deed 2,000 acres of the land demanded by the writ appeared to be conveyed to third persons. This exception is not now relied on, and is certainly open to various objections. Without adverting to the objections that neither the record nor the deed were properly authenticated, and that it was an attempt to set up an outstanding title in third persons having no privity with the tenants; it is decisive against the admission that the 2,000 acres, or any part thereof, are not shown to be within the boundaries of the land claimed by any of the tenants, or put in issue between the parties.

The last exception is, that the court refused to instruct the jury, that if it should be proved that divers of the tenants had no title to certain parcels of the demanded premises, but that they claimed the same under a third person having the legal title thereof, then, that they ought to find for the said *tenants, because [*311] cause they had no title. This exception is, also, not relied on, and certainly could not be supported, for it could be given in evidence only on a plea of non-tenure.

A motion was afterwards made for a new trial, the proceedings on which, not being matters of error, need not be mentioned.

The only remaining objection, urged as a ground for reversal, is, that the judgment is a joint judgment against the tenants for the costs as well as the land. We are all of opinion that the judgment is right, and that the tenants can take nothing by this objection.

The judgment is, therefore, affirmed with costs.

SHIPP ET AL. v. MILLER'S HEIRS.

An error in description is not fatal in an entry if it does not mislead a subsequent locator. The following entry: "H. M. enters 1,687 acres of land on a treasury warrant, No. 6168, adjoining Chapman Aston on the west side, and Israel Christian on the north, beginning at Christian's north-west corner, running thence west 200 poles; thence north parallel with Aston's line until an east course to Aston's line will include the quantity," was held valid, although no such entry as that referred to could be found in the name of Aston, but the particular description clearly pointed out an entry in the name of Chapman Austin as the one intended, and this, together with Christian's entry, satisfied the calls of H. M.'s entry.

It is a general rule that when all the calls of an entry cannot be complied with, because some are vague, or repugnant, the latter may be rejected or controlled by other material calls, which are consistent and certain. Course and distance yield to known, visible, and definite objects; but they do not yield, unless to calls more material and equally certain. Chapman Austin's entry calling to lie "on the dividing ridge between Hinkston's Fork and the south fork of Licking, beginning two miles north of Harrod's Lick, at a large buffalo road, and running about north for quantity," and there being no buffalo road two miles north of Harrod's Lick (a place of general notoriety), it was determined that a call for a large buffalo road might be rejected, and the entry supported by the definite call for course and distance.

It is a settled rule that where no other figure is called for in an entry, it is to be surveyed in a square coincident with the cardinal points, *and large enough to contain the given [*317 quantity, and that the point of beginning is deemed to be the centre of the base line of such square. Chapman Austin's entry calling to run about a north course for quantity, the word "about" is to be rejected, and the land is to run a due north course, having on each side of a due north line, drawn through the centre of the base, an equal moiety.

The act of Kentucky of 1797, taken in connection with preceding acts, declaring that entries for land shall become void, if not surveyed before the first day of October, 1798, with a proviso allowing to infants and femes covert three years after their several disabilities are removed to complete surveys on their entries; it was held, that if any one or more of the joint owners be under the disability of infancy or coverture, it brings the entry within the saving of the proviso as to all the other owners. Distinction between this statute and a statute of limitations of personal actions.

A call for a spring branch generally, or for a spring branch to include a marked tree at the head of such spring, is not a sufficiently specific locative call; and where further certainty is attempted to be given by a call for course and distance, and the course is not exact, and the distance, called for is a mile and a half from the place where the object is to be found, the entry is void for uncertainty.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court for the District of Kentucky.

This cause was argued by Talbot for the appellant, and by Sheffey for the appellees.

4, 88, 89, 92; Bracton, lib. 5, ch. 3, s. 3, p. 329; Id. ch. 6, p. 333. On the other hand, a writ of right close is always directed to the sheriff, and was immediately returnable into the Court of Common Pleas. Booth, 91. The form of it is, "The King, to the sheriff of ——. Command A, that he justly, and without delay, render unto B, one messuage with the appurtenances which he claims to be his right and inheritance, and whereof he complains that the said A unjustly deforces him; and unless he shall so do, and if the said B shall give you security of prosecuting his claim, then summon by good summoners the said A, that he appear before our justices at Westminster, on, &c., to show wherefore he hath not done it, and have you there the summoners and this writ. Witness, &c." Reg. Brev. 4; Fitz. N. B. 2 F; Booth, 91; 3 Wils. 419.

This difference between a writ of right patent and a writ of right close, may well warrant a distinction in respect to the causes of action to be joined in it. A writ of right patent, being a mere authority to the lord to take cognizance of the suit at the complaint of the plaintiff, may well include divers tenements held by several tenants, whereof the plaintiff is deforced. Nor are the rights of the several tenants affected by such joinder; for, as to them, the subsequent summons is the first process (Booth, 4, 92); and in this they are severed, each tenant being summoned to answer only for the tenements held by himself. And, for this purpose, where the land is severally held by several tenants, the writ always specifies the quantity of land in the possession of each. Reg. Brev. 1 b. The position, therefore, stated by Fitzherbert (Nat. Brev. 2 D), that a writ of right may be brought against divers tenants who hold their lands severally, may be good law when applied (as he applies it) to a writ of right patent. But it is not thence to be inferred that the same doctrine is to be applied to all the subsequent proceedings; and that in the subsequent summons, process, and pleading, the tenants are to be joined in the same manner as if they were [*313] joint tenants of the whole land. In fact, the summons in a writ of right patent is a several process against each tenant for the land held severally by him; and in this respect it is exactly what the original precept is in a writ of right close.

When once the tenant is summoned into court, either upon a writ of right patent or a writ of right close, the same exceptions and pleadings in abatement or in bar, and the same defense upon the merits, equally applies in a suit upon the one as the other. Non-tenure, joint tenancy, sole tenancy, and several tenancy, are good pleas in abatement, wherever they apply to any parcel of the land demanded of any particular tenant or tenants. Bracton, speaking on this subject, says, "tunc demum videndum an tenens totam rem teneat quam petitur, cum certa res debeat in iudicium deduci, vel si ejus partem tunc quotam, vel si omnino nihil, et similiter si res petita pertineat ad jurisdictionem judicantis; et ideo petitur visus rei petite, quia ex hoc competere poterit exceptio tenenti, ne sit actio inanis cum tenente, cum rem restituere non possit vel totam secundum quod petitur." Bract. lib. 5, ch. 7, fo. 378. And he again treats more fully on the subject in the book, de Exceptionibus, "sunt etiam quædam quæ visum sequuntur et de quibus certificari poterit tenens antiquam petens ei visum fecerit; et certa res in iudicium deducatur, de qua debeat tenens respondere, ut tunc scribi possit, si totam rem petitam tenuerit, vel ejus partem, vel etiam nihil, et sic fiat de pertinentiis, &c. &c. Et post modum, si qua competat ex ipsa re, ut si nihil inde teneat vel non nisi ejus partem, et idem de pertinentiis." Bracton, lib. 5, de Except. ch. 1, fol. 400. "Item cadit breve, si tenens minus teneat, quam petens petat, secus tamen si plus teneat." Bracton, fol. 414, b. And in another place, speaking of the doctrine that when a writ is bad in part, it is bad in the whole, he says, "et cum breve ita in se fuerit vitiosum in aliqua parte, in nulla parte valebit, quantum ad unam actionem; secus esset, si plures sint ibi actiones ratione plurium tenentium. Et si unus petat per unum breve feodum unius militis in una villa et versus alium in eodem brevi feodum alterius militis eodem villa vel in diversis, quamvis cadat breve de feodo unius militis, nihilominus stabit de feodo alterius militis versus eundem, quia ibi sunt diversæ actiones propter diversitates tenementorum, quamvis breve unicum. Item eodem modo erunt actiones plures ratione diversarum personarum et rerum ubi plures sunt tenentes." Bracton, fol. 414, a. Bracton here manifestly refers to a writ of right patent, where several tenements are demanded in the writ of several tenants severally, and in such case he considers, *that the writ may abate as to one and remain as to the other, not because they may be joined in the same action, but because the suit against them is considered as several actions (diversæ actiones). In a subsequent place, the same subject is again mentioned, "Cum autem tenens in calling the writ of right in Tyssen v. Clarke, 3 Wils. 419, 541, 558, a writ of right patent, for it was a writ of right close.

STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in equity brought by the appellees, who are the heirs at law and devisees of Henry Miller, deceased, to be relieved against the claims of the appellants under prior patents to a tract of land, to which the appellees assert a prior equitable title under a prior entry by their ancestor.

318*] *On the 11th of December, 1782, the said Henry Miller made the following entry: "Henry Miller enters 1,687 acres of land on a treasury warrant, No. 6,168, adjoining Chapman Aston on the west side, and Israel Christian on the north, beginning at Christian's north-west corner, running thence west 200 poles, thence north parallel with Aston's line until an east course to Aston's line will include the quantity." Henry Miller died in 1796, and in 1804 this entry was surveyed, and after that time a patent issued thereupon in due form of law. At the time of the death of Miller, and also of the survey of the entry, several of the plaintiffs were under age, and some of them at the commencement of the suit continued to be under age.

There was not, on the 11th of December, 1782, any entry upon record in the entry-taker's books in the name of Chapman Aston. But there were several in the name of Chapman Austin, and several in the name of Isaac Christian. One in the name of Chapman Austin is dated 26th of June, 1780, for 4,000 acres of land lying on Red River, and another in the name of Israel Christian, dated the 5th of December, 1782, for 2,000 acres of land lying on the same river; but there is no proof in the cause that these entries are in the neighborhood of each other. The entries relied on by the complainants as those referred to in Miller's entry are as follows: "On the 26th of June, 1780, Chapman Austin enters 4,000 acres on the dividing ridge between Hinkston's Fork and the south fork of Licking, beginning two miles north of Harrod's Lick at a large buffalo road, and *running about a north course for [*319 quantity." "On the 29th of November, 1782, Israel Christian, assignee of Archibald Thompson, enters 200 acres of land upon a military warrant, No. 193, adjoining an entry of Chapman Austin, at his south-west corner on the dividing ridge between Hinkston's and Stoner's Fork, two miles north of Harrod's Lick, running thence west 200 poles, thence north until an east course to strike Austin's line will include the quantity."

The appellants having the elder grant, the first question arising in the cause is as to the validity of the entry of Miller. It is, in the first place, contended, that it is void, because it contains no sufficient description of the posivisum habuerit, vel quod tantundem valet, scire poterit utrum petenti respondere teneatur, et ad breve secum vel non teneatur secundum quod tenuerit totam rem nomine proprio, vel alieno, vel nihil inde tenuerit, vel non nisi ejus partem; quia si totam non tenuerit, amittere non potest quod non habet, et ita cadit breve, sed non actio, nisi ita sit quod petens ostendere possit quod tenens teneat in dominico et in servitio, nisi tenens docere possit contrarium, quod nec in dominico nec in servitio, &c., &c. In hæc quidem actione per breve de recto sicut in qua libet alia actione per quam petitur res corporalis designare oportet petentem quæ et qualis sit res quæ petitur, ut si sit res immobilis sicut tenementum designare oportet qualitatem et quantitatem, &c. Item utrum tota petatur an ejus pars, et ne plus petatur a petente quam tenens teneat." Bracton, lib. 5, ch. 27, fol. 431, b. 432, a; Vide also, Id. p. 433, b. Fleta, lib. 5, ch. 5, s. 4, asserts the same doctrine: "Item continetur in brevi qui terram illam tenet, ad quod excipi poterit quod totum non tenet sed alius talis tenet inde tantum." These quotations have been the more largely made from these venerable writers, with a view to show how deeply and early these doctrines are to be found in the rudiments of the common law.

It has been very justly observed by Booth (ch. 11, p. 31), that in real actions may be pleaded in abatement of the writ, joint tenancy, sole tenancy, and several tenancy. And although it is said that in a writ of nuper oblit, in an assize, or in any other action where no land certain is demanded, several tenancy is not pleadable (Bro. Sev. Tenancy, 18; 2 Leon, 8), yet this is to be understood, that several tenancy is not pleadable to the writ; for after a plaint in an assize, several tenancy may well be pleaded in abatement. Stepkin v. Wentworth, 11 Yer, 244, a; Booth, 84, 277. And several tenancy, if well pleaded and found true, abates the whole writ; and the cause assigned for this by Fincledon, (ch. J., in 41 Edw. III. 20, b), is because the tenants cannot answer in common. Fitzherbert laid down the same rule in 27 Hen. 8, 30, and said "ceo several tenancy va in abatement de tout le breve, et si il soit tried versus le demandant donques tout son breve abatera, et nous impoimous donc judgment pour le demandant sur un male breve." Brook's Abrid. Several Tenancy, 1. The same rule is recognized in Theldall's *Dig. lib. 11, ch. 31, s. 7. Nor is there a single case in the books, in which it has been argued or held that several tenancy is not a good plea in abatement to a writ of right. On the contrary, the reasons for the plea as manifestly apply to this action as any other real action, and the ancient writers who treat on the subject evidently presuppose its legal validity; and the more modern authorities are conclusive on the point. When, therefore, the court in the above case, in allusion to the passage above quoted from Fitzherbert's Natura Brevium (2 D.) state that "assuming at common law a writ of right patent may be brought against several tenants who hold their lands severally, and that the demandant may count against them severally, it does not, therefore, follow that this doctrine applies to a writ of right close;" it is manifest that the court have reference to the different natures of the two writs in their original state; for upon a view and after a count in a writ of right patent, if several tenements are jointly demanded of several tenants, who are jointly summoned, they may plead several tenancy in abatement of the count or lands put in view upon the writ. And as a writ of right close demands the tenements directly of the tenants, they may plead several tenancy directly to the writ, for in a præcipe quod reddat it is a good plea in the writ. Com. Dig. F. 12; Thel. Dig., lib. 5, ch. 3, s. 1, ch. 4, s. 2; 27 Hen. 8, 30.

In the United States all writs of right are returnable into the common law courts of the state and are directed to and returnable by the sheriff or other public officers. They are, therefore, writs of right close, and subject to the general doctrines of the common law applicable to such writs; and it is manifest that the doctrine of Fitzherbert (even supposing it to be law as to writs of right patent) cannot be admitted to control those general doctrines, or take away the right of pleading joint tenancy, sole tenancy, or several tenancy, in abatement of such writs.

Writs of right, since the reign of Queen Elizabeth, have gradually become obsolete in England; or of such rare occurrence, that the learning respecting them is not as well known as it deserves to be. Indeed, a modern treatise upon the general nature and structure of real actions, and the proper pleadings and evidence in each, is a desideratum in the science of jurisprudence. We may, however, respectfully refer those who may be desirous of a more thorough knowledge of the writ of right to the title Droit, in the great abridgments of Brook, Fitzherbert, Comyns, and Viner, to the learned note of Mr. Sergeant Williams, 2 Saund. Rep. 45; to Booth on Real Actions; *to [*316 Reeves's History of the law; and particularly to 1 Reeves's History, ch. 7, p. 396, et seq.; and 3 Reeves's History, 45, and above all, to the venerable Bracton, lib. 5, fol. 327, et seq.; where he treats of the writ of right and its incidents.

tion of the land, and no specific reference to any other definite entries to make it certain. It is, in the next place, contended, that it is void, because Chapman Austin's entry, on which it is dependent, is void for uncertainty.

There is certainly a mistake in Miller's entry, as to the name of Aston, and the defect cannot be cured by considering Aston and Austin as one name, for they are not of the same sound. But an error in description is not fatal in an entry, if it does not mislead a subsequent locator. Upon searching the entry-book no such name could be found as Chapman Aston; and if Miller's entry had only called to adjoin Aston, there would have been great force in the objection. But it calls also to adjoin Israel Christian's entry on the north, and to begin at his north-west corner. A subsequent locator would, therefore, necessarily be led to examine that entry. On such examination he could not fail to observe that it calls to adjoin an entry of Chapman Austin, at his south-west corner, on the dividing ridge between Hinkston's and Stoner's Fork, two miles north of Harrod's Lick. This specific description would clearly point out the particular entry to which it refers. It could be no other than the entry of Chapman Austin for 4,000 acres, already stated; for that calls for the same ridge, and to begin at the same distance from Harrod's Lick. Two entries would thus be found adjoining each other, which would, as to position and course, perfectly satisfy the calls of Miller's entry. No other entries could be found which would present the same coincidences. A subsequent locator could not, therefore, doubt that these were the entries really referred to in Miller's entry, and that Chapman Aston was a misnomer of Chapman Austin. The entry, then, of Miller, contains in itself a sufficient certainty of description, if the entries to which it refers are valid; for *id certum est quod certum reddi potest.

As no objection is alleged against Christian's entry, all consideration of it may at once be dismissed. The validity of the entry of Chapman Austin remains to be examined. It calls to lie "on the dividing ridge between Hinkston's Fork and the south fork of Licking, beginning two miles north of Harrod's Lick at a large buffalo road, and running about north for quantity." It is conceded that Harrod's lick was, at the time of the entry, a place of general notoriety; and it is proved that there was no buffalo road two miles north of that 321 lick. The nearest buffalo road was, at its nearest approach, more than two miles from the same lick, and crossed the ridge at more than three miles distance from it; and a line drawn due north from the lick would not strike that road until after it had crossed the ridge at about four miles distance from the lick. The calls, then, in the entry cannot be completely satisfied in the terms in which they are expressed. The general descriptive call to lie on the dividing ridge, as well as the call for distance, must be rejected, if a buffalo road about four miles north of the lick were to be deemed a sufficient compliance with the call for a large buffalo road; for the whole land would then lie, not on, but beyond the ridge. Such a construction of the entry would be unreasonable. Is, then, the entry void for re-pugnancy or uncertainty, or can it be sustained by rejecting the call for a large buffalo road? It is a general rule that when all the calls of an entry cannot be complied with, because some are vague, or repugnant, the latter may be rejected or controlled by other material calls, which are consistent and certain. On this account, course and distance yield to known, visible, and definite objects. But course and distance do not yield unless to calls more material and equally certain. The locative calls in this entry are for a point two miles north of Harrod's Lick, and for a large buffalo road. If we reject the first call, the entry is void for uncertainty, for there is no definite starting point. If we reject the last call, the other is perfectly certain. The general leaning of courts has been to support entries, if it could be done by any reasonable construction. The law, indeed, declares [*322 that every entry should contain a description of the land so certain that subsequent locators might be able to ascertain it with precision, and locate the adjoining residuum. But that description is held to be sufficiently certain which, by due diligence, inquiry, and search in the neighborhood, will enable a locator to find the land. A locator having this entry in his hands would first proceed to Harrod's Lick, as a notorious object which was to direct all his subsequent inquiries. Upon measuring off the two miles north from the lick he would arrive at a point clearly described in the entry. He would find himself very near the dividing ridge between Hinkston's Fork and the south fork of Licking, upon which the land is unequivocally declared to lie. But he could find no buffalo road in that direction until after he had crossed the ridge, nor could he find any such road within any reasonable distance in any other direction. Under such circumstances, it is not easy to perceive how he could be misled. Being arrived at a spot, to which he was directed by a definite locative call, which he could not mistake, and by a general call which is perfectly satisfied, he would scarcely be induced to direct it in search of another call, which was not to be found in the neighborhood, and which, without the first, would be uncertain and indefinite. In the opinion of the court the call for a large buffalo road may be rejected, and the entry of Chapman Austin be supported by the other definite call for course and distance. In this opinion we are the more confirmed by the admission of counsel, that the same en- [*323 try has been sustained in the state courts of Kentucky.

Supposing the entry of Chapman Austin to be good, the next inquiry is, whether it is rightly surveyed; for if it is, then Christian's and Miller's entries are, also, rightly surveyed. It is contended that, as no base or figure is given by the entry, the land cannot be laid off in any direction; and if so, neither the survey made by order of the Circuit Court, nor, indeed, any other survey, can be good. But it is a settled rule, which has been repeatedly recognized by this court, that where no other figure is called for in an entry, it is to be surveyed in a square, coincident with the cardinal points, and large enough to contain the given quantity; and that the point of beginning is to be deemed the centre of the base line of such square. In the present case, a point two miles distant from Harrod's Lick is to be taken as the centre of the base line of a square, to contain the given quantity of land. The entry calls to run about a north course for quantity; but, according to the course of decisions in Kentucky, the word "about" is to be rejected, and the land is to run a due north course, having on each side of a due north line, drawn through the centre of the base, an equal moiety. This is precisely the manner in which the survey was directed to be executed by the court below.

Another objection to the title of the plaintiffs is, that the survey on Miller's entry was not executed and returned within the time prescribed 324] by law. *The act of 1797, taken in connection with preceding acts, declares, that entries for land in general shall become void if not surveyed before the first day of October, 1798; with a proviso, allowing to infants and femes covert three years after their several disabilities are removed to complete surveys on their entries. The ancestor of the plaintiffs died in 1796, and some of them then were, and still continue to be, under the disability of infancy. The present entry was not surveyed until 1804.

It is argued that the proviso does not save any entries except where all the owners are under the disability of infancy or coverture, at the time when the general limitation takes effect. And it is likened to the case decided by this court, where a joint personal action was held not to be saved by the disability of one of the plaintiffs, from the operation of the statute of limitations. (Marsteller v. McLean, 7 Cranch, 156.) It is admitted that there is some analogy between the cases; but, as they do not arise upon the same statute, a decision in the one furnishes no absolute authority to govern the other. There are, also, differences in the nature and objects of these statutes, which might well justify a different construction. The statute of limitations is emphatically termed a statute of repose; it is made for the purpose of quieting rights and shutting out stale and fraudulent claims. It has, therefore, always been construed strictly against the plaintiff, and no case has been excepted from its operation, unless within the strict letter or manifest equity of some exception in the act itself. The statutes 325] of Kentucky, allowing *further time to owners to survey their entries, is made with a different aspect. It is to save a forfeiture to the government; and acts, imposing forfeitures, are always construed strictly as against the government, and liberally as to the other parties. It is manifest that the act meant to protect the rights of infants and femes covert from forfeiture until three years after the disability should be removed. Yet if the argument at bar be correct, their rights are completely gone in all cases where they are not the sole and exclusive owners. Such a construction would materially impair the apparent beneficial intention of the legislature. If, on the other hand, they are authorized in such cases to have their entries surveyed and returned, so as to protect their own joint interest, no reason is perceived why such survey may not be justly held to inure to the benefit of all the other joint owners. The courts of Kentucky have already decided Wheat. 2.

this question; and held, that if any one joint owner be under disability, it brings the entry within the saving of the proviso, as to all the other owners. (Kennedy v. Bruce, 2 Bibb's Rep., 371.) This is a decision upon a local law, which forms a rule of property; and this court has always held in the highest respect decisions of state courts on such subjects. We are satisfied it is a reasonable interpretation of the statute, and upon principle or authority see no ground for drawing it into doubt.

The title of the plaintiffs being established, it is next to be compared with the titles of the respondents. It is conceded on all sides that none of the titles of the latter are of superior dignity to that of *the plaintiffs, except 326 the title claimed under an entry of Thomas Swearingen, on a military warrant. This entry is as follows: "On the 26th of April, 1780, Thomas Swearingen enters 1,000 acres in Kentucky, by virtue of a military warrant, for military services performed by him last war, on a spring branch about six miles a north-eastwardly course from Stoner's Spring, to include a tree marked A. B. C. S. T. at the head of said spring." Stoner's Spring is admitted to be a place of notoriety; but the marked tree and spring branch, instead of being at the distance of six miles, is found at the distance of four miles and a half, and in a course not north-east-erly. The call for a spring branch generally, or for a spring branch, to include a marked tree at the head of the spring, is not a sufficiently specific locative call. It requires further certainty to point out its position; and this is attempted to be given in the present entry by the call for course and distance. The course is not exact, and the distance called for is a mile and a half from the place where the object is to be found. It is the opinion of this court that it would be unreasonable to require a subsequent locator to search for the object at so great a distance from the point laid down in the entry; and the entry must, therefore, be pronounced void for uncertainty.

MARSHALL, Ch. J.. In this case I dissent from the opinion which has been delivered on one point—the validity of Austin's entry. I am not satisfied that the call for the buffalo road ought to be discarded as immaterial. It appears to me to bear a *strong analogy to a call 327 for a marked tree. It is an object of notoriety, distinguishable from other objects, peculiar to itself, and which would be looked for by subsequent locators. Finding a buffalo road in the neighborhood, the judgment would be divided between the call for that road and the call for course and distance.

Understanding that this entry has been determined in Kentucky to be sufficiently certain, I would have acquiesced in that decision had it not also been stated that the question on its validity did not come before the court. Under these circumstances, we should, had the court thought the entry invalid, have suspended our opinion until the case could be inspected. This delay is rendered unnecessary by the opinion that the location may be sustained.

Decree affirmed.

THE ANNA MARIA.

A suit by the owners of captured property, lost through the fault and negligence of the captors, for compensation in damages.

The right of visitation and search is a belligerent right which cannot be drawn into question, but must be conducted with as much regard to the safety of the vessel detained, as is consistent with a thorough examination of her character and voyage. 328*] *Detention, after search, pronounced to be unjustifiable, under the circumstances of the case.

The value of the captured vessel, and the prime cost of the cargo, with all charges, and the premium of insurance, where it has been paid, allowed in ascertaining the damages.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court for the District of Maryland.

This case was argued by Harper and Swann for the appellants, and by Winder and Jones for the respondents.

The schooner Anna Maria, belonging to citizens of the United States, sailed from Alexandria, on the 27th of September, 1812, laden with a cargo also belonging to American citizens, and bound to St. Bartholomews, a neutral island. On the 16th of October the schooner made the Virgin Islands, where she continued, it being calm, until the 19th. About midday, on the 19th, light breezes sprung up from the eastward, and the Anna Maria, as stated by her master, was using her utmost endeavors to make St. Bartholomews. It appears, however, that the vessel headed towards St. Thomas's, an island in possession of the British. In this situation a sail, which proved to be the Nonsuch, privateer, of Baltimore, was discovered bearing east north-east from them, which gave chase under English colors, and soon overtook them. The Anna Maria was boarded about four in the afternoon, and her master with all her papers, sent on board the Nonsuch. A search for other papers was commenced and 329*] continued for *about two hours. The boarding officer, who had appeared in the disguise of a British officer, then returned to the Nonsuch, being succeeded by another officer, who kept possession of the Anna Maria with two men, and was ordered to continue under the lee of the Nonsuch till the succeeding day, when it was intended, as alleged, to continue the search. The whole crew of the Anna Maria were taken out, and with her master, put in irons. The next morning, about nine, two other vessels were descried, and, as stated by the master of the Anna Maria, and by one of the officers of the privateer, were chased by the Nonsuch. In the chase she lost sight of the Anna Maria, and soon afterwards fell in with her. The officer, with the two men on board her, attempted, as they say, to bring her into the United States; but, being in want of water, wood and candles, they went into St. Jago del Cuba, and sold a part of the cargo to enable them to purchase these necessities. In attempting to bring the vessel out of port she was run aground and injured, after which she was sold with the residue of her cargo, and the proceeds remained in the hands of the American consul for those who may be entitled to them.

The Nonsuch soon afterwards returned to the United States, and a libel was filed by the owners of the Anna Maria and cargo, against the owners of the Nonsuch, in the District Court of Maryland, claiming compensation in damages for the injury they had sustained. This libel was dismissed by the District Court, *and the decree affirmed by the Circuit [*330 Court; on which the cause was brought, by appeal, to this court.

Swann and Harper, for the appellants, admitted that the owners of the captured property could not come into a court of prize, unless with clean hands, to claim restitution in damages. If the original seizure was justifiable, and there was no subsequent misconduct on the part of the captors, they could not be compelled to make restitution. But it is the duty of captors to send in the captured vessel immediately for adjudication before the proper tribunal, and to the most convenient port. This they had not done, and were therefore responsible to the owners in damages. Even if the commander of the privateer acted bona fide, he acted with gross negligence and unskillfulness, and the authority of the case of the *Der Mohr*¹ is enough to charge him with restitution in value.

Winder and Jones, for the respondents, argued, upon the facts of the case, that the real destination of the captured vessel was to supply the enemy, and that there was probable cause of seizure. If so, damages could not be recovered. There was sufficient ground for carrying in for adjudication, or ground of condemnation as prize; either would be sufficient to justify the captors in the seizure; the only question is, whether the right of seizure was *properly exercised. The prize law [*331 does not prescribe any particular mode of exercising the right of visitation and search, nor when, nor into what particular port the prize is to be sent for adjudication. It is the exercise of a military discretion; and the case of The Der Mohr shows that the captors are not responsible for an accidental loss after the capture, if there is probable cause of seizure and carrying in for adjudication.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court, and after stating the facts, proceeded as follows:

To sustain the claim of the libelants, the first point to be established is the fairness of the voyage. It being admitted that the vessel and cargo were American, the only inquiry is, was the Anna Maria really destined for a neutral port?

Her papers show that she was destined for St. Bartholomews; her master swears that he intended to reach that port, and no other; and that he was using his best endeavors to make it when he was stopped by the Nonsuch.

The circumstances which might create doubt respecting the truth of this testimony, are, his situation and course when descried by the Nonsuch. He was within six or eight leagues of St. Thomas's, and steering a course which brought him nearer to that Island. But his place is accounted for by the current and the calm which had preceded his capture; and his course is stated by himself, and his testimony *is not contradicted, to have been calculated to enable him to gain St. Bartholomew's, to the leeward of which he had fallen. This representation is supported by the fact, that being at the Virgin Islands on the 16th, he might, by availing himself of the current, have reached St. Thomas's before he was descried by the Nonsuch. It is also supported by the great improbability of his attempting to enter an enemy's port without obtaining a license, which would have protected him from hostile capture in that port, as well as on his voyage to it. That he had not a license is proved, not only by his own oath, but by the fact that, although the master and the crew, as well as the vessel, have remained in possession of the captors, no license has been found, and there is no reason to believe that it could have been secreted, and it is not probable that it would have been destroyed on the appearance of the Nonsuch, since she chased and boarded under British colors.

The voyage, then, must be considered as entirely fair. The next subject of inquiry is, the right to visit and detain for search. This is a belligerent right which cannot be drawn into question. As little can it be questioned that the situation of the Anna Maria justified a full and rigorous search. But this search ought to have been conducted with as much regard to the rights and safety of the vessel detained as was consistent with a thorough examination of her character and voyage. All that was necessary to this object was lawful; all that transcended it was unlawful.

333*] *When the Anna Maria was boarded, her master gave a plain and true account of the character of the vessel and cargo, which was verified by the ship's papers, and which does not appear to have been doubted. But although the vessel and cargo were American, the trade might be hostile; and the right to examine fully into this fact was complete.

There was no prevarication in the statements of the master which could excite suspicion, and the search for other papers was continued for two hours without intermission. Although the character of British officers was maintained, nothing indicating British connection in the voyage was discovered; and, although the trunks were broken open and searched, no additional papers were found. It was pressing the right of search as far as it could bear, to determine on repeating it the next day; and an inattention to the safety of the Anna Maria, which only her neighborhood to the island of St. Thomas could excuse, longer to detain her. But there is some reason to doubt whether further search was the real object of this detention. It does not appear to have been recommenced at nine the next morning; and this leads to the opinion that the vessel was detained, not so much to make further search as in the hope of drawing from the master, or some of the crew, who were all in irons, something which might lead to the condemnation of the vessel and cargo. This conduct must be viewed with much lenity to be pardoned. But whatever excuse may be made for the detention thus far, none can be given for the transactions which remain to be noticed.

334*] *Before the captain of the Nonsuch left the Anna Maria, in pursuit of other objects, he ought to have decided either to seize her as prize or to restore her. Had he seized her as prize, her master, at least, ought to have been returned to her, and her papers should have been sealed and put in possession of a prize-master. If he determined not to seize her as prize, her master and crew ought to have been restored, that she might have prosecuted her voyage. No apology can be made for leaving her in the condition in which she was placed. Stripped of her crew and of her papers, left in possession of an officer and two men, without orders whither to proceed, she was exposed to dangers; for the loss resulting from which, those who placed her in this situation must be responsible. Had she been regularly captured, many of the difficulties encountered in St. Jago del Cuba might have been avoided; had she been restored, she might, and probably would, have reached her port of destination in safety.

The proceedings of the Nonsuch, after a search, converted the whole transaction into a wanton marine trespass, for which no sufficient excuse has been given.

However meritorious may have been the services of the private armed vessels of the United States, in the aggregate, those individuals who have acted with this culpable disregard to the rights of others ought not to escape the animadversion of the law. The conduct of the officers of the Nonsuch on board the Anna Maria was unjustifiably licentious. Breaking open trunks when keys were offered [335 them, taking out the crew and putting them in irons, and leaving her in this situation, were acts not to be excused. The honor and the character of the nation are concerned in repressing such irregularities; and the justice of the court requires that compensation should be made for the injury which the libelants have sustained.

The sentence of the Circuit Court must be reversed, and the cause remanded to the Circuit, with directions to reverse the sentence of the District Court, and to direct commissioners to ascertain the amount of damages sustained by the libelants; in doing which the value of the vessel, and the prime cost of the cargo, with all charges, and the premium of insurance, where it has been paid, with interest, are to be allowed. Out of this decree must be deducted the amount of the proceeds of the Anna Maria and cargo, unless the libelants shall choose to abandon those proceeds to the defendants.

COLSON v. THOMPSON.

Bill for the specific execution of an alleged agreement to convey to the plaintiff one-third of a certain tract of land in Kentucky, belonging to the defendant, as a compensation for locating and surveying the same. Bill dismissed.

In order to obtain a specific performance of a contract, its terms should be so precise as that neither party can reasonably misunderstand them.

1.—Vide Appendix, Note I.

If the contract be vague and uncertain, or the evidence to establish it be insufficient, a court of equity will not enforce it, but will leave the party to his legal remedy.

The plaintiff, who seeks for the specific performance of an agreement, must show that he has performed, or offered to perform, on his part, the acts which formed the consideration of the alleged undertaking on the part of the defendant.

APPEAL from a decree of the Circuit Court for the District of Kentucky.

The appellee filed his bill in that court, stating that, in the year 1779, a number of persons, amongst whom was the defendant below, who is the appellant in this court, employed him, the complainant, to locate lands for them, in the then district of Kentucky; that he received from the defendant certain land warrants to the amount of 25,000 acres, which he located for him on the 20th of May, 1780. That the terms on which he was to do the business were, that the owner of the warrants should furnish all the money that should be necessary for locating and surveying the said lands. That the complainant should direct the doing thereof, and receive, for his compensation, what should 337 be given to other persons for similar services. The bill then avers, that the usual proportion which was then generally given to locators for similar services was one-third part of the land so located by them. The complainant further alleges that he was prevented from surveying the above entry by the Indians, who were very troublesome, and who rendered the execution of such business difficult and dangerous; that, during this time, the defendant procured a survey to be executed of the entry made in his name by the complainant, and obtained a patent for the same. The bill admits that the complainant received a sum of money from the defendant, which, however, he charges as paid on account of the expenses attending the locating and surveying the said entry, and not as a compensation for his services. The prayer of the bill is, for a conveyance of one-third part of the above-mentioned tract of 25,000 acres of land. It appears by the exhibits in the cause, that the above entry was surveyed on the 28th October, 1786.

The defendant states in his answer that previously to his employing the complainant to locate and survey his warrants, he received offers from other persons to do the business upon the terms stated in the bill, which he rejected, and that he was induced to authorize his friend, Mr. Webb, to place the warrants in the complainant's hands, in consequence of his having understood that he would undertake the business for a fair compensation in money. That Mr. Peachy, the agent of the defendant, paid to the complainant upwards of 7,000 pounds of tobacco within a few months after the entry was made. The answer [338] further states that the defendant frequently applied to the complainant to have the entry, which he had caused to be made, surveyed; and that, after repeated promises to comply with these demands, made and broken, the complainant confessed that it was not in his power to execute the business, and after claiming the tobacco, which he had received as a compensation for his services, advised the defendant to apply to some other person to attend to the surveying of the entry. The defendant owns, that from the year 1785, when this advice was given, until some time after he claimed his grant, he was frequently in company with the complainant, who, to the best of his recollection, never intimated that he expected to receive any part of the lands, nor was any such demand ever made by the complainant until the institution of this suit in 1794.

There was an amended bill filed in this cause, and the above answer was, by the agreement of parties, received as an answer to this bill. The amended bill states that the entry of the 25,000 acres of land was made by the intervention of a Mr. Shelby, a particular friend of the complainant. That the defendant caused the said entry to be surveyed without consulting the complainant on the subject, although he avers that he was always ready and willing, whenever Specific performance of a contract for sale of land will be decreed where the vendee has performed his part, and gone into possession with consent of the vendor. Thompson v. Scott, 1 McCord's Ch. 39.

The party who comes to compel specific performance must show that he has performed on his part, or that he has been able and willing, and still was ready, to perform his part of the contract. Ib.

An obligor shall not be permitted to avail himself of an uncertainty in the boundaries of the land he contracts to convey, so as to avoid a specific performance; but the court will decree a conveyance according to the best lights which the circumstances afford. Kennedy v. Davis, 2 Bibb. 344.

A court of equity will decree a specific performance of a contract for the sale of land, if the vendor is able to make good title at any time before decree pronounced, although he had not such title at the

A court of equity will not generally decree specific performance in favor of a party who has not performed, especially if injury from such non-performance has resulted to the other party; but if the defendant has taken possession and paid part of the purchase money, and executed the agreement in part, the court will consider him as having waived his objection to plaintiff's neglect, and will decree execution of the agreement. Vail v. Nelson, 4 Rand. 478; Ramsey v. Brallsford, 2 Desau. 562.

he might have been called upon for this purpose, to show the beginning and other calls of the entry, and to give the necessary directions to the surveyor.

The depositions taken in the cause prove, that at the time when the entry was made it was usual in Kentucky for the locators of lands to 339 receive from *the owners, as a compensation for their services, a proportion of the land so located, besides the expenses, which might be incurred in surveying the land, which the locator received from the owner in money. But what that proportion was is not precisely ascertained by any of the witnesses. They state, generally, that it was sometimes one-third and sometimes one-half. Mr. Peachy, the agent and attorney in fact of the defendant below, from the year 1780, when the defendant went to the West Indies until his return, states that he had lands located in Kentucky, for a part of which he allowed the locator one-fifth, and for the residue one-tenth, of the land located, as a compensation for his services, beside paying the expenses of surveying, &c. This witness further states that he never heard or understood in conversation with the complainant, the defendant, or Mr. Webb, with whom the defendant deposited his warrants to be delivered to the complainant, that the defendant was to give any part of the land in consideration of locating the same.

The Circuit Court decreed that the defendant below should convey to the complainant one-third of the said tract of 25,000 acres of land, according to certain boundaries which had been previously laid down under an order of that court, from which decree the defendant appealed.

WASHINGTON, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In deciding this case we are necessarily led to the examination of the following questions: 340 1. What *was the contract between these parties, the specific execution of which is sought to be enforced by this bill, and how is it proved? 2. Has the complainant entitled himself to ask for an execution of the contract, in case the same should be sufficiently proved?

The amended bill states that the complainant received certain land warrants from the defendant with instructions to locate the same in Kentucky, but that no particular stipulation was made respecting the compensation which he was to receive for his services, except that the general custom of the country in similar cases, and the general tenor of the complainant's contracts with other persons for such services were to furnish the rule of compensation to be allowed to him. This rule is averred to be one-third of the land located.

The defendant, in his answer, states that no contract of any sort was entered into between the complainant and himself. He even denies that he had any conversation with the complainant on this subject at any time previous to the entry being made. He states that offers were made to him by other persons to locate his warrants on the terms mentioned in the bill, which he rejected, and that, in consequence of his having understood that the complainant would do the business for a fair compensation in money, he deposited his warrants with his friend, Mr. Webb, with a request that he would engage the complainant to locate them.

The allegations of the bill in relation to this contract are wholly unsupported by the evidence in the cause; and, on the other hand, the answer, in relation to this point, is strongly corroborated by the testimony *of Mr. [*341] Peachy; by the uncertainty of the alleged usage as to the proportion of the land to be allowed to the locator; the improbability that so loose a contract would be made so early as the year 1779, when a usage, if any existed, must necessarily have been recent and unknown, especially to persons living remote from Kentucky, at that time wild and unsettled; and, above all, by the circumstance that from the year 1786, when the survey was made, under the direction of another agent, no demand of a Specific performance of a prior contract, decreed against a subsequent purchaser, with notice of plaintiff's equitable title. And it seems that if plaintiff had been in possession under the agreement, that would have been constructive notice to the purchaser of his actual interest or equitable title under the agreement. Wadsworth v. Wendell, 5 John. Ch. 224.

The principle of equity, with respect to specific performance, is, that if, substantially, the purchaser can have the thing contracted for, a slight variation in the qualifications of it will not disable the vendor from having a decree of specific performance, when the difference is such that it can be compensated in money. Magennis v. Fallon, 2 Moil. 588.

If the important part of the agreement be performed, and an inconsiderable part be left unfulfilled, or partly, unable to perform the residue, without his fault, equity will decree a specific performance. Church v. Steele, 1 A. K. Marsh. 330; Johnson's Heirs v. Mitchell, 1 A. K. Marsh. 227.

Where a contract for the sale of land has been in part executed by a conveyance of part of the land, and the vendor is unable to convey the residue, a court of equity will decree the repayment of a proportionate part of the purchase money with interest. Pratt v. Law, 9 Cranch, 456.

The court refused to decree specific execution of a contract in a hard case, where the other party had not complied with the terms. Rugge v. Ellis, 1 Desau. 161; Turner v. Clay, 3 Bibb, 52; Ramsay v. Brailsford, 2 Desau, 582.

Wheat. 2.

The court will not decree specific performance of a contract for the purchase of a house, where the buildings are not completed within the stipulated time. Colcock v. Butler, 1 Desau. 307.

The court will not compel the specific performance of an agreement of sale, and oblige defendant to accept a title which the plaintiff cannot make out to be clearly good and free from incumbrances. Butler v. O'Hear, 1 Desau. 382; Lewis v. Herndon, 3 Litt. 358; Kelly v. Bradford, 3 Bibb, 317; Seymour v. Delancey, Hopk. 436.

The purchaser's objections to taking the land need not be confined to cases of doubtful title, but may be extended to incumbrances of every description which may embarrass him in the full enjoyment of his purchase. Garnett v. Macon, 6 Call. 308.

An agreement must be in all respects full, fair, and honest in the beginning, and the performance of it fairly and conscientiously required, or the Court of Chancery will not enforce it. Bowman v. Irons, 2 Bibb, 78; Carberry v. Taunhill, 1 Harr. & John. 224.

Vendee's previous knowledge of defects in the title is no reason for compelling him to take such title as vendor can convey, that being defective; where the agreement stipulates that vendor shall convey good title. Jackson v. Ligon, 3 Leigh, 161.

If an agreement for the sale of lands be made, subject to a condition that the price thereof shall be afterwards ascertained by the parties, and one of the parties die without any price being agreed upon, such agreement is too incomplete and uncerpart of the land appears to have been made by the complainant until the institution of this suit in the year 1794.

This defect in the proof would seem to be fatal to the pretensions of the complainant. The contract which is sought to be specifically executed ought not only to be proved, but the terms of it should be so precise as that neither party could reasonably misunderstand them. If the contract be vague or uncertain, or, the evidence to establish it be insufficient, a court of equity will not exercise its extraordinary jurisdiction to enforce it, but will leave the party to his legal remedy.¹

342*] *But if these objections could be surmounted, that which remains to be considered under the second head appears to the court to be conclusive against the appellee.

2d. Has the complainant entitled himself to ask for an execution of the contract if he had proved it?

It is very obvious, from the complainant's own showing, that the contract between himself and the defendant taken in connection with the alleged usage, was, that the former should not only make the entry, but should also cause the same to be surveyed under his direction and superintendence. It was the entry and the survey which constituted the location in the contemplation of the parties, and formed the real consideration for which the allowance of a part of the land to the locator was to be made. The complainant states, in his bill, that the owner of the warrants was bound by the usage not only to make this allowance, but was also to furnish all the *money neces- [*343] sary for locating and surveying the land, and he endeavors to excuse himself for not having caused a survey to be made. Now, if the mere making of the entry amounted to a full performance of the contract on the part of the locator, any stipulation with the same person for the expenses attending the survey would have been idle and unnecessary. But the evidence of Isaac Shelby, upon this point, is conclusive. He states that the usual compensation to a locator was one-third of the land for locating and directing the survey.

If this, then, be the contract, as alleged by the complainant himself, in what manner has he performed his part of it? In the first place, the entry was made, not by him, but by Isaac Shelby, under some agreement which is not disclosed in the bill, nor proved by any testimony in the cause. In the next place, it does not appear that, from the year 1780, when this entry was made, the complainant made one effort to have the entry surveyed; but the defendant, after wasting about 6 years, was compelled to employ another agent to have that service performed.

How does the complainant excuse himself for the breach of his contract in this respect? He alleges that he was prevented, during all that Brettargh*, 17 Ves. 232. And if, on a covenant to build a house, the transaction is, in its nature, loose and undefined, and it is not expressed distinctly what the building is, so that the court could describe it as a subject for the report of the master, a specific performance will not be decreed. *Mosely v. Held, that specific performance could not be decreed, nor decree made for compensation in damages, but party was left to his remedy at law on the covenant. Hatch v. Cobb, 4 John. time, by Indian hostility, which rendered it troublesome and dangerous to make surveys in the part of the country where this entry was made. This assertion is not proved by a single witness except Thomas Allen, who deposes, that from 1780 to 1789, he believes it was difficult [344*] to get any persons to risk their *lives in making surveys on the Ohio, towards the Yellow Bank, except for high wages, as he has been informed. Now, even if this witness had positively proved the point for which he was examined, still his testimony could not avail the complainant, since he admits that for high wages men could have been procured to perform the service; and those wages, it was incumbent on the complainant, who claims no less than between 8,000 and 9,000 acres of this land, to pay. The difficulty and expense which would have attended his endeavors to perform this part of his contract afford no excuse for his breach of it, even if, in a case like this, any excuse could be admitted. But what is conclusive as to this point is that the entry was in fact surveyed in 1786, without any danger or difficulty, so far as the record informs us.

The complainant alleges that he was always ready and willing, whenever he might have been called upon for that purpose, to show the beginning and other calls of the entry, and to give the necessary directions to the surveyor. This allegation is positively denied in the answer, which states that the complainant declined making or attending to the survey, and that he advised the defendant to employ some other person to do the business.

Thus it appears that the complainant has failed not only to prove the contract stated in the bill, but also his performance of those acts which formed the consideration of the alleged promise on the part of the defendant.

[345*] *The decree must therefore be reversed, and the bill dismissed with costs.

Decree reversed.

THE ELEANOR. DONNELL, Claimant.

A libel against the commander of a squadron calling on him to proceed to adjudication, or to make restitution in value, of a vessel and cargo, detained for search by the captain of a frigate belonging to the squadron, and lost while in his possession. Libel dismissed.

The commander of a squadron is liable to individuals for the trespasses of those under his command, in case of positive or permissive orders, or of actual presence and co-operation. But, quære, how far is he responsible in other cases?

Where a capture has actually taken place, with the assent, express or implied, of the commander of a squadron, the prize-master may be considered as a bailee to the use of the whole squadron, who are to share in the prize money, and thus the commander may be made responsible; but not so as to mere trespasses, unattended with a conversion to the use of the squadron.

The commander of a single ship is responsible for the acts of those under his command; as are, likewise, the owners of privateers for the conduct of the commanders appointed by them.

To detain for examination, is a right which a belligerent may exercise over every vessel, except a national vessel, which he meets with on the ocean.

The principal right necessarily carries with it all the means essential to its exercise; among these may, sometimes, be included the assumption of the disguise of a friend or an enemy, which is a lawful stratagem of war. If, in consequence of the use of this stratagem, the crew of the vessel detained abandon their duty before they are *actually [346 made prisoners of war, and the vessel is thereby lost, the captors are not responsible.

Whenever an officer seizes a vessel as prize, he is bound to commit her to the care of a competent prize-master and crew; not because the original crew, when left on board (in the case of a seizure of the vessel of a citizen, or neutral), are released from their duty without the assent of the master, but from the want of a right to subject the captured crew to the authority of the captor's officer. But this rule does not extend to the case of a mere detention for examination, which the commander of the cruising vessel may enforce by orders from his own quarter-deck, and may, therefore, send an officer on board the vessel detained, in order more conveniently to enforce it, without taking the vessel out of the possession of her own officers and crew.

The modern usages of war authorize the bringing one of the principal officers of the vessel detained on board the belligerent vessel, with the papers, for examination.

A PPEAL from the Circuit Court for the District of Massachusetts.

This schooner, with her cargo, the property of the claimant, on a voyage from Baltimore to Bordeaux, fell in with the President and Congress frigates, on the night of the 16th October, 1813.

Commodore Rodgers was the commander of the President, frigate, and the commodore and commander of the squadron composed of those two ships then in company. Captain Smith, deceased, and charged in the libel as a co-defendant, commanded the Congress.

On the Eleanor being discovered by the two frigates, she was chased by the Congress and overhauled. The President stood on her course, being out of sight at the time she was overhauled and when she was subsequently dismasted, and so continuing until the signal guns were fired from the schooner. The *master, super- [347 cargo, and the officers and crew of the Eleanor, on seeing the frigates, considered them British cruisers, and when they found she could not escape them, concluded they were captured by the enemy. This produced a very general determination, on the part of the crew, to take no further concern in the navigation of the schooner. When boarded by Lieutenant Nicholson, of the Congress, the schooner was in the state of confusion to be expected from such a determination. He ordered the master to take one of his mates, and his papers, and go on board the frigate. The captain, after giving some orders to his second mate to adjust the sails of the schooner, which were not complied with, went with his first mate and papers, in the frigate's boat, to the Congress. Lieutenant Nicholson, on being asked by a boy what frigate it was, said it was the Shannon; immediately afterwards he undeceived the supercargo, whom he recognized as an old acquaintance, but said he was ordered not to make himself known, and, therefore, requested the supercargo not to disclose it. Upon endeavoring to restore order, and to provide for the safe navigation of the schooner, he could get no assistance from the crew (who refused to obey his orders, considering him a British officer), except from the second mate, and on observing this, he disclosed the name of the frigate, and he, the supercargo and the mate, assuring the crew they were not prisoners, endeavored to prevail on them to return to their duty; they persisted in refusing; in consequence of which (the sea being tempestuous, and the weather squally) a flaw struck the 348 vessel and both her masts went over. Lieutenant Nicholson, the mate and supercargo, endeavored to save the vessel, but the crew would not obey either of them. She was afterwards assisted, as far as possible, by the frigates, but finally abandoned and lost.

The libel was filed against Commodore Rodgers and Captain Smith, alleging that the loss of said vessel and cargo was owing "to the deception unlawfully practiced on her crew by the officers of the said squadron, and through the want of care, inattention and gross negligence of the officer of said frigate Congress, in the navigating said schooner, of which he had taken, and then had command," and praying for a monition against them to proceed to adjudication, or to show cause why restitution in value should not be decreed.

The District Court considered this allegation supported by the proof, and that Commodore Rodgers was answerable, as commander of the squadron, and decreed against him for forty-three thousand two hundred and fifty dollars, the value of said vessel and cargo. The Circuit Court affirmed the decree pro forma, and thereupon the cause was brought by appeal to this court. After the filing of the libel, and before the decree in the District Court, the death of Captain Smith, which had intervened, was suggested on the record.

Key, for the appellant, made three points:

1st. That it was owing to the neglect and misconduct of the captured crew the vessel was lost.

349* 2d. That this neglect and misconduct were in no degree owing to, or palliated by, the military stratagem practiced by Captain Smith.

3d. That, at all events, Commodore Rodgers was not responsible in law.

The neglect of the captured crew, in refusing to do duty, is analogous to the case of Virtue v. Bird,¹ where the plaintiff declared that he was employed by the defendant to carry a load of timber from W. to L., to be laid down where the defendant should appoint, and that he carried it; when the defendant, having appointed no place where it should be laid down, the plaintiff's horses were detained in the cold, by which some of them died, and the rest were spoiled; after a verdict for the plaintiff, judgment was arrested, for it was the plaintiff's own fault that he did not take out his horses, and lead them about; or he might have unloaded the timber in any proper place and returned. So, also, in Butterfield v. Horrester,² which was an action on the case for obstructing a highway, by means of which the plaintiff, who was riding along the road, was thrown down with his horse and injured; it appeared that he was riding with great violence and want of ordinary care, without which he might easily have avoided the obstruction. It was therefore decided that he could not recover; for that two things must concur to support the action: an obstruction in the road by the fault of the defendant, and no want of ordinary care to avoid it on the part of the plaintiff. Upon the principle of these cases, the appellant [350] is exempted from all liability. Nor is he responsible upon the ground of the liability of a master and principal for the misconduct of a servant and agent. Superiors in these relations of life are answerable only for acts in the ordinary line of the duty of the servant and agent, or in consequence of the special orders of the superior. But this principle, with its limitations, does not apply to the case of a commander of a squadron. He does not elect his officers. They are appointed by the government, and amenable only to a court-martial. No officer, military or naval, would undertake so frightful a responsibility; and to impose it upon the commander of a fleet or squadron would be to incapacitate him from the performance of his duty. There is no testimony, positive or presumptive, that Commodore Rodgers gave any orders whatever to practice the stratagem in question. The authority of *The Mentor*³ shows that he is not liable, constructively, for the conduct of the officers under his command; nor is there any one case to show that he is thus liable. *The Der Mohr*⁴ is, apparently only, such a case. It only proves that a superior officer may be placed in the same relation with that of a principal, in regard to his agent. In that case, the captors had a right of property in the captured vessel, inasmuch as by the law of England captors have the entire interest in prizes; and any person may be appointed prize-master, and so become the agent of the whole squadron, the commander *of which would, con- [351] sequently, be responsible. Public policy does not require the establishment of the principle contended for on the other side, since the injured party may have recourse to the actual wrong-doer, and may seek redress by complaining to the government of his misconduct.

D. B. Ogden, contra. The case cited from Levinz is not parallel; and that from East is one of gross folly and want of common prudence and caution on the part of the plaintiff. It is inapplicable, because it was not in the power of the libellant in this case to save his property from destruction. But the present question is not to be determined by the narrow principles of the common law; it is a marine trespass, which must be tried by the more liberal rules of the marine law. The right of visitation and search is not, and cannot be denied; but it is not essentially necessary to the due exercise of the right that the master should be taken out of his vessel: it is only necessary to send a boarding officer to make the proper examination and inquiries; but the belligerent cruisers have no right to proceed further, until they have determined to send in the vessel for adjudication. When this determination is made, a competent prize-master and crew should be put on board, instead of leaving the original crew without control or regulation. A belligerent has a right to practice deception, as a stratagem of war; but this right, which may cause a wrong to a neutral or fellow-citizen, must be exercised at the peril of the captors. Either the seizure of the 352*] *Eleanor was as prize, or she was detained for search. If the former, then the captors had no right to require the assistance of the crew of the captured vessel,¹ who were not bound to assist in navigating her. If the latter, then the captors had no right to take out the master and mate, leaving the crew without any regular chief competent to navigate the vessel. The case of The Der Mohr, was, indeed, determined on general principles of law; on the ground that the prize-master was constituted agent of the captors, and the vessel (which was innocent) was used as a vehicle to bring in the cargo, which last alone was liable to suspicion. But here the trespass is joint; and the trespassers would have been joint sharers of the prize: Qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus. The President was out of sight at the time of the seizure; but she was present at the inception of the tort. They were cruising in conjunction and under the orders of Commodore Rodgers, who saw the Congress, frigate, pursue the Eleanor, and did not prohibit the chase. The boarding officer was a mere passive instrument in the hands of his superiors, to whom alone the injured party can look for indemnification.

Harper, on the same side. The responsibility of the owners of privateers and the commanding officers of ships and squadrons, for the misconduct of their delegates, is a settled principle of law. The case of Del Col v. Ar-
 353*] *nold*² is in point, where *this court decreed the owners of a privateer to make restitution in value of a captured vessel lost by the misconduct of the prize-master. The case of The Der Mohr, which has been so often referred to, makes the senior officer responsible for the appointment of a prize-master by his junior officer, though there was no personal misconduct imputable to either. In the case now before the court, the proximate cause of the loss was the refusal of the seamen to work. The ultimate cause was the deception practiced by the captors in representing themselves as enemies; and whether the crew were justifiable in refusing obedience, or not, their disobedience was a consequence of the stratagem practiced by the captors, and they are responsible. On the first supposition, they are liable; because they ought to have put a prize-crew on board. On the second, because the stratagem was practiced at their peril, and it depended upon the event of the search whether they would be justified; for this mode of warfare is not to be practiced at the expense of individuals pursuing an innocent and lawful commerce. The case of *The Mentor*³ is not, as has been contended, contrary to our position. The claimant there had taken out a monition against the actual captor, which had been dismissed; it was, therefore, res judicata; and, besides, the lapse of time which had intervened was held to be an equitable limitation. It is true that Sir William Scott likewise lays hold of the circumstance that Admiral Digby was merely commander of the 354*] *North American station, and far off at the time when the capture was made; but here Commodore Rodgers was present, and associated in the act. The case of *The Charming Betsey*⁴ shows that innocence of intention alone in a commanding officer will not exempt him from the consequences of an illegal act. In substance and effect, this is a case between the government and the owner of the property which has been destroyed, who has become the victim of a rigorous prosecution of the rights of war and of military policy. Respondet superior! We pursue him; let him, in turn, look for indemnification to his government, to which experience shows that he will not look in vain.

Jones, for the captors, in reply, argued on the facts that the loss of the vessel was not a consequence, direct or indirect, of the conduct of the seizing officer; and that the right of visitation and search had been properly exercised. It is novel doctrine, that the right of search is to be exercised under the peril of being responsible for a wrong. Reason, morality and law, all concur in imposing the loss (among innocent parties) upon him on whom the elements and the act of Providence throws it. It was entirely a question of military prudence whether the papers should be examined by the boarding officer or by his superior; and there is nothing in the principles of public law to prevent the exercise of the right of visitation and search either way. Neither are the crew of the vessel which is detained *for search exempted from [*355] obedience in consequence of the act of boarding. Until the capture is consummated, the former relations of the crew continue; and until then the cruiser is not bound to send on board a competent prize-master and sufficient crew to navigate the captured vessel. The commander of a squadron cannot, on any principle of law or justice, be made responsible, constructively, for the acts of officers on board other ships. The principles and analogies which would make Commodore Rodgers a joint trespasser must be those of municipal law. But this was not a civil connection with the officers of the other ship; all that he knew, or permitted, was the chase; and he cannot be made responsible for the subsequent supposed misconduct of his brother officer. Here was a merely military act; no animus lucrandi; no appropriation as prize; and, therefore, no civil constructive responsibility. In the case of The Mentor, Sir William Scott expressly overrules the doctrine of the constructive responsibility of a commander-in-chief; apart from the other grounds of exception, the former adjudication, and the lapse of time which he likewise notices. The Der Mohr was a case of joint capture, as expressly stated by the court and the reporter; and was determined on the just principle of joint participation in the wrong done, in the interest acquired by the capture, and in the appointment of the prize-master.

JOHNSON, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case presents two questions: 1st. Are the appellees entitled to recover?

*2. Does their right of recovery ex- [*356] tend to the commander of the squadron?

In whatever view the case be considered, it is one of extreme hardship; both the claim and the defense are founded in the most rigid principles of the strictum jus; and it is impossible not to regret if the libellant have no means of indemnity, or if that indemnity should be exacted of men whose characters and conduct were so far above all imputation of malice or oppression. Nor can this court altogether close its feelings against the claims to protection of that navy which has so nobly protected the reputation of the country. Yet we mistake the character of the men who constitute it, if they would not be among the first to declare the government unworthy of their skill and valor, in which the rights of the meanest individual was not as much an object of earnest solicitude as the rights of those whom their country delights most to honor. Whether the commander of a squadron be liable to individuals for the trespasses of those under his command is a question on which it would be equally incorrect to lay down a general proposition either negatively or affirmatively. In case of positive or permissive orders, or in case of actual presence and co-operation, there could not be a doubt of his liability. But on the other hand, when we consider the partial independence of each commander of a vessel, and that the association is not a subject of contract, but founded on the orders of their government, which leave them no election, it would be dangerous indeed, and dampening to the ardor of enterprise, to 357 *] mel a commander *with fears of liability, where it is not possible, from the nature of the service, and the delicate rules of etiquette, for him always to direct or control the actions of those under his command. We feel no inclination to extend the principle of constructive trespass, and will leave each case to be decided on its own merits as it shall arise. Where a capture has actually taken place with the assent of the commodore, express or implied, the question of liability assumes a different aspect; and the prize-master may be considered as bailee to the use of the whole squadron who are to share in the prize money. To this case there is much reason for applying the principle, that qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus; but not so as to mere trespasses unattended with a conversion to the use of the squadron.

The case of the commander of a single ship varies materially from that of the commander of a squadron, and the rigid rules of liability for the acts of those under our command may, with more propriety, be applied to him. The liability of the owners of a privateer for the acts of their commanders has never been disputed. And it is because they are left at large in the selection of a commander, and are not permitted to disavow his actions as being unauthorized by them. So, in the case of a commander of a ship, the absolute subordination of every officer to his command attaches to him the imputation of the marine trespasses of his subalterns on the property of individuals, when acting within the scope of his commands. Orders even giving a discretion to a subordinate 358 *] in such cases is no more *than adopting his actions as the actions of the commander; and placing him in a command which requires skill, integrity, or prudence, makes the commander the pledge to the individual for his competence to discharge the duties of the undertaking.

With these views of the subject we should have found no difficulty in deciding on the liability of Captain Smith, of the Congress, had he been a party to this libel, and the facts of the case had made out a marine trespass in himself, or in Lieutenant Nicholson, or a want of competence or due care in the latter to discharge the command assigned him. But we are of opinion that no one act is proven in the case which did not comport with the fair, honorable, and reasonable exercise of the rights of war. To detain for examination is a right which a belligerent may exercise over every vessel, not a national vessel, that he meets with on the ocean. And whatever may be the injury that casually results to an individual from the act of another while pursuing the reasonable exercise of an established right, it is his misfortune. The law pronounces it damnum absque injuria, and the individual from whose act it proceeds is liable neither at law nor in the forum of conscience. And the principal right necessarily carries with it also all the means essential to its exercise. Thus, in the present case, a vessel must be pursued in order to be detained for examination. But if, in the pursuit, she had been dismasted, and upset or stranded, or run on shore and lost, it would have been an unfortunate case, but the pursuing vessel would have stood acquitted. The counsel in argument *have not denied the [359 general doctrine, but have endeavored to show that the commander of the Congress had unreasonably exercised the right of detention.

1st. By the deception, in passing himself off for an enemy, thereby reducing the crew to a state of insubordination.

2d. By taking out both the master and the mate, and thus removing the possibility of bringing the seamen back to their duty.

3d. By divesting the master of his command, without putting a competent crew on board to navigate her.

On the first of these grounds, it is only necessary to remark that, to assume the guise of a friend or an enemy is, in legitimate warfare, an act the most familiar and frequent in its occurrence. It is so ordinary a ruse de guerre that it ought rather to be expected than the display of real colors. And, innumerable cases that have come before this court prove that in the actual state of things during the late war it became as necessary to practice the deception upon our citizens as upon a neutral or an enemy. We, therefore, see nothing reprehensible in this. But on what ground could the crew assume the right of judging for themselves on this subject, and of abandoning their duty before they were actually made prisoners? Suppose the frigate had been an enemy, it did not follow that their vessel must be made prize, and they were unquestionably unpardonable in abandoning their duty. Their doing so was by no means a necessary consequence *of [360 ordering their officers on board the frigate, nor ought the captain of the Congress to have anticipated such a state of things as their vessel was reduced to by their misconduct. They were bound to obey the second mate in the absence of their other officers; and if they had done so, this misfortune would not have happened. So far from actually divesting him of his command, it appears that Nicholson's

To the second and third grounds, the attention of this court has been drawn with peculiar force. Either of them appeared to be an irregularity, which the reasonable exercise of the right of search did not strictly justify. But, upon a close examination of the testimony, we are of opinion that neither of those grounds is supported by the evidence. It is true that both the master and first mate were taken on board the frigate, and the master and supercargo say they were both ordered on board. But Nicholson, the boarding officer, who certainly knew best what orders he gave, swears that he ordered the master to go on board with "one of his mates," thus leaving it to his election to choose between them; he further swears that these were the orders he received from the captain. And there is a fact in the case which makes it probable that the master of the schooner himself called on the first mate to attend him, for at that time the second mate was stationed at the bow, in charge of sinking certain dispatches, in case of capture. Had the master remonstrated 361 against taking his first mate along with him, he would have done his duty, and perhaps saved his vessel. On the third point, it is unquestionably true that, whenever an officer seizes a vessel as prize he is bound to commit her to the care of a competent officer and crew. Not that the original crew, when left on board, in case of seizure of the vessel, of a citizen or neutral, are released from their duty without the assent of the master; for they are bound to attend the vessel, as she may be discharged, and pursue her original destination. But the obligation to man the prize results from the want of a right to subject the crew of the captured vessel to the authority of his own officer. If, then, this vessel had been seized as prize, and no one put on board but the prize-master, without any undertaking of the original ship's company to navigate her under his orders, it is very questionable whether the appellants would not have been liable for any loss that followed, from the insubordination of the crew. For after capture, as before observed, the prize-master becomes the bailee of the squadron, who are to share in the partition of proceeds.

But we are of opinion that this was a mere case of detention for search; that the vessel was never actually taken out of possession of her own officers; that the captain of the Congress had a right to detain the vessel by orders from his own quarter-deck, and that the officers of the schooner, at their peril, were bound to obey; that Lieutenant Nicholson was left on board for no other purpose than to enforce, in a more convenient mode, the observance, on 362 their part, of the duty which the rights of war authorized the frigate to exact of her. And all the misfortunes which followed resulted to the appellees from the fault or folly of their own crew.

One argument, insisted on at the bar, it is proper for this court to notice before we conclude. It was contended that the master of the Eleanor ought not to have been removed from his vessel; that the right of search only authorized the sending of an officer on board to examine her papers. But we think otherwise. The modern usages of war authorize the bringing of one of the principal officers on board the cruising vessel, with his papers, for examination. To devert her of both her principal officers, without putting on board her, for the time, a competent officer and crew, would certainly be irregular. But it is for the interest of the commercial world that the investigation should be made by the commander himself, and not left to any subordinate officer. In that case it would be absurd to require of the commander of the commissioned vessel to quit his command for the purpose of making the necessary examinations.

We are, upon the whole, of opinion, that the court below erred; that the decree must be annulled, and the libel dismissed.¹

INGLEE v. COOLIDGE.

No writ of error lies to the highest court of law or equity of a state court, under the 25th section of the Judiciary act of 1789, unless there is something apparent on the record bringing the case within the appellate jurisdiction of this court.

The report of the judge who tries the cause at Nisi Prius containing a statement of the facts, is not to be considered as a part of the record; the judgment being rendered upon a general verdict, and the report being mere matter in pais to regulate the discretion of the court as to the propriety of granting a new trial, the writ of error, in such a case, will be dismissed.

THIS was a writ of error upon a judgment of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, rendered in an action of assumpsit. The declaration contained three counts, to which the general issue was pleaded, and upon two of these counts the jury found a general verdict for the defendant (the plaintiff in error), and upon the third count a general verdict, with damages for the original plaintiff. The cause was then continued, as the record states, "for the opinion of the whole court upon the law of the case, as reported by the judge who tried the same." At a subsequent term, judgment was rendered by the whole court for the plaintiff, upon the verdict found in his favor. The report of the judge who tried the cause came up in the record annexed to the writ of error, with other proceedings and exhibits in the cause.

G. Sullivan*, for the plaintiff in error, argued that, by the report of the judge in the court below, it appeared that the chief question in this cause involved a constructive application of the act of Congress of the 18th of June, 1812, declaring war against Great Britain, to the question whether the purchase of a British license to protect the property of a citizen was a lawful consideration for the promissory note on which the action was brought. It is contended, by the defendant in error, that however this may be, this court cannot sustain the writ of error in the present case; because the report of the judge is no part of the record. To determine the question suggested by this objection, it becomes necessary to inquire of what a record consists. "A record," says Britton,¹ "is a memorial or remembrance, an authentic testimony in writing, contained in rolls of parchment, and preserved in a court of record." But a more particular definition is given by Lord Coke,² who defines it to be "a memorial of the proceedings or acts of a court of record." In modern times, to avoid the delay incident to the preparation of a special verdict at the trial, a practice has grown up of reserving the cause for the whole court, upon a special case, which is prepared by the counsel, or, as a substitute therefor, is made by the judge, and thrown into the form of a report, under a special agreement of the parties, that a nonsuit, a default, or even a different verdict may be entered, according to the decision of the court; such is the *practice in the Supreme Court of Massachusetts. Where is the substantive difference between the "special case" and a report made under such understanding and agreement? Error lies upon a special case. The judgment of the court below in the case of *Hunter v. Martin*³ was founded on a statement of facts, as settled by a case agreed. But the report of the judge, in the present case, was a necessary proceeding or act of the court, upon which its decision on the merits was founded. It ascertained all the facts in the case; and what more does a special case or verdict? The position assumed on the other side narrows the ground of remedial process, in a manner inconsistent with a liberal application of the constitutional powers of this court.

1.—Vide Appendix, Note I.

Webster, for the defendant in error, contended, that the points on which the plaintiff relied could not be raised in this case. Nothing appears on the record of the judgment in Massachusetts by which the court can pronounce that judgment to be erroneous. The general rule of law confines writs of error to matters arising on the record, and the statute expressly provides, that in cases where writs of error are brought in this court to reverse judgments rendered in state courts, on the ground that such judgments were rendered against the validity, or an erroneous construction of a statute of the United States, "no other error shall be assigned or regarded, as a ground of reversal in any 366 such case, than *such as appears on the face of the record, and immediately respects the before-mentioned question of validity or construction." The judge's report of the evidence is no part of the record. Still less are the depositions of witnesses. Nothing, therefore, appears on the face of this record, which, in any way, respects either the validity or construction of any statute of the United States. This is, in effect, an attempt to reverse the judgment of a court for error, in refusing to grant a new trial. If a party be dissatisfied with the direction of a judge at Nisi Prius, in matter of law, there are two modes, in either of which he may ordinarily cause such direction to be reviewed. Without putting the question on the record, he may move for a new trial, on the report of the judge in that court out of which the record issues; or he may tender his bill of exceptions, the object of which is to put the question on the record, and then bring his writ of error. But he cannot pursue both courses. If he relies on his motion for a new trial, then his objection does not appear on the record, and, of course, no writ of error lies. If he tender his bill of exceptions, the court where the record is will not grant a new trial on the ground stated in the bill of exceptions, for the question is then on the record, and the error, if any, may be corrected by writ of error.⁴ The discussion of questions of law on motions for new trials is attended with the well-known consequence of giving up the right of proceeding further with the cause. The *effect of this in England [367 on the jurisdiction of the House of Lords has not escaped the notice of Lord Chancellor Eldon.⁵ But this is for the consideration of the parties themselves. In this case the plaintiff in error has made his election. He has chosen to trust to the success of his motion for a new trial in the court of Massachusetts. If that has failed, he can have no remedy here by writ of error.

STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court, and after stating the case, proceeded as follows:

*A motion has been made to dismiss [368 the writ of error, upon the ground that there is nothing apparent upon the record which brings the case within the appellate jurisdiction of this court, under the 25th section of the judiciary act of 1789. It is conceded, on all sides, that this is entirely correct, unless the report of the judge who tried the cause, which contains a statement of the facts, is to be considered as a part of the record. And we are unanimously of opinion that it cannot be so considered. It is not like a special verdict or a statement of facts agreed of record, upon which the court is to pronounce its judgment. The judgment is rendered upon a general verdict, and the report is mere matter in pais, to regulate the discretion

5.—2 Dow's Rep. 480, Smith et al. v. Robertson et al. This was an insurance cause appealed from the court of session in Scotland to the House of Lords, having been originally brought in the Court of Admiralty in Scotland. In delivering the judgment of the house, affirming the decree of the court below, Lord Eldon stated, that "their lordships were aware, and it was due to the Court of Session to mark the fact, that these cases were all heard there in such a course that there was no obstacle in point of form to prevent their coming before their lordships. By the old mode of proceeding in Westminster Hall, forty years before he had set foot in it, the practice was, to have special verdicts found, and then the case might come up on error to the House of Lords. But this practice had been altered by Lord Mansfield, upon the whole, with considerable utility; and now, for the sake of expedition, instead of entering the matter at length upon the record in a special verdict, special cases were made for the opinion of the court; and nothing appearing on the record but the general verdict, the subject might have no door by which to come into that house. But in the court of session, as he understood their practice, the cases were heard in such a form that the subject could not be prevented from coming to their lordships; and, therefore, it was no discredit to the court of session that so many of their decisions in these insurance causes were brought under the review of their lordships."

M'CLUNY v. SILLIMAN.

This court has not jurisdiction to issue a writ of mandamus to the register of a land-office of the United States, commanding him to enter the application of a party for certain tracts of land, according to the 7th section of the act of the 10th May, 1800, "providing for the sale of the lands of the United States north-west of the Ohio, and above the mouth of Kentucky River;" which mandamus had been refused by the Supreme Court of the state of Ohio, upon a submission by the register to the jurisdiction of that court, being the highest court of law or equity in that state.

1.—Costs will be allowed upon the dismissal of a writ of error, for want of jurisdiction, if the original defendant be also defendant in error. Winchester v. Jackson et al., 3 Cranch, 515.

2.—In the case of Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, the court determined, that having, by the constitution, only an appellate jurisdiction, (except in cases of ambassadors, &c.) and it being an essential criterion of appellate jurisdiction, that it revise and corrects the proceedings in a cause already instituted, and does not create that cause. That, although a mandamus may be directed to courts, yet to issue such a writ to an officer for the delivery of a paper was, in effect, the same as to sustain an original action for that paper, and, therefore, seemed not to belong to appellate, but to original jurisdiction; and that consequently the authority given to this court by the 13th section of the judiciary act of 1789, to issue writs of mandamus to "persons holding office under the authority of the United States," was not warranted by the constitution. In M'Intire v. Wood, 7 Cranch, 504, it was decided that the power of the circuit courts to issue writs of mandamus, is confined by the judiciary act of 1789, exclusively, to those cases in which it may be necessary to the exercise of their jurisdiction. That case was brought up from the Circuit Court of Ohio, upon a certificate, that the judges of that court were divided in opinion upon the question whether that court had the power to issue a writ of mandamus to the register of a land-office in Ohio, commanding him to issue a final certificate of purchase, 371*] to the *plaintiff, of certain lands in that state. In delivering the opinion of the court Johnson, J., stated that, "had the 11th section of the judiciary act covered the whole ground of the constitution,

HARPER moved for a mandamus in this cause, to the defendant, as register of the land office of the United States, at Zanesville, in the state of Ohio, commanding him to enter the application of the plaintiff, for certain tracts of land according to the provisions of the 9th section of the act of Congress of the 10th May, 1800, entitled "An act providing for the sale of the lands of the United States, in the territory of the United States, north-west of the Ohio, and above the mouth of Kentucky River." A rule to show cause had been obtained in the Supreme Court of the state of Ohio (being the highest court of law or equity of that state); whereupon the defendant appeared, and excepted to the jurisdiction of the court; but this plea was afterwards waived, and a case agreed between the parties, on which the court ordered the rule to be discharged. Harper now moved for a mandamus to issue from this *court, upon the [*370 ground that the case was within the appellate jurisdiction of the court under the equity of the judiciary act of 1789; that, although the court had determined that it had no original jurisdiction to issue writs of mandamus to persons holding office under the authority of the United States, yet it might have an appellate jurisdiction to issue a mandamus to such persons, where it had been refused by the highest court of law or equity of a state, in a case drawing in question the validity of a statute of, or an authority exercised under, the United States.

The motion was denied by the court.

there would be much reason for exercising this power in many cases, wherein some ministerial act is necessary to the completion of an individual right, arising under the laws of the United States, and the 14th section of the same act would sanction the issuing of the writ for such a purpose. But, although the judicial power of the United States extends to cases arising under the laws of the United States, the legislature has not thought proper to delegate the exercises of that power to its circuit courts, except in certain specified cases. When questions arise under those laws in the state courts, and the party who claims a right or privilege under them is unsuccessful, an appeal is given to the Supreme Court, and this provision the legislature has thought sufficient, at present, for all the political purposes intended to be answered by the clause of the constitution which relates to this subject." The power of the Supreme Court to issue writs of mandamus to the other courts of the United States has been frequently exercised. The United States v. Peters, 5 Cranch, 115; Livingston v. Dorgenois, 7 Cranch, 577. But in the case of Hunter v. Martin's lessee, ante, vol. 1, p. 304, the court, in pronouncing its opinion upon its appellate jurisdiction in causes brought from the highest court of law or equity of a state, deemed it unnecessary to give any opinion on the question, whether this court has authority to enforce its own judgments on appeal, by issuing a writ of mandamus to the state court, as the question was not thought necessarily involved in the decision of that cause. Ib. 362.

NOTE.—The Supreme Court, by mandamus, act directly upon the officer, or guide or control his judgment or discretion in the matters committed to his care in the ordinary discharge of his official duties. The interference of the court with the performance of the ordinary duties of the executive departments of the government would be productive of nothing but mischief, and such a power was never intended to be given to them. *Decatur v. It is the practice of this court, in prize causes, to hear the cause, in the first instance, upon the evidence transmitted from the Circuit Court, and to decide upon that evidence whether it is proper to allow further proof.

Affidavits to be used as further proof in causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction in this court must be taken by a commission.

IN the argument of this cause, Winder, for the claimant, stated, that there was an affidavit annexed to the record, which was taken under the order for further proof, in the court below, but which, not arriving until after the decree of condemnation was pronounced, was ordered by the Circuit Court to be transmitted, de bene esse, for the consideration of this court. He further stated that he had additional proof, taken since that time, to be used in this court; and he asked whether he should now be permitted to read these proofs, in order to show what was the nature of the evidence which existed, to clear away any former doubts in the cause.

MARSHALL, Ch. J. The court is of opinion that the affidavit transmitted from the Circuit Court may be now read. But as to the new proof now offered by the claimant, it is the practice of this court to hear the cause in the first instance, upon the evidence transmitted from the Circuit Court, and to decide upon that evidence whether it is proper to allow further proof. The new proof cannot, therefore, be now read; but, as the opposite party wishes it, the counsel may state the nature of the proof, though not the contents thereof in detail. If *373 the case shall ultimately appear entitled to further proof, an order will be made for that purpose.

Ogden, for the claimant, offered to read affidavits, as further proof, which had not been taken under a commission. But they were rejected by the court; the cause was continued to the next term, and the further proof ordered to be taken under a commission, according to the rule of court of the present term.

administrators and assigns, all and singular the mortgages, judgments, suits, bonds, bills, notes, debts, securities, contracts, goods, chattels, money, and effects, whatsoever, due or belonging to the bank; together with all the ways, means, and remedies, for the recovery of the same, upon the special trust in the deed expressed. That Thomas Willing, John Perot and James S. Cox, afterwards assigned to the complainants, all and singular the debts included in the deed to them. The bill further stated that one Elisha Janney made and delivered to the defendant five promissory notes, dated and payable at Washington, and for the following sums, to wit, one note for $1,000, payable in sixty days from the 22d February, 1809, &c.; amounting in the whole, to $4,020. That the defendant discounted the said notes in the branch bank of the United States, at Washington, about the times they bear date, and indorsed the same at Washington. That Janney did not pay the notes when they became due, and that he was insolvent when the notes 375 became due. That the notes being made and dated in the county of Washington, were subject to the laws prevailing in Washington county, and the defendant bound to pay, on the failure of Janney to pay. The complainants claimed these debts as proprietors thereof; and called on the defendant specially to state whether Janney was not insolvent when the notes became due; whether the said notes were not duly protested for non-payment, and the defendant in due time notified thereof, and did not attempt to secure himself by some lien on Janney's property. The bill concluded by praying a decree against the defendant for the amount of said notes.

The defendant, in his answer, did not admit that the complainants were duly authorized to recover and receive the debts due to the bank; but he admitted that the notes were by him indorsed in blank, and delivered to Janney, but contended that they were not obtained to be discounted in the Bank of the United States, nor were discounted for the benefit of the defendant, but for the use and benefit of Elisha Janney, who received the money from the bank. And that it was well known to the president and directors of the bank that the said notes were indorsed by the defendant for the accommodation of the said Elisha Janney, without any value being received by the defendant. The defendant's answer further alleged that due and legal notice was not given him of the non-payment of the notes; that no demand of payment of the notes was made of Elisha Janney, by the bank; that the notes were all dated at Alexandria; that Elisha Janney, on the 29th of May, conveyed all his property [376 to Richard M. Scott, in trust for the payment of his debts, including the debt to the bank.

There was some contrariety of evidence as to the time when payment of the notes was demanded of the maker, and the time when notice to the defendant as indorser, who resided in Alexandria, was put into the post-office at Washington.

tion had expired, no action could be maintained at law by the bank itself. Under these circumstances, the court is clearly of opinion that a suit may be maintained in equity against the other parties to the notes. Another question arises in the cause, whether the indorsers have had due notice of the non-payment by the 377 makers. As there is some *contrariety of evidence in the record, the court will only lay down the rule. And it is the opinion of the court that a demand of payment should be made upon the last day of grace, and notice of the default of the maker be put into the post-office early enough to be sent by the mail of the succeeding day.

[CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.]

COLSON ET AL. v. LEWIS.

The jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States extends to a case between citizens of Kentucky, claiming lands exceeding the value of five hundred dollars, under different grants, the one issued by the state of Kentucky, and the other by the state of Virginia, but upon warrants issued by Virginia, and locations founded thereon prior to the separation of Kentucky from Virginia. It is the grant which passes the legal title to the land; and if the controversy is founded upon the conflicting grants of different states, the judicial power of the courts of the United States extends to the case, whatever may have been the equitable title of the parties prior to the grant.

THE opinion of the court in this cause was delivered by WASHINGTON, J.:

This suit in equity was removed into the Circuit Court of Kentucky, upon the petition of the defendant, filed in the state court; and, upon a motion made in the Circuit Court to 378 dismiss the suit from *that jurisdiction, the judges of that court were opposed in opinion, and caused the following facts to be stated, to enable this court to decide the question: Those facts are, that the value of the land in controversy exceeds $500; that the complainants are citizens of Virginia, and that the grant, under which they claim title, is derived from the state of Kentucky by virtue of warrants issued from the land-office of Virginia, and locations upon the warrants before the separation of Kentucky from Virginia; that the defendant's grant is from the state of Virginia, by virtue of a warrant issued from the land-office, and a location made thereon, before the separation of Kentucky.

The question referred to this court is, whether the Circuit Court for the District of Kentucky can take jurisdiction of the cause, because the grants for the land in controversy, lying in Kentucky, were issued, the one by the state of Virginia, and the other by the state of Kentucky, when both grants purport to be founded upon warrants and locations made under the authority of the laws of Virginia.

It is the opinion of this court that the question which is referred to us by the Circuit Court of Kentucky is settled by the decision of this court, in the case of the town of Puget v. Clark and others (9 Cranch, 292).

The only difference between the two cases is, that in the case referred to, both parties claimed immediately under grants, the one from the state of Vermont, and the other from the state of New Hampshire, before the separation, which grants were *the inception of [379 title, and that, in this case, both parties claim under grants, the one issued by the state of Kentucky, and the other by the state of Virginia, but upon warrants issued by Virginia, and locations founded thereon, prior to the separation of Kentucky from Virginia. But where the controversy arises upon claims founded upon grants from different states, as the present case is understood to be, the principle decided in the case which has been cited precisely governs this. The decision in that case is founded on the words of the constitution of the United States, which extends the judicial power of the United States to controversies between citizens of the same state, claiming lands under grants of different states. It is the grant which passes the legal title to the land, and if the controversy is founded upon the conflicting grants of different states, the judicial power of the courts of the United States extends to the case whatever may have been the equitable title of the parties prior to the grant.

THE MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY OF ALEXANDRIA.

The answer of one defendant to a bill in chancery cannot be used as evidence against his co-defendant; and the answer of an agent is not evidence against his principal, nor are his admissions in pais, unless where they are a part of the res gesta.

Where a cause is set down for hearing on the bill, answer, and exhibits, without other pleadings, the whole of the answer must be considered as true.

THIS cause was argued by Swann for the appellants, and by Lee for the respondents.

Wheat, 2.

The opinion of the court was delivered by WASHINGTON, J.:

This is a bill filed on the equity side of the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, for the county of Alexandria, by the Marine Insurance Company of Alexandria against Jedediah Leeds, praying for an injunction to a judgment obtained at law in that court against the said company by William Hodgson, for the use of George F. Straas and the said Jedediah Leeds. The judgment was obtained by Hodgson on a policy of insurance, dated the 30th of September, 1799, effected by him with the said company on the brig Hope, in his own name, for George F. Straas and others, of Richmond.

The bill states that in the year 1810 the above judgment was obtained for the use and 381 benefit of *George F. Straas, and the respondent, Jedediah Leeds. That, previous to the said insurance, the said George F. Straas and Jedediah Leeds, being owners of a vessel called the Sophia, did, through the agency of the said William Hodgson, effect an insurance on the said vessel, the Sophia; for the premium on which, amounting to $2,754, Hodgson gave his own note. That Straas paid $929.00 in part of the premium note; and claiming a return of premium to the amount of the residue of the said note, he obtained an injunction in the Court of Chancery of Virginia, which was finally dissolved.

The ground on which that injunction is prayed is, that the balance of the premium due upon the insurance of the Sophia ought to be offset, so far as it goes, against the judgment at law upon the policy of the Hope.

The answer of Leeds denies that he had any interest in the Sophia at the time the insurance mentioned in the bill was effected, or that he was in any manner concerned in that insurance. He states that within a few months after the insurance on the Hope was effected, and long before the judgment at law was obtained, he had acquired by purchase from Straas and a

Mr. Trouin, the other owner of the Hope, all their interest in that vessel, and in the policy of insurance which had been effected upon her. He therefore denies the allegation in the bill that the judgment upon that policy was obtained for the use of Straas, or for that of any other person than himself. The answer refers to his agreement with *the other own- [*382] ers, which are annexed to the answer as parts thereof.

William Hodgson, who was made a defendant to this bill, states, in his answer, that he received an order in November, 1799, to effect an insurance on the Sophia and her cargo, for account of Straas & Leeds; in conformity with which order he effected the said insurance with the complainants, and gave his own note for the premium. He adds that he always understood from Leeds that he was interested with Straas in the said insurance.

A general replication was filed; but whether to both the answers, or to the answer of Hodgson alone, is not clear; and a dedimus was awarded to take depositions. No depositions, however, were taken, and the record states that the cause was set down for hearing on the bill, answer, and exhibits, and was heard on those proceedings. The exhibits relied upon by the defendant below to prove his purchases from the other owners of the Hope of their interest in that vessel, and in the insurance effected on her, were rejected by the Circuit Court. That court decreed a perpetual injunction as to the sum claimed by the complainants; from which decree an appeal was prayed, and allowed, to this court.

The facts relied upon by the appellant, to induce a reversal of this decree, are: 1. That the interest of Straas in the insurance of the Hope was transferred to him, the appellant, for a full consideration, soon after the insurance was effected, and before the judgment at law was obtained. 2. That the appellant had no interest in the Sophia at the time when *the in- [*383]

Johnson, 3 Litt. 286.

The general rule above stated does not apply where all the defendants are partners in the same transactions; for, in respect to these, the answer of either is evidence against the others. insurance was effected upon her, the premium on which is claimed in this case as an offset against the above judgment; and that the insurance of the Sophia was not made for the account or by the orders of the appellant.

The fact last mentioned must be considered as fully established, because the answer, in which it is asserted, is responsive to a direct allegation contained in the bill, and is not contradicted by any evidence in the cause.

The answer of Hodgson to this bill is not evidence against the appellant. The general rule which prevails in chancery is that the answer of one defendant cannot be used as evidence against his co-defendant; and it is the opinion of the court that this case does not furnish an exception to that rule. The answer of an agent is not evidence against his principal, nor are his admissions in pais, unless where they are a part of the res gesta.

As to the other fact upon which the appellant relies, there is more difficulty. The bill states that the judgment was recovered for the benefit of Straas & Leeds. This is denied in the answer, and thus far we may consider that fact as established in favor of the appellant. The answer goes further, and alleges that the recovery was for the sole benefit of the respondent. But this allegation is not proved, and there is no charge in the bill in relation to that fact which the answer contradicts.

After all, it is very difficult to understand, from this record, by what rules this cause was tried and decided in the Circuit Court. It is 384 stated in the record *that the cause was set down for hearing on the bill, answer, and exhibits. Now, if this was the real state of the cause, there can be no doubt but that the whole of the answer must be considered as true. But it appears on another part of the record that a general replication was filed, and that a commission was allowed for taking depositions. These entries are totally inconsistent with each other, unless the latter entry should have been made in reference to Hodgson's answer, which it immediately follows.

Whether setting down the cause for hearing on the bill and answer amounted to a waiver of the replication, in case it was put in by both defendants, need not be decided in this case, because it is the opinion of this court that the record exhibits the proceedings in a shape so irregular and equivocal that no final decree can be made which may not be productive of injustice to one or the other of the parties.

The decree of the Circuit Court, therefore, must be reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to that court to allow the parties to amend the pleadings.

Decree reversed.

An action of debt will lie by the payee or indorsee of a bill of exchange, against the acceptor, where it is expressed to be for value received.

Debt will lie by the payee of a note against a maker, where the note is expressed to be for value received.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

STORY, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of debt brought against the defendant in error, as acceptor of a bill of exchange by the plaintiffs in error as indorsees. The declaration alleges that the bill was drawn, accepted, and indorsed, for value received. The only question is, whether debt lies in such a case.

The general principle has been very correctly stated by Lord Chief Baron Comyn, that debt lies upon every express contract to pay a sum certain; and he adds, also, that it lies though there be only an implied contract. (Com. Dig. Debt, a. 8, a. 9.) But it has been supposed that this principle does not apply to an action on a bill of exchange, even where the suit is brought by the payee against the acceptor, *and a fortiori not where it is brought [386 by the indorsee. It is admitted that in Hardres, 485, the court held that debt does not lie by the payee of a bill of exchange against the acceptor. The reasons given for this opinion were, first, that there is no privity of contract between the parties; and, second, that an acceptance is only in the nature of a collateral promise or engagement to pay the debt of another, which does not create a duty. It is very difficult to perceive how it can be correctly affirmed that there is no privity of contract between the payee and acceptor. There is, in the very nature of the engagement, a direct and immediate contract between them. The consideration may not always, although it frequently does, arise between them; but privity of contract may exist if there be an express contract, although the consideration of the contract originated aliunde. Besides, if one person deliver money to another for the use of a third person, it has been settled that such a privity exists that the latter may maintain an action of debt against the bailee. (Harris v. De Bervoir, Cro. Jac., 687.) And it is clear that an acceptance is evidence of money had and received by the acceptor for the use of the holder. (Tatlock v. Harris, 3 T. R., 174; Vere v. Lewis, 3 T. R., 182.) It is also evidence of money paid by the holder to the use of the acceptor. (Ibid, and Bailey on Bills, 164, 3d edition.) A privity of contract, and a duty to pay, would seem, in such case, to be completely established; and wherever the common law raises a duty, debt lies. The other reason would seem not better founded. An acceptance *is [387 not a collateral engagement to pay the debt of another; it is an absolute engagement to pay the money to the holder of the bill; and the engagements of all the other parties are merely collateral. Prima facie, every acceptance affords a presumption of funds of the drawer in the hands of the acceptor, and is, of itself, an express appropriation of those funds for the use of the holder. The case may, indeed, be otherwise; and then the acceptor, in fact, pays the debt of the drawer; but as between himself and the payee it is not a collateral, but an original and direct undertaking. The payee accepts the acceptor as his debtor, and he cannot resort to the drawer but upon a failure of due payment of the bill. The engagement of the drawer, therefore, may more properly be termed collateral. Yet it has been held that debt will lie in favor of a payee against the drawer in case of non-payment by the acceptor. (Hard's case, Salk., 23; Hodges v. Steward, Skinn., 346; and see Bishop v. Young, 2 Bos. & Pull., 78.)

The reasons, then, assigned for the decision in Hardres are not satisfactory; and it deserves consideration that it was made at a time when the principles respecting mercantile contracts were not generally understood.

The old doctrine upon this subject has been very considerably shaken in modern times. An indebitatus assumpsit will now lie in favor of the payee against the acceptor; and it is generally true that where such an action lies, debt will lie. And a still stronger case is, that an acceptance is good evidence on a count upon an 388 insimul computassent *(Israel v. Douglas, 1 H. Bl., 239), which can only be upon the footing of a privity of contract.

But the most important case is that of Bishop v. Young (2 Bos. & Pull., 78). It was there held, in opposition to what was supposed to have been the doctrine of former cases, that debt would lie by the payee of a note against the maker, where the note was expressed to be for value received. That decision was given with measured caution, and the court expressly declined to give any opinion upon any but the case in judgment. The case in Hardres was there discussed, and although its reasoning was not impugned, an authoritative weight was not attempted to be given to it. In general, the legal predicament of the maker of a note is like that of the acceptor of a bill. Each is liable to the payee for the payment of the note or bill in the first instance; and after indorsement, each incurs the same liabilities. And if an action of debt will lie in favor of the payee of a note against the maker, it is not easy to perceive any sound principle upon which it ought to be denied against an acceptor of a bill. The acceptance of a bill is just as much an admission of a debt between the immediate parties as the drawing of a note.

The case has been thus far considered as if the action were brought by the payee against the acceptor. And this certainly presents the strongest view in favor of the argument. But in point of law every subsequent holder, in respect to the acceptor of a bill, and the maker of a note, stands in the same predicament as 389 the payee. An acceptance is as *much evidence of money had and received by the acceptor to the use of such holder, and of money paid by such holder for the use of the acceptor, as if he were the payee. (3 T. R., 172; Id., 184, Grant v. Vaughan, 3 Burr., 1515.)

Upon the whole, we do not think that the authority in Hardres can be sustained upon principle; and we see no inconvenience in adopting a rule more consonant to the just rights of the parties as recognized in modern times. In so doing, we apply the well-settled doctrine that debt lies in every case where the common law creates a duty for the payment of money, and in every case where there is an express contract for the payment of money. We are therefore of opinion that debt lies upon a bill of exchange by an indorsee of the bill Wheat. 2.

against the acceptor, when it is expressed to be for value received. The case at bar is somewhat stronger; for the declaration expressly avers that the bill was drawn, indorsed, and accepted for value received, and the demurrer admits the truth of the averment.

This opinion must be certified to the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia.

From the view which has been taken of the case it is unnecessary to consider whether the statute of Virginia applies to it or not.

Certificate accordingly.

THE UNION BANK OF GEORGETOWN.

v.

LAIRD.

By the act of incorporation of the Union Bank of Georgetown, ch. 88, sec. 11, the shares of any individual stockholder are transferable only on the books of the bank, according to the rules (conformably to law) established by the president and directors; and all debts due and payable to the bank by a stockholder, must be satisfied before the transfer shall be made, unless the president and directors should direct to the contrary. Held, that no person could acquire a legal title to any shares, except under a regular transfer, according to the rules of the bank; and if any person takes an equitable assignment, it must be subject to the rights of the bank, under the act of incorporation, of which he is bound to take notice.

A creditor may lawfully take and hold several securities for the same debt, and cannot be compelled to yield up either until the debt is paid; therefore, the bank has a right to take security from one of the parties to a bill or note discounted by it, and also to hold the shares of another party as security for the same.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

James Smith, on the 19th of March, 1811, drew a bill at sixty days sight, on James Patton, in favor of Andrew Smith, for $1,800. This bill was accepted by Patton, and was discounted in the Union Bank of Georgetown, at the instance of Andrew Smith, and when it became due, another bill of the same tenor was drawn and accepted by Patton, and discounted for the purpose of paying the preceding acceptance. This last acceptance became due on the 14th and 17th of July, and was protested for NOTE.—The provision usual in charters, that no transfer of the stock shall be effectual until entered in the books of the corporation, is a regulation for the security of the corporation itself, and of third persons making transfers without notice of any prior equitable transfer. It relates to the transfer of the legal, and not of the equitable title. As between vendor and vendee, a transfer not in conformity to such provisions, passes the equitable title, and divests the vendor of his interest. Black v. Zacharie, 3 How. 483; Bank of Utica v. Smith, 11 Penn. st. 120.

Under a provision in a charter of a bank that debts actually due by a stockholder must be paid before he can have his stock transferred, the bank has a right to prevent a transfer, on its books, of the 391] *non-payment; and at the time that it became due, Patton held 50 shares of stock in the Union Bank, which the bank considered liable to the payment of this acceptance, under their act of incorporation.

At this time, also, James Patton had another debt pending in the bank. Being one of the original subscribers to the bank, for the above-mentioned 50 shares of stock, he borrowed of the bank, in January, 1811, the sum of $1,500, and to enable him to obtain the loan, procured Marsteller and Young, and the defendant, Laird, to become his indorsers. This loan was renewed from time to time, and was continued, without any default of payment, until about the 29th of July, 1811.

On the 26th of March, 1811, Patton obtained from the officers of the bank a certificate of his 50 shares of stock, and on that day delivered it to the defendant, Laird, to secure him, as it was alleged, against his indorsement for Patton.

On the 10th of July, 1811, Patton executed a power of attorney, authorizing the defendant, Laird, to make a transfer of his stock; and on the 22d of August, 1811, he executed a deed of assignment to the defendant, Laird, of his stock; but as this assignment was not made upon the books of the bank, it was not considered a valid assignment, according to the rules of the bank.

Laird, considering himself entitled to the benefit of these shares, under the circumstances, applied to the bank to transfer upon their books the shares for his own benefit. But the bank, upon the ground that the acceptance which 392*] Patton had failed to pay, *operated as a lien upon those shares, refused to suffer the transfer to be made until that debt was paid.

Laird, some time after this refusal, to wit, on the 22d of February, 1812, paid the $1,500, for which he was indorser for Patton, reserving, nevertheless, his equitable claim upon the stock, and then instituted this suit in chancery, against the Union Bank, to compel them to suffer the transfer to be made on their books for his benefit, and to account with him for the intermediate profits. He charged in his bill, that when Patton obtained the certificate of his shares of stock, it was with a view of pledging those shares with him for his indemnification, and that the officers of the bank had a knowledge of this fact. He also alleged that the power of attorney was granted with the same view.

The directors of the bank filed their answer to this bill, and denied any knowledge of the object for which the certificate of shares was obtained; and alleged that they knew nothing of any claim of Laird upon those shares, until after the protest of Patton's acceptance.

The court below made a decree in favor of Laird, that the bank should suffer him to transfer the shares for his own benefit, and have an account for the intermediate profits.

The cause was argued by Swann for the appellants, and by Jones for the respondent.

Story, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

*The principal question is, whether, [393 under the circumstances of this case, Laird, the original plaintiff, has a right to a transfer from the bank of the fifty shares of its capital stock, standing in the name of Patton, without paying the acceptance of Patton; or, in other words, whether Laird has a priority of lien upon these shares. By the 11th section of the act of incorporation (act of 18th February, 1811, ch. 86), it is enacted, "That the shares of the capital stock, at any time owned by any individual stockholder, shall be transferable only on the books of the bank, according to such rules as may, conformably to law, be established in that behalf, by the president and directors; but all debts actually due and payable to the bank (days of grace for payment being passed) by a stockholder, requesting a transfer, must be satisfied before such transfer shall be made, unless the president and directors shall direct to the contrary." The certificate, issued stock of any debtor of the bank; and if it claims more than is due the stockholder must tender what is due, in order to put the bank in the wrong. Piereson v. Bk. of Wash., 3 Cranch, C. C. 363.

The stock of a corporation in Massachusetts is so within the powers of its courts, having all parties before them, that their decree will transfer the title of the stock to a third person. Sprague v. Cochecho Man. Co., 10 Blatchf. 173.

A by-law, requiring transfers of stock to be made on the books, may be waived by a corporation, so that purchaser becomes a stockholder. Upton v. Burnham, 3 Biss. 431.

A corporation, organized under a statute which provides that the stock of the company shall be transferable in such manner as shall be prescribed by the by-laws of the company, has power to make a by-law providing that no transfer of stock shall be made upon the books of the company, until after payment of all indebtedness to the corporation from the person in whose name the stock stands on its books. Prendergast v. Bk. of Stockton, 2 Sawyer, 108.

In Connecticut, where a clause is found in the charter or by-laws, to the effect that to be valid and effectual, it is held that the transfer of stock must be registered on the company's books; the transfer is invalid and of no effect for any purpose, unless made or registered on such books. *Marl. In other states, and in the Supreme Court of the United States, the rule is held as first above stated in this note. Chateau Sp. Co. v. Harris, 20 Mo. 382; Conant v. Seneca Bk., 1 Ohio st. 208; Sabine v. Bk. of Woodstock, 21 Vt. 353; St. Louis Ins. Co. v. Goodfellow, 9 Mo. 149.

A lien upon shares of a stockholder for debts due from him to the corporation is usually given by statute or act of incorporation to incorporated banking companies, and includes notes discounted, whether due or not, and whether stockholder is liable as principal or indorser. Utica Bk. v. Small-ey, 2 Cow. 770; Rogers v. Huntington Bk., 12 Serg. & R. 77; Grant v. Mech. Bk., 15 Serg. & R. 140; Sewall v. Lancaster Bk., 17 Serg. & R. 285; Donner v. Bk. of Zanesville, Wright. An assignee of stock cannot acquire any rights against the corporation superior to those possessed by the assignor. He takes it subject to the equity of the company under its charter and by-laws. Mech. Bk. v. N. Y. R. Co., 13 N. Y. 599; McCready v. Rumsey, 6 Duer. 574; *Stebbins v. Fire Ins. Wheat. 2.

to Patton for the 50 shares held by him (which is in the usual form), declares the shares to be "transferable at the said bank, by the said Patton, or his attorney, on surrendering this certificate." No person, therefore, can acquire a legal title to any shares, except under a regular transfer, according to the rules of the bank; and if any person takes an equitable assignment, it must be subject to the rights of the bank, under the act of incorporation, of which he is bound to take notice. The president and directors of the bank expressly deny that they have waived, or ever intended to waive, the right of the bank to the lien, for debts due to the bank, by the form of the certificate, and 394*] *that they ever directed any transfer to be made to Patton which should stipulate to the contrary. Under such circumstances, it must be held that the shares are responsible for the debts due to the bank.

The next inquiry is, whether the bank has done anything to deprive itself of the lien upon the shares for the acceptance of Patton, since the same became due, and to let in the equitable title of the plaintiff. The acceptance is not yet paid; and nothing has been done by the bank affecting its rights, unless the subsequent taking of security for the acceptance from Smith, can be construed so to do. Certainly the bank had a right to require additional security from the indorser of the acceptance; and it cannot be perceived upon what principles this can be construed an extinguishment of its lien upon the shares of the acceptor. A creditor may lawfully take and hold several securities for the same debt from his joint debtors; and he cannot be compellable to yield up either until his debt is paid. And in this case, there is no want of equity in holding the shares of Patton, who is the immediate debtor to the bank, liable in the first instance, rather than resorting to the security of an indorser, who is only liable upon the default of the acceptor.

The decree of the Circuit Court must therefore be reversed, and the bill be dismissed.

Decree accordingly.

THELUSSON ET AL. v. SMITH.

T. brought a suit against C. in the Circuit Court of Pennsylvania, which was referred to arbitrators; an award was made in favor of T., and a judgment nisi entered on the 20th May, 1805; exceptions were filed, overruled, and judgment finally entered on the 15th of May, 1806. On the 22d May, 1805, C. executed a conveyance of all his estate to trustees, for the payment of his debts, at which time he was indebted to the United States, on several duty bonds which became due at different periods subsequent to the 22d May, 1805. Suits were brought on the bonds as they severally became due, and judgments obtained, and executions issued, under which a landed estate belonging to C. was levied upon and sold. T. brought an action against S. (the marshal of the district), who levied the executions, to recover so much of the funds in his hands as would be sufficient to satisfy T's judgment. In this suit the jury found a special verdict that C. was insolvent on the 20th May, 1805, but that it was not notoriously known; and the parties agreed that on the 22d May, 1805, he was unable to satisfy all his debts, and that this fact should be considered part of the special verdict.

Held, that the word insolvency, mentioned in the duty act of 1790, ch. 35, sec. 45.; and repeated in the act of 1797, ch. 74, sec. 5, and of 1799, ch. 128, sec. 65, means a legal insolvency, which, whenever it occurs, the right of preference arises to the United States as well as in the other specified cases to which the acts of 1797 and 1799 have extended the cases of insolvency.

But if before the right of preference has accrued to the United States, the debtor has made a bona fide conveyance of his estate to a third person, or has mortgaged it to secure a debt, or if his property has been seized under an execution, the property is devested out of the debtor, and cannot be made liable to the United States.

A judgment gives to the judgment creditor a lien on the debtor's lands, and a preference over all subsequent judgment creditors. But the law defeats the preference in favor of the United States in the cases specified in the act of 1799, ch. 128, sec. 65.

*ERROR to the Circuit Court for the [*397 District of Pennsylvania.

The plaintiffs in error instituted a suit in the Circuit Court for the District of Pennsylvania against William Crammond, which, by the agreement of the parties, and the order of the court, was referred to arbitrators. An award was made in favor of the plaintiffs, and a judgment nisi was entered on the 20th of May, 1805. Exceptions were filed and overruled; and a judgment was finally entered on the 15th of May, 1806. On the 22d of May, 1805, Crammond executed a conveyance of all his estate to trustees, for the payment of his debts, at which time he was indebted to the United States, on several duty bonds, which became due at different periods subsequent to the 22d of May, 1805. Suits were instituted on these bonds as they severally became due, and judgments were obtained and executions issued, under which a landed estate belonging to Crammond, called Sedgely, was levied upon and sold.

The plaintiffs, considering this property as being bound by their prior judgment of the 20th of May, 1805, and that they were entitled to be first satisfied out of the money in the hands of the defendant (the marshal of the court), which he had raised under the above executions, issued in the name of the United States, they brought this action to recover so much of those funds as would be sufficient to satisfy their judgment.

Upon the trial of the cause in the Circuit Court, the jury found that Crammond was insolvent on the 20th of May, 1805, but that it was not notoriously known; subject to the opinion of the court upon a state of facts agreed between the parties, whether the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. The parties further agreed in writing that, on the 22d of May, 1805, Mr. Crammond was unable to satisfy all his debts, and that this fact should be considered as part of the special verdict. The other facts referred to by the jury are, in substance, those which have been mentioned. The Circuit Court gave judgment against the plaintiffs below, and the cause was brought by writ of error to this court.

Hopkinson, for the plaintiffs in error. 1. It is now settled that the insolvency of a debtor which is to give a preference to the United States over the other creditors, must be, not a mere inability to pay debts, but a legal insolvency, testified by some act of notoriety. The question is, whether the United States were entitled to a priority of payment, out of this real estate, over a judgment rendered previous to the act of insolvency, with which, and by virtue of which, the right of priority originated and attached. Whatever may be the nature and effect of the priority given by the acts of Congress to the United States, it has been distinctly decided that it is not a lien;¹ and, therefore, it is said, that a conveyance shall not be defeated by it, which would be to give it the effect of a lien. It is clear the legislature did not consider the preference given to the United States to have the force of a lien on the real estate of the debtor, because the act of 1798, ch. 88, sec. 15, expressly gives to the United States a lien on the real estate of supervisors and other revenue officers, from the time of the commencement of the suit against them. Certainly it cannot be imagined the United States intended to have a less security against the delinquency of their revenue officers than in the case of ordinary debtors; on the contrary, it is unquestionable that by the law of 1798 they intended to increase their security against their revenue officers; and yet, if the mere right of priority has the force and effect now contended for, the law of 1798 was not only unnecessary, but has really diminished the security for the payment of moneys collected by and due from these officers. That law limits the responsibility of the real estate to the commencement of the suit; whereas, the responsibility now claimed under the privilege of preference, has no limit. Should it be answered to this, that under the law of 1798 the United States are made secure even against conveyances and mortgages subsequent to the commencement of their suit, still it shows that the legislature considered a lien on the real estate of the debtor as something of a nature and effect higher and better than the mere priority they before enjoyed; and if it be so, it must hold the same rank in the hands of a citizen, and be considered superior to the priority of the United States; especially when that priority attached after the lien was in full force and operation on the real estate of the debtor. If any argument may be drawn from the reasoning of the counsel of the United States in other cases, where the same doctrine was agitated, it will be found, that in the case of The United States v. Fisher and others,² it was expressly declared that this priority was not claimed with the creation of the debt, nor while the debtor remained master of his own property; and such is now the admitted law. It follows, then, that in the present case the right of the United States did not come into being until the execution of the assignment on the 22d of May; and unless, therefore, it has a retrospective force and operation, it cannot destroy or disturb a judgment entered on the 20th of May, vesting an important and recorded right in the plaintiffs. Supposing, then, that a mere right of priority of payment could, in any case, overreach a bona fide judgment, in relation to the real estate of the debtor, bound by that judgment, when the priority constitutes no lien upon it; still, the question remains, whether a subsequent right acquired by the United States can have a retrospective operation so as to overreach and defeat a prior right vested fully and fairly in a citizen. To permit this, is so contrary to all practice and equity, and to the general policy of the law, that the court will not sanction it, unless bound by the most clear and imperious authority. What, then, is the provision of the act of Congress under which this high and extraordinary privilege is claimed? After the decisions that have taken place on this subject, we are warranted in saying that nothing is given but a priority or preference of payment to the United States, in case of the insolvency of their debtor; but no lien, general or specific, on any part of his property; nothing which interferes with his control over that property; which prevents his selling it altogether; or pledging it for a debt; or exercising, bona fide, any of the usual acts of ownership in relation to it. A man may be a debtor to the United States, and lawfully do all these things to the moment of his legal insolvency; he may do them when he is actually insolvent; that is, unable to pay all his debts. In *The United States v. Fisher*³ this priority is declared not to affect a purchaser. In Wall. Rep., 22, a particular assignee is protected. In *The United States v. Hooe*⁴ a mortgagee in trust, as well as a mortgagee generally. Then, on what principle of law, of justice, or equity, should not a judgment receive the same favor and protection? 2. In Pennsylvania a judgment has always been considered a higher and better security than a mortgage; inasmuch as it has been supposed to give the same fixed, immovable lien, on all the real estate of the debtor, which a mortgage, which is also but a security for the payment of a debt, gives on a specified part of it. There is no event on which, and no means by which, the mortgagee can turn this conditional into an absolute conveyance. If the money is not paid, he must proceed to obtain a judgment on his mortgage; to take the mortgaged premises in execution; to sell them by the process and officer of the 402] court; from whom he must receive *his debt, interest, and costs, and the surplus belongs to the debtor, as in the sale of any other property taken in execution for the satisfaction of a judgment. On what principle can it be maintained that every act of a debtor over his real estate in favor of a purchaser, or creditor, shall be available against this preference of the United States, except the most solemn of all acts—a public recorded judgment? That this priority is not a lien on the property of the debtor has been expressly decided; and, for this reason, it is not permitted to disturb a purchaser or mortgagee; it is, therefore, something less, in the estimation of the law, than a lien; how, then, can it overthrow the firmest of all liens—a judgment duly rendered? If a debtor, by a particular assignment, should appropriate his real estate to pay a debt, or a number of debts, the United States could not defeat the appropriation by their claim to a preference; and yet when he makes the same appropriation by a judgment, or, what is perhaps stronger, the law does it for him, and he certainly also intends to do it, the appropriation is invalid and ineffectual against the claim of the United States, resting on a priority arising, perhaps, years after the appropriation was thus solemnly made, and on the faith of which the innocent creditor may have trusted his all. Another strange consequence and incongruity grows out of this doctrine, so pregnant with inconvenience and injustice. A judgment has unquestionable preference over a subsequent conveyance, assignment, or mortgage. The priority, then, of the United States, shall 403] *not affect the conveyance, an assignment, or a mortgage, but it shall destroy that which is greater than them all. It overthrows the stronger security, while it cannot avail against the weaker. Further, when a debtor has secured the debt by a judgment, is it not a sound principle that he cannot impair the security of his creditor by any subsequent act of his own, by any contract or conveyance he may afterwards make? How, then, can he do so by a bond given to the United States, by a contract afterwards made with them? 3. The only distinction that can be drawn between a judgment and a mortgage is, that the latter is said to be a specific, and the former a general lien; or, in other words, the one covers the whole, and the other but a part of the real estate of the debtor. This has always been considered a circumstance to the advantage of the judgment; and it is by a singular course of argument it should be now discovered to be precisely otherwise. In the first place it may be asked, why should either a general or specific lien or right be overreached by a subsequent right? and why should not the one as well as the other? There is no difference in justice or in law. A general lien at law is just as good and effectual as a specific lien. In equity a general lien is sometimes made to yield to an equity which would not disturb a specific lien; as in the case where one agrees to purchase, and pays money on the contract, he has been permitted to prevail against a judgment, but not against a mortgage. But, in this case, the purchaser must succeed on his equity; for if he has none, *as if he has paid a de- 404 fective consideration, he will not prevail against a judgment.¹ Further, the payment, or advance of money, must have been on the specific land, to give the equity to his claim. Have the United States any such equity in this case? They have no equity of any sort; they have advanced nothing; they have trusted nothing on the faith of this land; on the contrary, the plaintiffs have advanced their money on the faith of it: money is often lent and no other security is taken for it than a judgment. But the claim of the United States is placed mainly, if not wholly, on the words of the act of Congress. What, then, is to be found there which recognizes any distinction between the rights of a general and specific lien? There is nothing. The mortgagee has, therefore, been excepted on general principles of law and justice; and the same principles afford an equal protection to the judgment creditor. 4. The acts of Congress state particular occurrences—insolvency for instance—from the happening of which the United States shall have a priority of payment over other creditors, out of the property of the debtor; out of the property which he has at the time of the happening of the fact, which gives the right; at the time of the insolvency, in the present case. This is the origin, the commencement, the creation of the right, even of priority; and there is nothing in any of the acts of Congress to give a retrospective operation to this right, by which it shall *overreach other rights previously 405 vested. And as there is nothing in the words of the act to produce this effect, neither is there anything in the legal nature of the priority to do it, inasmuch as the court has decided it is no lien; and that it has no power to disturb a previous conveyance or mortgage. The law enacts that in all cases of insolvency where the estate in the hands of the assignee shall be insufficient to pay all the debts due, the debts due to the United States shall be first satisfied. And any assignee who shall pay any debt due by the insolvent, out of his estate and effects, until the debts due to the United States are satisfied, shall be answerable in his own person and estate. But what, properly and legally speaking, is the estate of the insolvent, in the hands, that is, at the disposal of the assignee? Surely nothing but the interest which remains in him after discharging incumbrances legally imposed upon it. 5. But it is said the assignee shall not pay any debt before that of the United States is satisfied; and that a judgment is a debt, and, therefore, to be postponed. I would rather say a judgment is the security, or means to enforce the payment of a debt, than that it is the debt. But if it be a debt, it is also something more than a debt; it is a debt accompanied by a lien to secure its payment; and the question is not whether the debt shall be postponed, but whether the lien shall be defeated. So the money secured to be paid by a mortgage is a debt, appearing, and, indeed, created by a bond referred to in the mortgage. The difference between the cases, then, is only 406] this, *that the one is a debt secured by a judgment binding all the real estate and the other is a debt secured by a mortgage binding a part of that real estate. The supposed distinction between a general and specific lien has no influence on this point in the case; and if a judgment is to be cut out on the effect of the words "any debt," in the act of Congress, I know not what is to save a mortgage. It seems to be obvious that the law, when it speaks of debts to be postponed to the United States, relates only to the case of a mere debt, standing on its own strength and security, and never intended to interfere with any collateral or additional act done in relation to the debt, which gives a new right to the creditor; but that right, whatever it may be, shall have its full and fair legal operation and efficacy. If, then, the debtor has pledged his property, or given a lien upon it, or any part of it, it was never intended to disturb this right. By taking preference of a mere debt, no injustice is done; at least, no rights are destroyed; because the debtor himself might have done the same in favor of any creditor, having it in his power to give preferences; and every creditor knowing he has this power cannot complain if it is exercised. On this construction, therefore, the act of Congress brings no loss upon the creditor but what he knew he was exposed to, and consented to take the chance of, when he trusted his debtor. There is a clear distinction between taking priority of payment of a debt and overthrowing a security, a lien, a pledge, general or specific, given for the payment of the debt.

407*] Jones*, contra. 1. This case is within the very terms of the 65th section of the act of March 2, 1799, ch. 128, for collection of duties. The debt was due by bond for duties; the debtor was insolvent, as well in fact as in law, according to the legal intendment of insolvency as explained in that section; his assignees, finding the estate in their hands insufficient to pay all the debts, have first satisfied that due to the United States, pursuant to the strict injunctions of the law, and under the peril of being chargeable, in their own persons, with the debt. The term first, in the section, relates simply to the antecedent "all debts." Then the debt due to the United States shall be satisfied first of all debts; without distinction of the quality or dignity of the other debts, whether of record by specialty or simple contract. So the assignees are prohibited from paying any debt (without exception) before that due the United States, at the peril of being personally chargeable. The principle upon which this court, in the case of The United States v. Hooe,¹ construed the assignment of property mentioned in another clause of this section, to intend an assignment of all the debtor's property, applies more directly and forcibly to give the United States a preference over all debts, without exception; indeed, it can scarcely be called a construction, but a plain reading. The plaintiffs contend that one species of debt—a judgment—still maintains its former dignity and rights unimpaired; that they, as judgment creditors, ought to have been *preferred [408 to the United States. Before that pretension can be sustained, the plaintiffs must bring their case within some exception of the law, either express or necessarily implied. The former is out of the question; for the directions of the law are unqualified, and without exception. If there be any such implied, it must be so latent, and is to be inferred only from such remote premises, and by so refined and subtle a process of reasoning, as would present a strange anomaly in legislation. Surely there is no defect of congruity or precision imputed by the counsel on the other side to our construction of the law which is, in any degree, comparable to that of leaving so important and prominent an exception from plain and positive terms of enactment, to be discovered only by the "optics keen" of the few gifted intellects capable of deep research and abstruse deductions. As regards the great body of the community, such a mode of legislation would be as unreasonable as that of the Roman despot, who posted his edicts so high that they could not be read, and then punished his subjects for their involuntary disobedience. 2. No exception of one description of creditor, any more than another, is either expressed or implied. 'Tis true that the debt due to the United States can only be satisfied out of the property of the debtor himself, according to the terms of the law; consequently, there is no necessity for any constructive or implied exception from the general terms of the law; in order to save property in the hands of a bona fide purchaser from being subjected to *the payment of the vendor's debts, it [409 is excluded ex vi termini, nor could it have been brought within the purview of the law without a substantive and positive provision to that effect. A mortgagee is a purchaser; the estate is divested from the mortgageor, to whom nothing remains but an equity of redemption, and to that equity of redemption must the United States resort for satisfaction. A judgment, on the contrary, operates no divestiture of property till carried into actual execution; and the debtor has the jus disponendi as completely after judgment as before, except that the purchaser takes cum onere, subject to the general lien created by the prior judgment. That lien vests no specific interest or estate in the creditor; but is nothing more than an outstanding claim (which may or may not be enforced) to have the judgment satisfied out of the estate; let the judgment be, in any manner released or satisfied, and the lien is, ipso facto, dissolved; the estate of the vendee is instantly discharged and exonerated from the claim, without any act whatever proceeding from the creditor of the vendor to the vendee. The mortgagee trusts the mortgageor, upon the faith of a contract which specifically vests in him, the estate of the debtor, as a collateral security for the debt; the judgment creditor, on the contrary, stands upon his legal rights, has trusted nothing to the faith of contracts, and has gained nothing by contract; his advantage, whatever it be, is gained by sheer coercion upon his debtor, and by mere operation of law. To the mere operation of law, therefore, let him look for his security. The principle of affording *greater protection to rights growing out of bona fide contracts than to those acquired by mere operation of law, is not confined to the cases of general and specific liens as differently affected by the principle of relation incident to a state of bankruptcy, or by a prior equity; for it is a settled rule of equity to afford relief as against assignees coming into the legal estate by operation of law; when relief would be refused as against assignees or purchasers under contract for valuable consideration. 3. In order to ascertain the state of insolvency, in the life-time of the debtor, upon which the preference of the United States is to be enforced, three tests are adopted, any one of which is sufficient; and all of which must be presumed equal between themselves: 1st. An assignment of property for the benefit of creditors, at a time when the debtor has not sufficient for the payment of all his debts. 2d. His absconding, concealment, or absence, followed by attachment of his effects; and, 3d. An act of legal bankruptcy committed. This last (inasmuch as the bankrupt law of the United States was not passed till afterwards) is presumed to comprehend, as well acts of legal bankruptcy or insolvency under state laws as under the subsequent act of Congress. Now, it must be presumed that Congress intended all those enumerated instances of insolvency to be equivalent; and to be followed by precisely the same consequences in relation to the rights of the United States. Then, if the debtor had become insolvent under the law of Pennsylvania, ever so long after the rendition of judgment, the prior lien would have been overreached *and annulled by relation, and all the creditors reduced to a perfect equality; and such, also, unquestionably would have been the case under the bankrupt law of the United States. In either case, could the preference of the United States over all the creditors, thus reduced by operation of law to perfect equality, admit of doubt? A substantial distinction between the consequences attached to "an act of legal bankruptcy," and those attached to any other of the equivalent acts of insolvency enumerated in the 65th section, is altogether inconceivable. The enumeration among those acts, of attachments against absconding debtors, shows what little regard was had to the strongest of all liens produced by mere process of law, and not arising ex contractu, in the nature of a bona fide alienation of property. 4. As to the argument that has been so much pressed to prove, that because the preference of the United States does not overreach these conveyances and incumbrances, it is not in the nature of a lien created with the debt ab initio; it may be safely admitted (and indeed it is now settled) that it is not, technically speaking, a lien; yet the inference that it is therefore less than a lien is not so obvious. The legislature, when it is contemplated to defeat one lien, is under no necessity to effect the object through the instrumentality of another lien. Nor is there anything absurd or incongruous in making that paramount, which, according to pre-existing rules of positive institution, was inferior. It is perfectly competent for the legislature to exalt the humble, and humble the exalted; and to declare the less to be *greater, when the relative [*412] magnitudes of the two objects are not from the nature of things, but the mere creatures of law. Then, whatever success may attend the effort to establish a specific difference between a lien, technically so called, and the right of preference claimed by the United States, the law is express that the latter shall prevail to place the United States first in the order of payment of all debts. It may have been deemed adequate to all the purposes of reasonable security, without attaching any specific lien upon the debtor's property, that every person who happens to be charged, either ministerially or under trust, with the administration of the insolvent's effects, is bound, at his peril to regard the established preference in favor of the United States. 5. It is objected that our construction gives the United States a more extensive and coercive remedy against an ordinary debtor for duties than was deemed necessary against defaulting supervisors and other officers of the revenue, upon whose estates the lien commences only with the commencement of the suit, according to the provisions of the act of 1798. This objection would be entirely inconclusive if it were well founded; but, in truth, it has no foundation; for not only is the commencement of suit made equivalent to attachment by the law of 1798, and any alienation whatever of the defaulting officers' estate thenceforth prevented; but that is cumulative on the general preference secured to the United States, by the 5th section of the act of the 8d of March, 1797, ch. 74. 6. The distinction insisted on between a mere debt and a debt accompanied by a lien—between *postponing a debt and defeating a [*413] lien—is conceived to be utterly unsubstantial. The general lien incidental to a judgment is the means of securing to the judgment creditor a preference over other creditors. Take away his preference, postpone him to another creditor, and all the incidents by which his preference was secured are necessarily destroyed.

Ingersoll, on the same side. 1. The court will not fail to perceive that the question involved in this case arises, not out of the obnoxious act of the 3d of March, 1797, ch. 74, the 5th section of which gives universal and unqualified preference to the government "where any revenue officer or other person becomes indebted to the United States, by bond, or otherwise," but out of the act of the 2d of March, 1799, ch. 128, which affords priority to the government over individual creditors, only in the case of custom-house bonds and duties. Even the constitutionality of the law of 1797 has been questioned, though always maintained; and its policy has been the theme of severe animadversion. But the constitutionality of the law of 1799 has seldom, if ever, been drawn into doubt; and its policy is sufficiently obvious. Government could, if it would, exact payment of duties in money, or in a portion of the article imported, at the time of importation, instead of bonding the duties for future and contingent liquidation. For the accommodation of merchants, the 62d section, at their option, substitutes bonds giving time, on security, for payment, instead of exacting it on the permit to land, and delivery of the goods; for which in-

414*] dulgence the priority, asserted, with notice to all the world, by the same law, is nothing more than a fair and reasonable equivalent. This priority has been established by law ever since the present government of the United States. The acts of the 31st of July, 1789, ch. 5; of the 4th of August, 1790, ch. 35, sec. 45; of the 2d of March, 1792, sec. 18; and of the 2d of March, 1799, ch. 128, sec. 65, have maintained it in an interrupted series of legislation, uniformly sustained by this court, and by the state courts.¹ 2. The question in the case in controversy is, whether an individual judgment creditor, without execution, and, of course, having nothing in possession, nor by specific lien, is entitled to a preference, priority, and advantage, superior to that "reserved and secured," by the act in question, to the public. The Sedgely estate, in dispute, was taken in execution at the suit, and by the marshal of the United States, before Thelusson could levy his execution. The controversy, therefore, is between a foreign individual creditor, who never had, and never could have, possession of the property, and who is fortified with no particular or specific lien against it, on the one hand; and the United States on the other hand, from whose custody and possession he alleges a superior right to take it, notwithstanding their statutory priority of apparent right, and their legal 415] *priority of actual possession. The whole effect of the private creditor's judgment, at all events, goes no further than to ascertain his debt, and give him a general, not a specific lien. Upon this judgment there could be no execution till on the quarto die post, to wit, on the 24th May; and in that interim, to wit, on the 22d May, the general assignment took effect; intercepted the operation, destroyed all the advantages of the judgment, and created the very case which the law provides for. 3. According to the law of Pennsylvania, a judgment creditor, without execution executed, is entitled to come in only as a simple contract creditor.² And, in fact, a judgment is considered as no more than a debt deprived of all attributes of lien, and merely put in a course of distribution.³ These decisions, then, dispose at once of all the argument that is introduced upon the general doctrine of the dignity of judgments; and serve, moreover, to show the fallacy of many of the ingenious difficulties with which the opposite counsel's view of the subject would embarrass the determination of the Circuit Court. The practice of the law does not conform to the theory he imputes to it. The judgment binds the land—as whose property? As the debtor's. But the mortgage transfers the proprietary interest to the mortgagee; and though, in point of relative rank or dignity, the judgment creditor may conceive himself entitled to the first place, yet 416*] certainly the mortgagee *is much better fortified against the law in question; because, in the one case, the property is still in the original debtor, liable to the future operations of a judgment; whereas, in the other case, the property has been, in legal contemplation, conveyed away from the original debtor to his creditor, with a clause of defeasance in the event of certain conditions complied with. A particular appropriation of the estate in payment of the debt would not defeat the public preference, unless that appropriation were followed up by a conveyance of the estate, and the actual change of ownership; in which case it would be no longer the property of the public debtor. 4. The law contemplates the three cases of, 1st, death; 2d, insolvency; and, 3d, attachment; to which may, perhaps, be added, a 4th, that of legal bankruptcy; though this is nearly similar to the 3d. Now, in the case of death and insufficiency of assets, there can be no doubt. If Crammond had died on the 21st May, 1805, the United States would clearly have enjoyed the preference secured to them over the plaintiffs. And why not in like manner in the case of insolvency? All the policy and all the hardship that can be imagined for the second case are just as applicable to the first. But because a line, which it is not necessary to contest, has been drawn, in the decisions on this subject, between the cases of popular insolvency, or mere inability to pay debts and meet engagements, and of legal or technical insolvency, or a public acknowledgment of that inability; efforts have been made to extricate insolvency *from the [417 law, when no reason can be given for it that is not equally applicable to death. The last illustration in this section is the case of legal bankruptcy; and it is well known that, under the bankrupt system, a bankruptcy cuts out a prior judgment on which no execution has been levied; and that the judgment creditor is entitled to no more than his rateable proportion, and mere dividend, in common with other creditors having no security. But the reply is, that we have no bankrupt system. Still, however, a secret act of bankruptcy is within our law; and on the score of hardship, is, at least, as severe a case as any that can be set up. When a mortgagee pays a debt, or it is paid for him, this is not any debt within the law; because it is specifically secured, and in legal contemplation, paid by the transfer of a certain portion of the debtor's real estate, which the creditor holds, as it were, possession of. It is true that in order to recover payment of the money the mortgagee must pursue the forms and process indicated by law for that purpose; but neither the mortgagee nor any other person can prevent his taking possession of the property mortgaged, otherwise than by paying him the money for which it is specifically pledged. The difference between such a lien and that of a mere unexecuted judgment, is perfectly obvious, and, indeed, is most emphatically recognized in the case from Peere Williams cited on the other side. The 65th section of the act of 1799 makes no exceptions. It prohibits the payment of any debt by an assignee, under the penalty of personal accountability. Nor can the court *incorporate [418 exceptions into the law. But where the property is no longer in the debtor's hands, as in the cases of a mortgage, a bona fide sale, or a fi. fa. levied, the property is taken out of the debtor's hands; and the court will not permit the public to carry their priority into the possession of an innocent third person. Up to the period of his assignment, Crammond continued in possession of the Sedgely estate. At that period, the Thelussions had no specific power or control over that estate. Unless, therefore, it became from that moment liable to the public preference, what is that preference, and what does it amount to? To nothing more, says the opposite counsel, than a claim upon what is left after satisfying all incumbrances. If so, the law was framed (as it evidently was) with great pains to very little purpose indeed. 5. As to the argument drawn from the supposed admission of counsel arguendo in the case of The United States v. Fisher, it is true that while the debtor remains master of his property the priority cannot dispossess him on the plea of a popular insolvency, or inability to pay his debts. It is equally true that the priority has no pretensions to be deemed a lien. But it nevertheless may have force enough to operate whenever the insolvency is announced, by intercepting the mere prospective security of a judgment creditor without execution. But this is no retrospective operation. 6. As to the comparative equities, the surety, or assignee, who pays the bond, on the faith of this act of Congress, has at least as much to recommend him on that score as the mere judgment creditor, of the nature of whose debt nothing is [419*] known; *and since the various, the decided, and the consistent determinations of different courts, both state and national, in support of this law, there can be no question on which side the hardship preponderates.

Hopkinson, in reply. 1. It is said that the Sedgely estate was taken in execution at the suit of the United States, before Thelussion could levy his execution; who, therefore, never could have possession of the property, and yet endeavors to take it from the custody and possession of the United States. I do not apprehend that this is a question on the right of possession in the property taken in execution; nor is it at all material at whose suit the property was so taken and sold. Neither party ever had a possession, either actual or legal. If the possession, asserted to have been held by the United States, under their execution, gives them a right which cuts out the antecedent judgment, it is needless to resort to the protection and power of the act of Congress to strengthen it; and any other creditor obtaining the same sort of possession would have the same right, and might assume the same preference over antecedent judgments. It does not appear, by the special verdict, when the execution at the suit of the United States was taken out and levied; and, therefore, there is no foundation in the record for saying it was done before Thelussion could levy his execution. The decision of the question must turn on the statutory priority of the United States, and not on their legal priority of actual possession—they never have had any [420*] such possession. *2. It cannot surely be imagined that the assignment of Crammond, made on the 22d of May, because it happened before the expiration of four days after the date of our judgment, did, therefore, per se, interrupt the operation or destroy the advantages of the judgment. If so, then the effect has been produced by virtue of the assignment, and not by the provisions of the act of Congress. The fact, however, is not so; the date of the assignment is material only to fix the period of the insolvency; of the circumstance which gave Wheat. 2.

right to the preference of the United States, whatever it is; but whether it shall take preference of the judgment is the matter to be decided by the act of Congress, and not by the legal force or operation of the assignment; which, to all the purposes of this argument, is the same whether made three days or thirty days after the judgment. The time when you may issue an execution under a judgment is no limitation of the power of the judgment to bind the real estate; otherwise, a sale made within the four days would be valid and effectual. 3. The case of Gibbs v. Gibbs,¹ was that of a judgment creditor without an execution; another judgment creditor with an execution executed; and then a legal bankruptcy, there being at that time a regular bankrupt law in Pennsylvania. The question was between the two judgments. Did the second judgment creditor pretend to take priority by virtue of its execution, or by that "actual possession" which is *set [*421 up in our case? No. The second judgment creditor claimed because the words of the bankrupt law expressly included the case of his opponent, taking away his right, and did not so include or affect his own judgment or right. The question arose under the 30th section of the bankrupt law, which expressly declares "that every creditor, having security for his debt by judgment, &c., whereof there is no execution served and executed upon the lands, goods, and estate of the bankrupt, &c., shall not be relieved for any more than a rateable proportion of their debts," &c. The creditor, therefore, in that case, whose judgment was unexecuted, was expressly excluded; and he whose judgment was executed, was as expressly saved by the terms of the act. The reason given for this construction of the bankrupt law does not apply to our case. It is, that the estate vested in the commissioners, by the act of bankruptcy; but so far is this from being the effect of an act of insolvency by the act of Congress that it has been decided that the right acquired by the United States, by the insolvency, is a mere right of priority of payment, without even creating a lien on the real estate to secure it. The case of Moliere's lessee v. Noe,² arose under the intestate laws of Pennsylvania. These laws authorize a sale of the real estate of an intestate, under certain circumstances, by the administrator, by the order and sanction of the Orphans' Court. A house and lot of an intestate had been thus sold. Certain judgments had been obtained against the intestate in his lifetime; *and the question was between [422 these judgment creditors and the purchaser from the administrator under the order of the Orphans' Court. The decision is made in favor of the latter, on a review of the several laws of the state on the subject, and the clear intention of the legislature. No principle is affirmed at all applicable to our case. The court say that the word "debts," in its most general sense, and as used in those acts of the assembly includes a judgment, and that general words will not be restrained to particular cases unless to avoid absurdity, contradiction or flagrant injustice. They then observe that neither will occur in their case. No inconvenience, "because the lands will sell better for being discharged from liens; and it makes no odds to the judgment creditors by whom they are sold, provided they are sold fairly, and the proceeds faithfully applied." The court then go on to declare that in the application of the proceeds the judgment creditors shall have their preference, and all the benefit of their lien; and that it would be monstrous injustice were it otherwise. This case gives no countenance to the suggestion that in Pennsylvania a judgment is considered as no more than a debt deprived of all attributes of lien, and merely such in the course of distribution. 4. In Pennsylvania it is the constant practice for the mortgagee to keep possession, not only of the land, but of all the deeds and instruments of title; that he sells and disposes of the property, and delivers possession to the purchaser, who holds it, subject, indeed, to the 423] mortgage as he would do *to a judgment; and in no respect differently; and that a judgment is specific enough in its force and operation to have preference of a subsequent mortgage; which a mere debt by simple contract, or by specialty, would not do. Why, then, shall it not have the same preference over a mere priority of payment arising after its date? 5. The equality to which a bankruptcy reduces a judgment creditor with the other creditors of the bankrupt is greatly relied upon by the defendant; but it is the effect of the positive provision of the statute meeting the case in terms, and founded on the peculiar policy of that system; neither of which is found in the act of Congress now under consideration. It is said there is no difference, in reason, between the effect of a bankruptcy and a legal insolvency; and as the former would destroy the right and lien of a judgment, so should the latter. The answer is obvious. The bankruptcy does it by virtue of the express terms and provisions of the statute; and if the same authority can be found in the case of insolvency, it will stand on the same reason, or rather, the same right. No case has been shown where a judgment creditor has been deprived of his right, his lien, his interest in the land, his preference, by construction; by the use of general terms; and in the case of Moliere's lessee v. Noe his right of priority of satisfaction out of the proceeds of the estate is expressly recognized, and the contrary doctrine held to be "monstrous injustice."

WASHINGTON, J., delivered the opinion of 424*] the court, and after stating the facts, proceeded as follows:

Two questions were made in the Circuit Court. 1st. At what time a judgment nisi on an award of arbitrators, made under an order of court, binds the real estate of the defendant against whom the award is made; whether on the day it is rendered, or on the quarto die post, if no exceptions be filed, or on the day when the exceptions, if any are filed, are overruled. 2d. If from the time when the judgment nisi is entered; then whether, in this case, the United States are entitled to be paid in preference to the judgment creditor.

The first question was not decided by the court below, and is not contested in this court.

In considering the second question, it will be assumed, for the sake of the argument, that the judgment nisi binds the real estate of the debtor from the time it is rendered.*

This question did not arise in the cases of The United States v. Fisher et al.,¹ or in that of *The United States v. Hooe et al.*² The point decided in those cases was, that a mere state of insolvency or inability in a debtor to the United States to pay all his debts, gives no right of preference to the United States unless it is accompanied by a voluntary assignment of all the property for the benefit of his creditors. There can be little doubt but that the word insolvency, mentioned in the act of 1790, ch. *35, sec. [*425 45, and repeated in the act of 1797, ch. 74, sec. 5, and of 1799, ch. 128, sec. 65, means a legal insolvency, which, whenever it occurs, the right of preference arises to the United States, as well as in the other specified cases to which the acts of 1797 and 1799 have extended the cases of insolvency.

In this case, the conveyance of Crammond, on the 22d of May, 1805, was of all his property; at which time he was unable to pay all his debts; it is, therefore, a case precisely within the law and within the principle decided by the above cases.

But the question still remains to be decided whether this right of preference which accrued on the 22d of May can cut out a prior judgment creditor. The law declares "that in all cases of insolvency, &c., the debts due to the United States shall be first satisfied, and if the assignees, &c., shall pay any debt due by the person or estate from whom or for which they are acting, previous to the debts due to the United States from such person or estate being first duly satisfied, they shall become answerable for the same in their own persons and estates." These expressions are as general as any which could have been used, and exclude all debts due to individuals, whatever may be their dignity. The assignees are made personally responsible to the United States if, in case of insolvency, they pay any debt previous to those due to the United States. The law makes no exception in favor of prior judgment creditors; and no reason has been, or we think can be shown to warrant this court in making one.

*Exceptions there must necessarily [*426 be as to the funds out of which the United States are to be satisfied, but there can be none in relation to the debts due from a debtor of the United States to individuals. The United States are to be first satisfied; but then it must be out of the debtor's estate. If, therefore, before the right of preference has accrued to the United States, the debtor has made a bona fide conveyance of his estate to a third person, or has mortgaged the same to secure a debt, or if his property has been seized under a fi. fa., the property is divested out of the debtor, and cannot be made liable to the United States. A judgment gives to the judgment creditor a lien on the debtor's lands, and a preference over all subsequent judgment creditors. But the act of Congress defeats this preference in favor of the United States, in the cases specified in the 65th section of the act of 1799.

The judgment of the Circuit Court, therefore, is to be affirmed with costs.

Wheat. 2.

APPENDIX.

Additional Note on the Principles and Practice in Prize Causes.

IN the Appendix to the first volume of these Reports (Note II.), a summary sketch was attempted of the practice in prize causes in some of its most important particulars. It has been suggested that a more enlarged view of the principles and practice of prize courts might be useful, and in case of a future war, save much embarrassment to captors and claimants. With this view the following additional sketch is submitted to the learned reader.

As preliminary to the subject it may be observed that the ordinary prize jurisdiction of the admiralty extends to all captures made on the sea, jure belli (The Two Friends, 1 Rob., 271, 284);¹ to captures in foreign ports and harbors (Lindo v. Rodney, Doug., 613, note); to captures made on land by naval forces and upon surrenders to naval forces either solely or by joint operations with land forces (Lindo v. Rodney, Doug., 613, note; Chinsurah, 1 Acton, 179); and this, whether the property so captured be goods, ships, or mere choses in action. (Ib.) To captures made in rivers, ports, and harbors of² the *captor's own country (W. B. v. Latimer, 4 Dall., Appendix I; Le Caux v. Eden, Doug., 606; Lindo v. Rodney, Doug., 613, note); to money received as a ransom or commutation on a capitulation to naval forces alone, or jointly with land forces (Ships taken at Genoa, 4 Rob., 388); and to ransoms upon captures at sea generally. (Anthon v. Fisher, Doug., 649, note I; Maisonnaire v. Keating, 2 Gallis.) But the admiralty, merely by its own inherent powers, never exercises jurisdiction as to captures or seizures as prize made on shore without the co-operation of naval forces, whether made in our own or in a foreign territory. (The Two Friends, 1 Rob., 271, 284; The Emulous, 1 Gallis., 563.) Wherever such a jurisdiction is exercised, it is by virtue of powers derived aliunde. And though when the jurisdiction has once attached it may be lost by a hostile recapture, escape, or voluntary discharge (Hudson v. Guestier, 4 Cranch, 293), yet it remains notwithstanding the goods are landed, for it does not depend on their local situation after capture; but the court will follow the goods or their proceeds with its process wherever they may be found, or under whatever title acquired. (Home v. Camden, 2 H. Bl., 533; 4 Term Rep., 388; Willis v. Commissioners of Prize, 5 East, 22; The Noysomhed, 7 Ves., 594; The Louis, 5 Rob., 146; The Two Friends, 1 Rob., 271; The Eliza, 1 Acton, 336; Smart v. Wolff, 3 Term Rep., 223; The Pomona, 1 Dodson, 25.) Therefore, where the property is carried into a foreign port, and there delivered upon bail by the captors, the prize court does not lose its jurisdiction, but may proceed to adjudication and enforce the stipulation. (The Peacock, 4 Rob., 185.) So, if a prize be lost at sea, the court may, nevertheless, proceed to adjudication, either at the instance of the captors or of the claimants. (The Susanna, 6 Rob., 48.) So, although the property may be actually lying within a foreign neutral territory, the court may proceed to adjudication. (Hudson v. Guestier, 4 Cranch, 293; The Christopher, 2 Rob., 209; The Henrick and Maria, 4 Rob., 43; The Comet, 5 Rob., 285; The Victoria, Edwards, 97.) So, although the property has been sold by the captors, or has passed into other hands. (The Falcon, 6 Rob., 194; The Pomona, 1 Dodson, 25.) But it rests in *the sound [³ discretion of the court whether, when property has been sold or converted by the captors, it will proceed to adjudication in their favor; for it is only in cases where the same has been justifiably or legally converted by the captors that they can claim its aid. The court will withhold that aid where there has been a conversion by the captors without necessity or reasonable cause. (L'Eole, 6 Rob., 220; La Dame Cecile, 6 Rob., 257; The Arabella and Madeira, 2 Gallis.)³

When once the Prize Court has acquired jurisdiction over the principal cause, it will exert its authority over all the incidents.⁴ It will

(Smart v. Wolff, 3 Term. Rep., 4*) 323; Home v. Camden, 2 H. *Bl., 533; 4 Term. Rep., 382; Jennings v. Carson, 4 Cranch, 1; The Two Friends, 1 Rob., 273; The Princessa, 2 Rob., 31; The Louis, 6 Rob., 146; Willis v. Commissioners of Prize, 5 East, 22; The Noysonhed, 7 Ves., 593.) It may also enforce its decrees against persons having the proceeds of prize in their hands, notwithstanding no stipulation, or an insufficient stipulation, has been taken on a delivery on bail; for it may always proceed in rem where the res can be found, and is not confined to the remedy on the stipulation. (Per Buller, J., in 3 Term Rep., 323; Per Grose, J., in 5 East, 22; The Pomona, 1 Dodson, 25; The Herkimer, Stewart, 128; S. C., 2 Hall's Am. Law Journ., 133.) And in these cases the court may proceed upon its own authority, ex officio, as well as upon the application of parties. (The Herkimer, Stewart, 128; S. C., 2 Hall's Am. Law Journ., 133.) Nor is the court functus officio after sentence pronounced; for it may proceed to enforce all rights, and issue process therefor, so long as anything remains to be done touching the subject-matter. (Home v. Camden, 2 H. Bl., 533, and cases ubi supra.)

The Prize Court has also exclusive jurisdiction as to the question who are the captors, and joint captors, entitled to share in the distribution, and its decree is conclusive upon all parties. (Home v. Camden, 2 H. Bl., 533; 4 Term. Rep., 382; The Herkimer, Stewart, 128; S. C., 2 Hall's Am. Law Journ., 133; Duckworth v. Tucker, 2 Taunton, 7.) It has the same exclusive authority as to the allowance of freight, damages, expenses, and costs, in all cases of captures. (Le Caux v. Eden, Doug., 594; Lindo v. Rodney, Doug., 613; Smart v. Wolff, 3 Term. Rep., 223; The Copenhagen, 1 Rob., 289; The St. Juan Baptista, 5 Rob., 83; The Die Frie Damer, 5 Rob., 357; The Betsey, 1 Rob., 98; Duckworth v. Tucker, 2 Taunt., 7; Jennings v. Curson, 4 Cranch, 2; Bingham v. Cabot, 3 Dall., 19; The United States v. Peters, 3 Dall., 121; Talbot v. Jansen, 3 Dall., 133; 2 Brown's Civ. and Adm. Law, 208.) And though a mere maritime tort unconnected with capture jure belli may be cognizable by a court of common law, yet it is clearly established that all captures, jure belli, and all torts *connected [*5 therewith, are exclusively cognizable in the Prize Court.

And the Prize Court will not only entertain suits for restitution and damages in cases of wrongful capture, and award damages therefor, but it will also allow damages for all personal torts, and that upon a proper case laid before the court as a mere incident to the possession of the principal cause. And in such a case it will not confine itself to the actual wrongdoer, but will apply the rule of respondere superior, and decree damages against the owners of the offending privateer. (Del Col v. Arnold, 3 Dall., 383; The Anna Maria, ante, 327; Bynk. Q. J. Pub. L. 1, ch. 19, Du Ponceau's translation, 147.) And where the captured crew have been grossly ill-treated, the court will award a liberal recompense. (The St. Juan Baptista, 5 Rob., 83; The Die Frie Damer, 5 Rob., 357; The Lively, 1 Gallis., 315.)

As the Prize Court has an unquestionable jurisdiction to apply confiscation by way of penalty for falsity, fraud, and misconduct of citizens as well as of neutrals (The Johanna Tholen, 6 Rob., 72; Oswell v. Vigne, 15 East., 70), so it may, in like manner, decree a forfeiture of the rights of prize against captors where they have been guilty of gross irregularity, or criminal neglect, or wanton impropriety and fraud. It is a part of the ancient law of the admiralty, independent of any statute, that captors may, by their misconduct, forfeit the rights of prize; and in such cases the property is condemned to the government generally. And this penalty has been frequently enforced, not only where the captors have been guilty of fraud (8 Cranch, 421; The George, ante, 278), but also where they have violated the instructions of government relative to bringing in the prize crew, and have proceeded without necessity to dispose of the property before condemnation. (La Reine des Anges, Stewart, 9.) So, where the captors have rescued a prize ship from the custody of the marshal after a monition duly served. (The Cossack, Stewart, 513.) In short, the court is the constitutional guardian of the public interests in relation to matters of prize; and wherever there is any deviation from the regular course of proceedings, it expects to have a sufficient reason *shown for that de- [*6 viation before it will give the captors any of the ordinary benefits of prizes captured by them.

The usual course of the court is by way of monition, and if that process be disobeyed, an 7*] attachment issues against the *parties in contempt. But the court may, in all cases, proceed in the first instance by warrant of arrest of the person or property to compel security to abide its decree.

Having said so much on the subject of prize jurisdiction as seemed necessary to explain the practice of the court, we may now pass to the consideration of the rights and duties of captors in relation to property captured in war.

To enable a vessel to make captures which shall enure to the benefit of the captors, it is necessary that she should have a commission of prize. But non-commissioned vessels of a belligerent nation may not only make captures in their own defense, but may, at all times, capture hostile ships and cargoes, without being deemed by the law of nations to be pirates; though they can have no interest in prizes so captured. (2 Brown's Civ. and Adm. Law, 524; Caseregis, Disc., 24, no. 24; 2 Woodes. Lect., 432; Consolato del Mare, ch. 287, 288; 3 Buls., 27; 4 Inst., 152, 154; Zouch. Adm. Jurisd., ch. 4, 101; Com. Dig. Admiralty, E. 3; The Georgiana, 1 Dodson, 397; The Diligentia, Id., 403; The Emulous, 8 Cranch, 181; The Nereide, 9 Cranch, 449; The Dos Hermanos, ante, 76.)¹ But every capture, whether made by commissioned or non-commissioned ships, is at the peril of the captors. If they capture property without reasonable or justifiable cause, they are liable to a suit for restitution, and may 8*] also be mulcted *in costs and damages.² If the vessel and cargo, or any part thereof, be good prize, they are completely justified. And although the whole property may, upon a hearing, be restored, yet, if there was probable cause of capture, they are not responsible in damages (opinion of M. Portalis, in the case of The Statira, 2 Cranch, 102, note a); but, on the other hand, they may, under circumstances according to the degree of doubt or suspicion thrown upon the case, either from the defects of the papers, the nature of the voyage, or the conduct of the captured crew, be entitled to receive their costs and expenses in bringing in the property for adjudication. It is not within the object of this note to enumerate all the various circumstances which have been adjudged to constitute probable cause for captures. But, in general, it may be observed, that if the ship pretend to be neutral, and has not the usual documents of such ship on board

(The Anna, 5 Rob., 332); if the cargo be without any clearance (Ib.); if the destination be untruly stated; if the papers respecting the ship or cargo be false or colorable, or be suppressed or spoliated; or if the neutrality of the cargo does not distinctly and fully appear (report of Dr. Lee, &c.; Chitty's Law of Nations, Appendix, 303; Wheat. on Capt., Appendix, 320); if the voyage be from or to a blockaded port (The Frederick Molke, 1 Rob., 86), or not legal to the parties engaged in the traffic (The Walsingham Packet, 2 Rob., 77; The Hoop, 1 Rob., 196; The St. Antonius, 1 Acton, 113); if the cargo be of an ambiguous character as to contraband (The Endraught, 1 Rob., 22; The Rindge Jacob, 1 Rob., 89; *The Jonge [*9 Margaretha, 1 Rob., 189; The Twende Broder, 4 Rob., 33; The Frau Margaretha, 6 Rob., 92; The Ranger, 6 Rob., 125); and generally if the case be a case of further proof, all or any of those circumstances furnish a probable cause for capture, and justify the captors in bringing in the ship and cargo for adjudication.

Whenever the captors are justified in the capture, they are considered as having a bona fide possession, and are not responsible for any subsequent losses or injuries arising to the property from mere accident or casualty, as from stress of weather, recapture by the enemy, shipwreck, &c. (The Betsey, 1 Rob., 98; The Catharine and Anna, 4 Rob., 89; The Carolina, 4 Rob., 256, Del Col v. Arnold, 3 Dall., 833.) They are, however, in all cases bound for fair and safe custody; and if the property be lost from want of proper care, they are responsible to the amount of the damage; for subsequent misconduct may forfeit the fair title of a bona fide possessor, and make him a trespasser from the beginning. (The Betsey, 1 Rob., 98; The Catharine and Anna, 4 Rob., 89.) Therefore, if the prize be lost by the misconduct of the prize-master, or from neglecting to take a pilot, or to put on board a proper prize crew, the court will decree restitution in value against the captors. (The Der Mohr, 3 Rob., 129; The Speculation, 2 Rob., 293; The William, 6 Rob., 316; Del Col v. Arnold, 3 Dall., 833; Wilcocks v. Union Ins. Co., 2 Binney, 574.) But although, in general, irregularity of conduct in captors makes them liable for damages, yet in case of a bona fide possession the irregularity to bind them must be such as produces irreparable loss, as, for instance, such as may prevent restitution from an enemy who recaptures the property. (The Betsey, 1 Rob., 98.) And in cases of gross misconduct the court will hold the commission of the captors forfeited. (The Marianne, 5 Rob., 9.) But if the injured parties lie by for a great length of time, the court will not issue a monition to the captors to proceed to adjudication, even when misconduct is laid as the ground of the application. (The Purissima Conception, 6 Rob., 45.)

When a ship is captured it is the duty of the captors to send her into some convenient port [10*] for adjudication. (The Huldah, *3 Rob., 235; The Madonna del Burso, 4 Rob., 169; The St. Juan Baptista, 5 Rob., 33; The Wilhelmsberg, 5 Rob., 143; The Elaebe, 5 Rob., 173; The Lively, 1 Gallis., 315.)¹ And a convenient port is such a port as the ship may ride in with safety without unloading her cargo. (The Washington, 6 Rob., 275; The Principe, Edwards, 70.) And the captors are bound to put on board the captured ship a sufficient prize crew to navigate the vessel into such a port, unless the captured crew consent to navigate her (which in general they are not bound to do); but if they consent they cannot afterwards impute any fault to the captors. (Wilcocks v. Union Ins. Co., 2 Binney, 574; The Resolution, 6 Rob., 13; The Pennsylvania, 1 Acton, 33; The Alexander, 1 Gallis., 582; S. C. 8 Cranch, 169.) And in case of the capture of a neutral ship the crew ought not to be handcuffed or put in irons, unless in extreme cases; for if unnecessarily done the prize court will decree damages to the injured parties. (The St. Juan Baptista, 5 Rob., 33; The Die Fire Damer, 5 Rob., 357.) Captors are not bound to explain the cause of capture, but it is highly proper so to do, as the master may explain it away. (The Juffrow Maria Schroeder, 3 Rob., 147.) They may chase under false colors, but the maritime law does not permit them to fire under false [11*] colors. (The Peacock, 4 Rob., 185.)² *They have no right to make any spoliation or damage to the captured ship, or to embezzle or convert the property, or to break bulk, or to remove any of the property from the ship, unless in cases of necessity, or where obvious reasons of policy, or the urgency of the occasion, justify them in so doing. (The Concordia, 2 Rob., 102; L'Eole, 6 Rob., 220; The Washington, 6 Rob., 275; Clerk's Praxis, 163; Del Col v. Arnold, 3 Dall., 333.) And in every case of a removal of property from a captured ship the court expects to be satisfied as to the propriety of the removal before it will proceed to adjudication. But if any of the captured property be shown to be missing, without any default on their part, as where it is lost by robbery or burglary after unlivery, they are not responsible for the loss. (The Maria, 4 Rob., 348; The Rendsberg, 6 Rob., 142.) And if captors, acting bona fide, and for the benefit of the parties, under peculiar circumstances, land or even sell the prize goods, this irregularity, if not injurious to the parties, will not be held to deprive them of the effects of a lawful possession. (The Princessa, 2 Rob., 31.)

If the capture is made without probable cause, the captors are liable for damages, costs, and expenses to the claimants. (Sir W. Scott and Sir J. Nichol's letter to Mr. Jay, Wheat. on Capt., Appendix, 312; opinion of M. Portalis, in the case of The Pigeon, 1 Cranch, 101, note a; Del Col v. Arnold, 3 Dall., 333; The Charming Betsey, 2 Cranch, 64; Maley v. Shattuck, 3 Cranch, 458; The Triton, 4 Rob., 78; Camden v. Hone, 4 Term Rep., 385; Fallijeff v. Elphinstone, 5 Brown's Parl. Cas., 343; Clerk's Praxis, 162; The Lively, 1 Gallis., 315.)² And if the captors unjustifiably neglect to proceed to adjudication, the court will, in case of restitution, decree demurrage against them. (The Corier Maritimo, 1 Rob., 287; The Madonna del Burso, 4 Rob., 169; The Peacock, 4 Rob., 185; The Anna Catherina*, 6 Rob., 10.) So, [*12 also, if the captors agree to restitution, but unreasonably delay it, demurrage will be allowed against them. (The Zee Star, 4 Rob., 71.) After an acquittal, a second seizure may be made by other captors, but it is at the peril of damages and costs, in case of failure. (The Mercurius, 1 Rob., 80.) And although a spoliation of papers be made, yet, if it be produced by the misconduct of captors, as by firing under false colors, it will not protect them from damages and costs. (The Peacock, 4 Rob., 135.) Nor is it an objection in the prize court against awarding damages and costs that the ship is not navigated by a proper proportion of seamen of her own country, according to its navigation laws; for that is an irregularity which must be referred to another branch of the admiralty jurisdiction. (The Nemesis, 1 Edw., 50.)

As to the time within which a suit may be brought in the admiralty, for damages for an illegal capture, it may be observed, that as the statute of limitations does not apply to prize causes, there is no time during the existence of the prize commission in which captors may not be legally called on to proceed to adjudication for the purpose of awarding damages against them. (The Mentor, 1 Rob., 179; The Huldah, 3 Rob., 235.) But the court will extend, by equity, the principles of the statute of limitations to prize causes; and, therefore, it will not, after a great lapse of time, compel the captors to proceed to adjudication, or entertain a suit for damages for a supposed illegal capture. (The Susanna, 6 Rob., 48.)

1.—Enjoignons aux capitaines qui auront fait quelque prise, de l'amener ou envoyer, avec les prisonniers, au port où ils auront armé à peine de perte de leur droits et d'amende contraire; si ce n'est qu'il fussent forcés par la tempête ou par les ennemis, de relâcher en quelque autre port, auquel cas ils seront tenus d'en donner incessamment. Avis aux intéressés à l'armement. L'Ordonnance de 1681, liv. 3, tit. 9; Des Prises, art. 7. See also the Ordinance of 1584, art. 43; Coll. Mar. 113.

3.—Si la prise étoit évidemment mauvaise, de manière, qu'il n'y eut rien qui fut capable d'excuser le corsaire; nul doute alors que la main-levée n'en fut ordonnée, non-seulement avec exemption de tous frais; mais encore avec tous dépens, dommages et intérêts contre l'armateur. 2 Valin, Sur l'Ordonnance, 336.

In respect to the measure of damages, where the vessel and cargo are actually lost, it is usual to allow the actual value of the property. (Del Col v. Arnold, 3 Dall., 333; Maley v. Shattuck, 3 Cranch, 458; The Anna Maria, ante, 327.) And where a prize had been illegally condemned by a vice-admiralty court, erected by the commanders in the West Indies, under a misapprehension that they possessed an authority to erect such courts, and afterwards restitution in value was decreed by the High Court of Admiralty in England, the court allowed the invoice value, 10 per cent. profit, and freight, as well where the ship and cargo belonged to the same persons as where they were separately owned. (The Lucy, 3 Rob., 208.) Indeed, what items may properly form [13*] a part of the damages, depends upon the nature and circumstances of the case; and for guides to direct his judgment, the learned reader is referred to the following cases: LeCaux v. Eden, Doug., 594, 596; Talbot v. Janson, 3 Dall., 133, 170; Cotton v. Wallace, 3 Dall., 302, 304; The Charming Betsey, 2 Cranch, 64; Maley v. Shattuck, 3 Cranch, 458; The Narcissus, 4 Rob., 20; The Zee Star, 4 Rob., 71; The Corier Maritimo, 1 Rob., 287; The St. Juan Baptista, 5 Rob., 33; The Die Fire Damer, 5 Rob., 357; The Anna Catharina, 6 Rob., 10; The Drirer, 5 Rob., 145; The Lively, 1 Gallis., 315; The Anna Maria, ante, 327. Where damages and costs are allowed, if, after they are assessed, payment is delayed, the court will allow interest upon the principal sum from the time of assessment, although it includes interest as well as principal. (The Drirer, 5 Rob., 145.)

As to the mode of assessing damages, it is usual for the court to refer the subject to commissioners, to make inquiry and return a regular report to the court of the several items and amount of damages. But in their report they should state the principles upon which they proceed in making allowances, where the items do not explain themselves, and not report a gross sum without specification or explanation. (The Charming Betsey, 2 Cranch, 64; The Lively, 1 Gallis., 315.)

In respect to the persons who are liable for costs and damages, it may be observed that the general rule, in respect to public ships, is, that the actual wrong-doer, and he alone, is responsible. (The Mentor, 1 Rob., 179.) It is not meant by this that the crew of the capturing ship are responsible for the seizure made in obedience to the commands of their superior; for by the prize law, the act of the commander is binding upon the interests of all under him, and he alone is responsible for damages and costs. (The Diligentia, 1 Dodson, 404.) The meaning of the rule is, that the person actually ordering the seizure is liable for the damages, and not his superior in command (who has not concurred in the particular act), simply from the fact that the seizor is acting within the scope of his general orders. (The Mentor, 1 Rob., 179.) Therefore, a suit cannot be maintained against an admiral upon a station, who is not privy to the act of seizure. (Ib. 179.) Nor a commodore, who commands the *squadron, but gives no orders for the [*14 capture. (The Eleanor, ante, 346.) In short, the actual wrong-doer is the person to answer in judgment, and to him responsibility is attached by the court. He may have other persons responsible over to him, and that responsibility may be enforced; as, for instance, if a captain make a wrongful seizure under the express orders of his admiral, that admiral may be made answerable in the damages occasioned to the captain by the improper act. But it is the constant and invariable practice of the prize court to have the actual wrong-doer the party before the court; and the propriety of the practice is manifest, because, if the court was once to open the door to complaints founded on remote and consequential responsibility, it would be difficult to say where it is to stop. (The Mentor, 1 Rob., 179.) The principles applicable to this class of cases are fully developed in the opinion in the case of The Eleanor (ante, 346), to which the reader is respectfully referred.

In case of private armed vessels, the owners, as well as the master, are responsible for the damages and costs occasioned by illegal captures, and this to the extent of the actual loss and injury, even if it exceeds the amount of the bond usually given, upon the taking out of commissions for privateers. (Bynk. Q. J. Pub., l. 1, ch. 19, Duponceau's ed., p. 147; Talbot v. Three Brigs, 1 Dall., 95; S. C. 1 Hall's Am. Law Journ., 140; The Die Fire Damer, 5 Rob., 357; The Der Mohr, 3 Rob., 129; 2 Brown's Civ. and Adm. Law, 140, Del Col v. Arnold, 3 Dall., 333; The Anna Maria, ante, p. 327.) But the sureties to the *bond are respon- [*15 sible only to the extent of the sum in which they

1.—Potbier holds, that the owner of the privateer may entirely discharge himself from the responsibility beyond the amount of the penalty in his bond, by abandoning the vessel to the injured party. De Propriete, No. 92. But Vallu decides, that the prize law controls, in this respect, the provision of the municipal law of France, by which the owners of merchant vessels are discharged from their responsibility, by abandoning the ship and freight, in like manner as they are by the British statute, 9 Geo. II., ch. 15. "En conformité des dits Réglemens de 1704 et 1744 (giving costs and damages to neutrals wrongfully seized), il faut donc tenir aujourd'hui sans égard à la disposition de l'art. 3 du titre des propriétaires, &c., et du présent article, en tant qu'il limite le cautionnement à la somme de 15,000 liv. que l'armateur répondra indéfiniment de tous les dommages et intérêts résultans des délits et déprédations des gens de son corsaire, et des prises irrégulières par eux faites; sans pouvoir même s'en défendre, en payant la somme de 15,000 liv. pour laquelle il aura donné caution, et en déclarant en même temps qu'il abandonne outre cela son navire avec tous ses agrès, apparaux et autres dépendan- Wheat. 2.

ces, relativement à l'art. 2 du même titre des propriétaires, &c., dont la disposition n'est plus applicable en matière d'armement en course, que celle de l'art. 3, attendu ces mêmes réglemens qui forme une décision particulière à cet égard." Sur l'Ordonnance, liv. 3, tit. 9, des Prises, art. 2. Such appears to have been the former law of France, but it was changed by the new commercial code. "Les propriétaires des navires équipés en guerre, ne seront toutefois responsables des délits et déprédations commis en mer, par les gens de guerre qui sont sur leur navires, ou par les équipages que jusqu'à concurrence de la somme pour laquelle ils auront donné caution, à moins qu'ils n'en soient participants ou complices." Code de Commerce, art. 217. But as our laws not only contain no such provision, but have not even adopted the British statute, by which the owners are discharged in ordinary cases by abandoning the vessel and freight to the injured party, there can be no doubt that the responsibility of the owners of privateers is not limited, either to the penalty of the bond or the value of the vessel.

are bound. (Du Ponceau's Bynk., p. 149; 2 Valin, Sur l'Ordonnance, 228.) And if a person appear in behalf of the captain of a private ship of war, and gives security in his own name, with sureties, instead of the captain, he is liable in the same manner as the captain, as a principal in the stipulation. (King v. Ferguson, 1 Ewd., 84.) And a part owner of a private armed ship is not exempted from being a party to a suit, on a monition to bring in the prize proceeds and proceed to adjudication, in consequence of having made compensation for his share to the claimant, and received a release from him; for the claimant has a right to the answer of all parties, even supposing that the decree ought not to be enforced against such part owner. (The Karasan, 5 Rob., 291.) And in a court of the law of nations a person may be held a part owner of a privateer, although 16*] his name has never been inserted in the bill of sale or the ship's register. (The Nostra Signora de los Dolores, 1 Dodson, 290.)

Where the captors, from any cause whatsoever, as from loss of the property, or from fraud or negligence, omit to bring the case before the court for adjudication, the claimant may apply to the court for a monition to the captors to proceed forthwith to adjudication (The William, 4 Rob., 214); and upon their neglect so to do after service and return of the monition, the court will, if a proper case is laid before it, proceed to award restitution with damages and costs. (The Huldah, 3 Rob., 235; The Susanna, 6 Rob., 48.) It is the usual practice for a party to give in his claim in the first instance, before calling upon the captors to proceed to adjudication; but it will not necessarily vitiate the process, if there has been no claim. If it should, in any manner, come to the knowledge of the court that a seizure had been made in the nature of prize, and that no proceedings had been instituted, it would be the duty of the court to direct proceedings to be commenced. (The William, 4 Rob., 214.) The same object is often effected by the claimants by an original suit for restitution, on a petition setting forth all the facts, and praying for a decree of restitution either in rem or in value with damages. (Del Col v. Arnold, 3 Dall., 333; Maley v. Shattuck, 3 Cranch, 458; Jennings v. Carson, 4 Cranch, 2; The Anna Maria, ante, p. 327; The Eleanor, ante, p. 347.) Whether the proceeding be in the one form or the other, the rights of all parties remain the same. The burthen of the neutrality of the property rests on the claimants, and when that is shown, the existence of probable cause of capture is to be established by the other side; and each party has a right to the answer of the other, upon all proper interrogatories supported by oath. (Maley v. Shattuck, 3 Cranch, 458.)

17*] *As soon as the captors have brought the property in for adjudication, and the preparatory examinations are taken, the captors, and if they neglect or refuse, the claimants, apply to the proper court for adjudication. In either case the property is immediately taken into the custody of the court; for in all proceedings in rem the court has a right to the custody of the thing in controversy; and as soon as libeled, it is always deemed in the custody of the law. (Jennings v. Carson, 4 Cranch, 2; Home v. Camden, 2 H. Bl., 583.) In the United States, a warrant immediately goes to the marshal to take possession of the property; and he is bound to keep it salvâ et arcta custodiâ; and if any loss happens by his negligence, he is responsible for it to the court. In England, though the property is now usually put into the hands of the captors, yet it still remains, in contemplation of law, in the custody of the public. Formerly it actually did remain in its custody, as is still the case in other foreign countries. It is merely for the convenience of the captors that the English admiralty permits them to take possession of the property. But it must be remembered that it is so held by them as agents of the court, and not in right of property; and therefore, their possession may be devested by the act of the court, either ex officio or on the application of the parties interested, showing good cause for taking it out of their hands. (Per Sir W. Scott, arguendo, in Smart v. Wolff, 3 Term Rep., 323, 329; The Herkimer, Stewart, 128, S. C., 2 Hall's Am. Law Journ., 138.) And the property still remains in the custody of the court, notwithstanding an unlivery and deposit in public warehouses. (The Maria, 4 Rob., 348.) In fact, in England, where the property is so unlivered, if it has been captured by a public or private commissioned vessel, it is, de facto, under the joint locks of the Government and the captors, although in the legal possession of the marshal under the tenor of his writ for unlivery; and if captured by a non-commissioned vessel, it is a droit, where the king, in his office of admiralty being the captor, it is under his locks alone. (The Rendberg, 6 Rob., 142, 174.) In the United States, the marshal holds the custody at all times for the court; and the latter is the guardian of the public rights and revenue, as well as of the rights of the captors *and claimants in all cases of prize. It [*18 is, indeed, usual and proper for the collector of the customs to keep an officer on board for the protection of the revenue, until the duties are duly secured, which the captors may secure, if they please; but since it cannot be ascertained until a decree of condemnation whether the property be good prize or not, many cases may occur in which it would be highly inconvenient for them to adopt this course. If the property be restored specifically, and exported from the country by the claimants, it is held not liable to duties; and if sold under an interlocutory order of sale, it is the duty of the court to reserve out of the proceeds the amount of duties which then attach upon it, and direct them to be paid over to the collector. (The Concord, 9 Cranch, 387; The Neriede, ante, vol. 1, p. 171.) It is true that the prize act of last war (act of the 26th June, 1812, ch. 107, sec. 14) seems to contemplate that the duties may be paid or secured in prize cases, in the same manner as goods ordinarily imported. But this clause is in terms applied only to goods of British growth, produce, or manufacture, or imported from British ports; and is, at all events, inapplicable to cases where it cannot be ascertained whether the goods are imported or not, until after a judicial decision. And the subsequent act of the 27th January, 1813, ch. 155, manifestly contemplates that the payment of the duties is, in cases of condemnation, to be made by the marshal, out of the proceeds of prize sales. And it has been repeatedly held in the Circuit Court for the first circuit, that no forfeiture accrued for not securing the duties upon prize goods before condemnation; and that the court might, at any time, direct an unlivery and sale; and upon such sale, would deduct the amount of duties, and direct them to be paid to the collector.

It has already been stated that when the marshal has possession of the property he is bound for safe and fair custody; and if any loss be sustained, it is at least his duty to be prepared to show that it was not lost by any default of his. (The Hoop, 4 Rob., 145.) If, therefore, property be pillaged while under his care, the court will hold him responsible for its value, if it arose from his negligence. If, indeed, upon an application to enforce their responsibility, he by his answer deny any negligence *and loose custody, the court may, perhaps, think it no more than a legal and proper confidence in its own officer to throw the burden of proof of culpable negligence or fraud on the other party. (The Rendsberg, 6 Rob., 142, 157.) And where the property is lost while actually under the locks of the government, the marshal will not be liable, although he may still be considered as constructively having the legal custody. (Ib.)

In prize causes it is not usual to file any special allegation of the particular circumstances on which the captors found their title to condemnation. The libel is, and always ought to be, the mere general allegation of prize, such as is used in undoubted cases of hostile property. The act of bringing the vessel in, and proceeding against her, allege her generally to be a subject of prize rights, and the captors are not called upon to state, at the commencement of the suit, the particular grounds on which they contend she is so. They have a right to institute the inquiry, and take the chance of the benefit of any fact that may be produced in the course of that inquiry. (The Adeline, 9 Cranch, 244; The Fortuna, 1 Dodson, 81.) This is a great advantage on the side of the captors, but is controlled by their liability to costs and damages, if the inquiry produce nothing; and is fully balanced by the advantage given to the claimant in this species of proceeding, that no evidence shall be admitted against him but such as proceeds from himself, from his own documents, and from his own witnesses, the captors not being permitted, except in cases marked by peculiar circumstances, to furnish any evidence whatever. (The Fortuna, 1 Dodson, 81.) Considerations of this nature render it very important for proctors to adhere, with the greatest care, to the established form; and it is a great irregularity, equally evincing want of skill and judgment, to deviate from it.

Upon filing the libel the usual practice is immediately to issue a monition citing all persons who are interested to appear at a given day, and show cause why the property should not be condemned as prize; and this process, in the 20*] United States, *usually includes a warrant to take possession of the property. But where the prize has been first seized in port, a monition issues, in the first instance, to bring in the papers if they are in the possession of a subject or citizen. (The Conquerer, 2 Rob., 303.) The usual monition is directed to the marshal, and in England is served by posting up a copy at the Royal Exchange, in the city of London. In former times fourteen days were allowed between the service of the monition and the day of hearing the cause; but in most of the later prize acts in England twenty days are allowed after the execution of the monition. (Robinson's Coll. Mar., 89, note; Mariott's Formulary, 187.) In the United States the return day of the monition depends upon the discretion of the district judge; but it is usually twenty days at least after the issuing of the process; and it is served usually by posting up a copy on the mast of the prize vessel, and at such other public places as the judge may direct; and also by publication in the newspapers printed in or near the principal place or port of the district into which the prize is brought. This proceeding by monition and service by public notice is borrowed from the Roman law, by which, when it became impracticable to serve the party with a personal citation, recourse was had to this method, which is called a citation per edictum. (Dig. Lib. 5, tit. 1, sec. 63; Robinson's Coll. Mar., 88, note.)

At the return day of the process, if no claim be at that time or previously interposed, and upon proclamation made no person appear to claim, the default is entered on the record; and the court will then proceed to examine the evidence, and if proof of enemy's property clearly appear, it will immediately decree condemnation; if the case appear doubtful it will postpone a decision. It is not now usual to condemn goods for want of a claim till a year and a day has elapsed after the service of the process, except in cases where there is a strong presumption and reasonable evidence to show that the property belongs to an enemy. (Rob. Coll. Mar., 89; The Harrison, *ante, vol. [*21 I, p. 298; The Staat Embden, 1 Rob., 26, 29.) And if no claim be interposed within that period, the property is condemned of course, and the question of former ownership is precluded forever, the owner being deemed in law to have abandoned it. (The Staat Embden, 1 Rob., 26, 29; The Henrick and Maria, 4 Rob., 48, 44; The Harrison, ante, vol. I, p. 298; Rob. Coll. Mar., 89, note; The Avery, 2 Gallis.)

If at or before the return day of the process a claim is interposed, the cause is then to be heard in its proper order upon the ship's papers and the preparatory examinations. Accompanying every claim must be an affidavit which is called the test affidavit, and which regularly should state that the property at the time of shipment, and also at the time of capture, did belong, and will, if restored, belong to the claimant; and if there be any special circumstances in the case these should be added. (The Adeline, 9 Cranch, 244; vide The Sally, 3 Rob., 300, note.) In respect to the manner of interposing claims, and the rules by which their admission or rejection are governed, it does not

are bound. (Du Ponceau's Bynk., p. 149; 2 Valin, Sur l'Ordonnance, 223.) And if a person appear in behalf of the captain of a private ship of war, and gives security in his own name, with sureties, instead of the captain, he is liable in the same manner as the captain, as a principal in the stipulation. (King v. Ferguson, 1 Ewd., 84.) And a part owner of a private armed ship is not exempted from being a party to a suit, on a monition to bring in the prize proceeds and proceed to adjudication, in consequence of having made compensation for his share to the claimant, and received a release from him; for the claimant has a right to the answer of all parties, even supposing that the decree ought not to be enforced against such part owner. (The Karasan, 5 Rob., 291.) And in a court of the law of nations a person may be held a part owner of a privateer, although 16*] *his name has never been inserted in the bill of sale or the ship's register. (The Nostra Signora de los Dolores, 1 Dodson, 290.)

Where the captors, from any cause whatsoever, as from loss of the property, or from fraud or negligence, omit to bring the case before the court for adjudication, the claimant may apply to the court for a monition to the captors to proceed forthwith to adjudication (The William, 4 Rob., 214); and upon their neglect so to do after service and return of the monition, the court will, if a proper case is laid before it, proceed to award restitution with damages and costs. (The Huldah, 3 Rob., 235; The Susanna, 6 Rob., 48.) It is the usual practice for a party to give in his claim in the first instance, before calling upon the captors to proceed to adjudication; but it will not necessarily vitiate the process, if there has been no claim. If it should, in any manner, come to the knowledge of the court that a seizure had been made in the nature of prize, and that no proceedings had been instituted, it would be the duty of the court to direct proceedings to be commenced. (The William, 4 Rob., 214.) The same object is often effected by the claimants by an original suit for restitution, on a petition setting forth all the facts, and praying for a decree of restitution either in rem or in value with damages. (Del Col v. Arnold, 3 Dall., 333; Maley v. Shattuck, 3 Cranch, 458; Jennings v. Carson, 4 Cranch, 2; The Anna Maria, ante, p. 327; The Eleanor, ante, p. 347.) Whether the proceeding be in the one form or the other, the rights of all parties remain the same. The burthen of the neutrality of the property rests on the claimants, and when that is shown, the existence of probable cause of capture is to be established by the other side; and each party has a right to the answer of the other, upon all proper interrogatories supported by oath. (Maley v. Shattuck, 3 Cranch, 458.)

17*] *As soon as the captors have brought the property in for adjudication, and the preparatory examinations are taken, the captors, and if they neglect or refuse, the claimants, apply to the proper court for adjudication. In either case the property is immediately taken into the custody of the court; for in all proceedings in rem the court has a right to the custody of the thing in controversy; and as soon as libeled, it is always deemed in the custody of the law. (Jennings v. Carson, 4 Cranch, 2; Home v. Camden, 2 H. Bl., 533.) In the United States, a warrant immediately goes to the marshal to take possession of the property; and he is bound to keep it salva et arcta custodia; and if any loss happens by his negligence, he is responsible for it to the court. In England, though the property is now usually put into the hands of the captors, yet it still remains, in contemplation of law, in the custody of the public. Formerly it actually did remain in its custody, as is still the case in other foreign countries, is merely for the convenience of the captors, that the English admiralty permits them to have possession of the property. But it must be remembered that it is so held by them as agents of the court, and not in right of property; therefore, their possession may be devested by the act of the court, either ex officio or on application of the parties interested, showing good cause for taking it out of their hands. (Per Sir W. Scott, arguendo, in Sm. Wolff, 3 Term Rep., 323, 329; The Helms, Stewart, 128, S. C., 2 Hall's Am. Law, 133.) And the property still remains in the custody of the court, notwithstanding delivery and deposit in public warehouses. (Maria, 4 Rob., 348.) In fact, in England, where the property is so unlivered, if it has been captured by a public or private armed vessel, it is, de facto, under the custody of the Government and the court, though in the legal possession of the captors, under the tenor of his writ for unlicensed capture. If captured by a non-commissioned vessel, a droit, where the king, in his official capacity being the captor, it is under the custody of the court alone. (The Rendsberg, 6 Rob., 142.) In the United States, the marshal holds the property in custody at all times for the court; and he is the guardian of the public rights as well as of the rights of the captors and claimants in all cases of prize. It is, indeed, usual and proper for the court to keep an officer on board the vessel, for the protection of the revenue, until the property is duly secured, which the captors may do if they please; but since it cannot be known until a decree of condemnation is made, whether the property be good prize or not, it is the duty of the court to keep it in custody, and to direct the marshal to attach upon it, and direct the proceeds to be paid over to the collector. (The Co. v. The Neriede, ante, vol. 1, p. 387; The Neriede, ante, vol. 1, p. 387.) It is true that the prize act of last session, 26th June, 1812, ch. 107, does not contemplate that the duties incurred in prize cases, in the case of goods ordinarily imported, are to be applied only to goods of British produce, or manufacture, or British ports; and is, at all events, not applicable to cases where it cannot be ascertained whether the goods are imported or not, until a judicial decision. And the statute of the 27th January, 1813, ch. 15, seem necessary to do much more than refer the reader to what is said on that subject in the appendix to the preceding volume (ante, p. 500), and the case of The Adeline (9 Cranch, 244, 286). It may, however, be added, that a party to be entitled to assert a claim in the prize court must be the general owner of the property; for a person who has a mere lien on the property for a debt due, whether liquidated or unliquidated, is not so entitled. (The Eenroom, 2 Rob., 1, 5; The Tobago, 5 Rob., 218; The Frances, Thompson's claim, 8 Cranch, 335, Id.; Irwin's claim, 8 Cranch, 418; The Marianna, 6 Rob., 24.) And the same rule has been applied to a mortgage where the mortgagee is left in possession. (Bolch v. Darrel, Bee., 74.) The rule that a claimant is not admitted to claim, who is engaged in a traffic prohibited by the municipal laws of the country, is applied only to citizens or subjects, and not to foreign neutral proprietors. (The Recovery, 6 Rob., 341.) But to citizens or subjects the rule equally applies, whether the transaction is between original contractors or under a sub-contract. (The Cornelius and Maria, 5 Rob., 28.) And an inactive or sleeping partner cannot receive restitution in a transaction in which he *could not be lawfully engaged as a sole trader. (The Franklin, 6 Rob., 127, 131.) If enemy's property be fraudulently blended in the same claim with neutral property, the latter is liable to share the fate of the former. (The St. Nicholas, ante, Vol. I, p. 481.)

An appearance by a proctor for the claimants, duly entered, cures all defects of process, such as the want of a monition or of due notice. (Penhallow v. Doane, 3 Dall., 54.) And even assuming that one partner has no authority to appoint a proctor for all the partners, yet a general appearance for all by a proctor is good and legally binding. (Hills v. Rom, 3 Dall., 231.) In cases of captures by government ships the proceedings in England are exclusively carried on by the officers of the government, and no other persons can interfere to support or pursue a suit, where they do not consent. (The Elsebe, 5 Rob., 173.) Whether the same exclusive authority exists in the United States has never been made the subject of question in the Supreme Court.¹

23*] *It has been already stated in the former note, that the cause is to be heard at the first hearing upon the ship's papers and the preparatory examinations, and that the onus probandi rests on the claimant. (And see The Rosalie, 2 Rob., 343; The Countess of Lauderdale, 4 Rob., 288.) If upon such hearing the cause appear doubtful, and the parties have not forfeited their title to farther proof, it is then in the discretion of the court to allow farther proof, either to the claimants alone or to the captors as well as the claimants. The manner in which the preparatory examinations are taken, and the cases in which farther proof is allowed or denied, have been briefly stated in the former note, and the standing interrogatories on which these examinations are taken will be found in a subsequent note to this volume. (Infra, note 3.) It may not, however, be useless to glance at a few particulars which are either omitted or not distinctly stated in the former note. Although the ship's papers found on board are proper evidence, yet they are so only when properly verified; for papers by themselves prove nothing, and are a mere dead letter if they are not supported by the oaths of persons in a situation to give them validity. (The Juno, 2 Rob., 120, 122.)² And even upon the original hearing, papers found on board another captured ship may be invoked into the cause, and used by the captors. But if the papers are taken from a vessel not so captured and carried in, they can only be used upon an order for farther proof. (The Romeo, 6 Rob., 351; The Maria, 1 Rob., 340.) But the authenticity of papers thus invoked must be verified by affidavit, and otherwise, to the satisfaction of the court. (The Romeo, Ib.) So, also, the depositions of the claimant in a former case, in which he was *owner and master, were permitted [*24 to be invoked by the captors to prove his domicile. (The Vriendchap, 4 Rob., 166.) But where nothing appears in the original evidence, which lays a foundation for prosecuting the inquiry farther, it must be under very particular circumstances indeed that the court will be induced to admit extraneous evidence. (The Sarah, 3 Rob., 330.) If the instructions found on board of a prize are transmitted from the department of state for foreign affairs to the prize court, they are considered as sufficiently authenticated as having been found on board, without further proof to that effect. (The Maria, 1 Rob., 340.) A person skilled in nautical affairs may be called to examine the log-book of the captured ship, and to give his opinion as to the verity of the statement in respect to destination, &c., from the courses, winds, &c. (The Edward, 4 Rob., 68.)

The examinations of the prize crew are to be taken in the manner which has been already alluded to; but if the prize be carried into a foreign port where there is no commission, their affidavits taken in such port will be ad-

1.—In England it is also held that the power of the crown to direct the release of property seized as prize, before adjudication, and against the will of the captors, is not taken away by any grant of the prize conferred in the order of council, the proclamation, or the prize act. The Elsebe, 5 Rob. 155. And in France the captors cannot, after the prize is brought in for adjudication, terminate the proceedings by a private arrangement with the claimants. Such an arrangement, to be valid, must be communicated to the procureur general, and approved by the court; because the rights and interests of the state, of the officers and crew of the capturing vessel, and of the subjects of neutral powers, might be compromised by such an arrangement. See the opinion of M. Portalis on this question, (Code des Prises, Par Guichard, tom. 2, p. 533.) He distinguishes this case from that of ransoms, which are regulated by peculiar laws, but never favored; and he cites, in support of his opinion, several ancient arrêts of council and rescripts of the admiral.

mitted in evidence. (The Peacock, 4 Rob., 185; The Arabella and Madeira, 2 Gallis.)

In the prize court, as in every other judicial tribunal, there are certain presumptions which legally affect the parties, and are considered as of general application. Possession is presumptive evidence of property. (Miller v. The Resolution, 2 Dall., 19.) If there be a total defect of evidence to establish the proprietary interest, it is presumed to belong to an enemy. (Sir W. Scott and Sir J. Nicholl's letter to Mr. Jay; Ubi supra; The Magnus, 1 Rob., 81.) So, goods found in an enemy's ship are presumed to belong to the enemy, unless a distinct neutral character and documentary proof accompany them. Res in hostium navibus presumuntur esse hostium donec contrarium probetur. (Locutus, lib. 2, ch. 4, n. 11; Grotius de Jur. Bel. et Pac. lib. 3, ch. 6, sec. 6; Bynk. Q. J. Pub. lib. 1, ch. 13.) And in cases where the property falls within the general character of contraband, if the claimant would avail himself of the favorable distinction that it is the produce of his own country, the onus of establishing [23*] that fact is on him. (The Twee Juffrouwen, *4 Rob., 242.) Prima facie a merchant is taken to be acting for himself, and upon his own account; but if a person is not a merchant, that may give a qualified character to his acts. (The Jonge Pieter, 4 Rob., 79.) If in the ship's papers property in a voyage from an enemy's port be described "for neutral account," this is such a general mode as points to no designation whatever; and under such a description no person can say that the cargo belongs to him, or can entitle himself to the possession of it as his property. In such a case farther proof is indispensable. (The Jonge Pieter, 4 Rob., 79.) Where a ship has been captured and carried into an enemy's port, and is afterwards found in possession of a neutral, the presumption is, that there has been a regular condemnation, and the proof of the contrary rests on the party claiming the property against the neutral possessor. (The Countess of Lauderdale, 4 Rob., 283.) Where a treaty expressly provides for the removal of persons who happen to be settled in a ceded port, the burthen of proof rests on the other party to show that they did not intend to remove, for the presumption is already to be taken in their favor. (The Diana, 5 Rob., 60.) Where the master of a captured ship is not fairly discredited, his testimony as to destination is generally conclusive on that point. (The Carolina, 3 Rob., 75; The Convenientia, 4 Rob., 200.) So his testimony of the ill-treatment of his crew, if uncontradicted. (The Die Fire Damer, 5 Rob., 357.) Where the voyage is from the port of one enemy to the port of another enemy, and farther proof is required, the double correspondence of the shipper and consignee should be produced; for there is a double interest to be rebutted; but if the voyage be to a neutral port, the correspondence with the shipper is all that is usually required. (The Freede, 5 Rob., 231.)

In respect to the persons who may be witnesses in prize causes, it is very clear that an alien enemy, as such, is not in general disabled to be a witness (The Fulcon, 6 Rob., 194); and, indeed, in ordinary cases the prize crew, whether national, neutral or hostile, are the necessary witnesses in the cause. *(The Henrick [*26 and Maria, 4 Rob., 43.) And upon farther proof ordered, the attestations of the claimant and his clerks, and the correspondence between him and his agents are admissible evidence, and proper proofs of property. (The Adelaide, 3 Rob., 281.) And upon farther proof, the affidavits of the captors, even without a release, are good evidence of facts within their own knowledge. (The Maria, 1 Rob., 340; The Resolution, 6 Rob., 13; The Sally, 1 Gallis., 401.) But except under peculiar circumstances, the affidavits of captors are not received in our prize courts. (The Henrick and Maria, 4 Rob., 57, note a; The Grotius, 9 Cranch, 368; The Sally, 1 Gallis., 401; The Haabet, 6 Rob., 54. The Glierktigheit, 6 Rob., 58, note a; The Charlotte Caroline, 1 Dodson, 192, 199.) Upon allegations of joint capture, the affidavits of any of the joint captors are not received, unless they are discharged of all interest by a release, for in such questions the general rules of law as to competency prevail. And where a witness declares that he expects to share from the bounty of the joint captors, he is competent; but it is otherwise if he says that he thinks himself entitled in law. (The Dree Gebroeders, 5 Rob., 339, 343, note a; The Anna Catharina, 6 Rob., 269.) And the log-book of asserted joint captors is inadmissible evidence, since it goes to establish their interest. (Le Niemen, 1 Dodson, 9.) Where farther proof is ordered, affidavits taken in foreign countries, before notaries public, whose attestations are properly verified, are in general proper evidence. But in the Supreme Court of the United States it is by a rule of the court required that all such evidence should be taken under a commission from the court. (The London Packet. ante, p. 371.) And this practice is certainly more conformable to the general purposes of justice, and less liable to abuse than any other. It seems, however, to be a general rule of the prize court not to issue any commission to be executed in the enemy's country. (The Magnus, 1 Rob., 81; The Diana, 2 Gallis.)

The questions which are most ordinarily discussed in prize *courts at the hearing of [*27 the cause, respect the national character of the property; and this depends sometimes upon the habits and trade of the ship, upon the nature of the voyage or of the cargo, or upon the legal or illegal conduct of the parties themselves; but ordinarily it depends upon the national domicile of the asserted proprietor, or upon the nature of the title which he asserts over the property. In all these cases where the property is condemned, it is by fiction, or rather by intendment of law, deemed the property of enemies; that is, of persons who are so to be considered in the particular transaction, and is condemned eo nomine. (The Elsebe, 5 Rob., 178; The Nelly, 1 Rob., 219; note to The Hoop; The Alexander, 8 Cranch, 169; The Julia, 8 Cranch, 181; The Thomas Gibbons, 8 Cranch, 421; The St. Lawrence, 1 Gallis., 532; The Joseph, 1 Gallis., 545.) It is, besides, the purpose of this note to discuss these topics at large with all the distinctions which belong to them. Indeed, such a discussion would of itself require a very considerable treatise. It may, however, be of some use to give a rapid sketch of the leading principles which regulate the decisions of prize courts on some of these subjects.

In respect to the question who are to be considered enemies or not, the general principle is, that every person is to be considered as belonging to that country where he has his domicile, whatever may be his native or adopted country. (The Vigilantia, 1 Rob., 1; The Endraught, 1 Rob., 19; The Sarah Christina, 1 Rob., 237; The Indian Chief, 3 Rob., 23; The President, 5 Rob., 277; The Neptunus, 6 Rob., 403; The Venus, 9 Cranch, 253; The Frances, Gillespie's claim, 1 Gallis., 614; The Mary and Susan, Richardson's claim, ante, vol. I, p. 46, S. C. p. 55; note f; M'Connel v. Hector, 3 Bos. & Pull., 113; Bynk. Q. J. Pub., ch. 3; Duponceau's edit., p. 19, 25.)¹ And the masters and crews of ships are deemed to possess 28 the national character of the ships to which they belong during the time of their employment. (The Endraught, 1 Rob., 21; The Bernon, 1 Rob., 101; vide The Embden, 1 Rob., 17; The Frederick, 5 Rob., 8; The Ann, 1 Dodson, 221.) And even if a person goes into a belligerent country originally for temporary purposes, he will not preserve his neutral character, if he remain there several years, paying taxes, &c. (The Harmony, 2 Rob., 322; The Embden, 1 Rob., 17.) And a neutral consul, resident and trading in a belligerent country, is, as to his mercantile character, deemed a belligerent of that country. (The Indian Chief, 3 Rob., 22; The Josephine, 4 Rob., 25.) And the same rule applies to the subject of one belligerent country, resident in the country of its enemy, and carrying on trade there. (The Citto, 3 Rob., 38; M'Connel v. Hector, 3 Bos. & Pull., 113.) But a character acquired by mere domicile ceases upon removal from the country. (The Indian Chief, 3 Rob., 12.) The native character easily reverts, and it requires fewer circumstances to constitute domicile in the case of a native than to impress the national character on one who is originally of another country. (La Virginie, 5 Rob., 98.) And in his favor, a party is deemed to have changed his domicile and his native character reverts as soon as he puts himself in intinere to return to his native country animo revertendi. (The Indian Chief, 3 Rob., 12; The St. Lawrence, 1 Gallis., 467.)

In general, a neutral merchant trading in the ordinary manner with a belligerent country, does not, by the mere accident of his having a stationed agent there, contract the character of the enemy. (The Anna Catharina, 4 Rob., 107, 121.) But it is otherwise if he be not engaged in trade upon the ordinary footing of a neutral merchant, but as a privileged trader of the enemy; for then it is in effect a hostile trade. (The Anna Catharina, 4 Rob., 107, 121.) So if the agent carry on a trade from the hostile country, which is not clearly neutral. (Ib.) And if a person be a partner in a house of trade in the enemy's country, *he is, as to the [*29] concerns and trade of that house, deemed an enemy, and his share is liable to confiscation, as such, notwithstanding his own residence is in a neutral country; for the domicile of the house is considered in this respect as the domicile of the partners. (The Vigilantia, 1 Rob., 1, 14, 19; The Susa, 2 Rob., 255; The Indiana, 3 Rob., 44; The Portland, 3 Rob., 41; The Vriendschap, 4 Rob., 166; The Jonge Klassina, 5 Rob., 297; The Antonia Johanna, ante, Vol. I. p. 159; The St. Jozé Indiano, 2 Gallis.) But if he has a house of trade in a neutral country, he has not the benefit of the same principle; for if his own personal residence be in the hostile country, his share in the property of the neutral house is liable to condemnation. (Ib. and The Frances, 1 Gallis, 618; S. C., 8 Cranch, 348.) However, where a neutral is engaged, in peace, in a house of trade in the enemy's country, his property so engaged in the house is not, at the commencement of war, confiscated; but if he continues in the house after knowledge of the war, it is liable, as above stated, to confiscation. (The Vigilantia, 1 Rob., 1, 14, 15; The Susa, 2 Rob., 251, 255.) It is a settled principle that traffic alone, independent of residence, will, in some cases, confer a hostile character on the individual. (Ib. The Susa, 2 Rob., 251, 255, The Vriendschap, 4 Rob., 166.) And if a neutral be engaged in the enemy's navigation, it not only affects the particular vessel in which he is employed, but all other vessels belonging to him, that have no distinct national character impressed upon them. (The Vriendschap, 4 Rob., 166.)

Ships are deemed to belong to the country under whose flag and pass they navigate, and this circumstance is conclusive upon their character. (The Vigilantia, 1 Rob., 1, 19, 26; The Vrouw Anna Catharina, 5 Rob., 161; The Success, 1 Dodson, 181.) So, even if purchased by a neutral, if they are habitually engaged in the trade of the enemy's country (The Vigilantia, 1 Rob., 1, 19, 26; The Planter's Wench, 5 Rob., 22); even though there be no sea-port in the territory of the neutral. (Ib. But in general, and unless under special circumstances, the national character of ships depends on the residence of the owner. (Ib. The Magnus, 1 Rob., 31.) When, however, it is said that the flag and pass is conclusive on the character of the ship, the *meaning is this, that the party [*30] who takes the benefit of them is himself bound by them; he is not at liberty, when they happen to turn to his disadvantage, to turn round and deny the character which he has worn for his own benefit, and upon the credit of his own oath or solemn declarations. But they do not bind other parties as against him; other parties are at liberty to show that these are spurious credentials, assumed for the purpose of disguising the real character of the vessel; and it is no inconsiderable part of the ordinary occupation of a prize court to pull off this mask and exhibit the vessel so disguised in her true character of an enemy's vessel. (The Fortuna, 1 Dodson, 87; The Success, Id., 181.) Ships and cargoes engaged in the privileged and peculiar trade of a nation, under a special contract, and the sanction of the government, are considered as affected by the character of the nation, and if it be hostile, the trade is stamped with the same character. (The Princessa, 2 Rob., 49; The Anna Catharina, 4 Rob., 197; The Rendsborg, 4 Rob., 121; The Vrouw Anna Catharina, 5 Rob., 161; The Commercen, ante, Vol. I, p. 382; Vide 5 Rob., 5, note a.) And the produce of an estate situated in a hostile colony is so impressed with the character of the soil that although the owner of the estate be resident in a neutral country, his interest in the produce is deemed enemy's property. (The Phoenix, 5 Rob., 20; The Vrouw Anna Catharina, 5 Rob., 161; The Dree Gebroeders, 4 Rob., 282; Bentzon's claim, 9 Cranch, 191.)

In respect to the transfers of enemies' ships during war, it is certain that purchases of them by neutrals is not, in general, illegal; but such purchases are liable to great suspicion, and if good proof be not given of their validity, by a bill of sale and payment of a reasonable consideration, it will materially impair the validity of the neutral claim (The Bernon, 1 Rob., 102; The Sechs Gedschwistern, 4 Rob., 100); and if the purchase be made by an agent, his letters of procuration must be produced and proved. (The Argo, 1 Rob., 158.)¹ And if, after such [31*] transfer, the ship *be employed habitually in the enemy's trade or under the management of a hostile proprietor, the sale will be deemed merely colorable and collusive. (The Jemmy, 4 Rob., 31; The Omnibus, 6 Rob., 71.) But the right of purchase, by neutrals, extends only to merchant ships of enemies (The Minerva, 6 Rob., 396, 399); for the purchase of ships of war belonging to enemies, is held to be invalid. (The Minerva, 6 Rob., 396.) And a sale of a merchant ship, made by an enemy to a neutral, during war, must be an absolute, unconditional sale. (The Packet de Bilbao, 1 Rob., 133; The Noydt Gedeckt, 1 Rob., 137, note a.) Anything tending to continue the interest of the enemy in the ship vitiates a contract of this description altogether. (The Sechs Gedschwistern, 4 Rob., 100.)

In respect to proprietary interests in cargoes, though, in general, the rules of the common law apply, yet there are many peculiar principles of prize law to be considered. It is a general rule that during hostilities, or imminent and impending danger of hostilities, the property of parties belligerent cannot change its national character during the voyage, or, as it is commonly expressed, in transitu. (The Dankbaar African, 1 Rob., 107; The Herstelder, 1 Rob., 114.) This rule equally applies to ships and cargoes; and it is so inflexible that it is not relaxed even in favor of owners who become subjects by capitulation after the shipment and before the capture. (Ib.) But if the ship sails before hostilities, when there is a decided state of amity between the two countries, and before the capture, the owner again becomes a friend, and at the time of the capture, and also at the time of adjudication, he is in a capacity to claim; the prize courts will then give him the benefit of the principle, that the national character cannot be altered in transitu, and will restore to him. (Ib.) The same distinction is applied to purchases made by neutrals, of property in transitu; if purchased during a state of war existing, or imminent and impending danger of war, the con- [32] tract is held invalid, and the property is deemed to continue as it was at the time of shipment, until the actual delivery. It is otherwise, however, if the contract be made during a state of peace, and without contemplation of war; for, under such circumstances the prize courts will recognize the contract, and enforce the title acquired under it. (The Vrouw Margaretha, 1 Rob., 336; The Jan Frederick, 5 Rob., 128.) And property is still considered in transitu if it be ultimately destined to the hostile country, notwithstanding it has arrived at a neutral port, and the ship is there changed. (The Carl Walter, 4 Rob., 207.) The reason why courts of admiralty have established this rule as to transfers in transitu during a state of war, or expected war, is asserted to be, that if such a rule did not exist, all goods shipped in the enemy's country would be protected by transfers, which it would be impossible to detect. (The Vrouw Margaretha, 1 Rob., 336.)

The same public policy has established the rule of the prize courts, that property going, during war, to be delivered in the enemy's country, and under a contract to become the property of the enemy immediately on arrival, if taken in transitu, is to be considered as enemy's property. (The Sally, 3 Rob., 800, note a.) And all contracts of purchase effected on the part of the belligerent, where the payment is executory and contingent on delivery at an ulterior port, at the risk of the neutral vendor or shipper, are considered as contracts in fraud of the prize law, and the goods, if captured in transitu, are condemned as the absolute property of the enemy. (The Atlas, 3 Rob., 299; The Anna Catharina, 4 Rob., 107, 113, note.) But when the contract is made in time of peace, and without any contemplation of war, no such rule exists. (Ib.) But the rule is applied where such a contract is originally made between allies in the war, if a party to it becomes neutral after the contract, and before the execution of it, and the shipment is made afterwards. (The Anna Catharina, 4 Rob., 107, 112.) A contract by a neutral with a privileged company of the enemy, with a view to the transportation of the whole produce of a colony, or of the company itself, if made during war, or in contemplation of war, is pronounced illegal, and the property is liable to *condemnation as hostile property. (The [33*] Rendsborg, 4 Rob., 121; The Jan Frederick, 5 Rob., 128.) But if a neutral, during peace, and without contemplation of war, purchase goods in a colony from a regular privileged company there, and it is agreed that they shall be transported and sold in the mother country by the company's agents for the benefit of the

In ordinary shipments of goods, unaffected by the foregoing principles, the question of proprietary interest often turns on minute circumstances and distinctions, the general principle being that if they are going for account of the shipper, or subject to his order or control, the property is not divested in transitu. If there be any condition annexed to the delivery of the goods to the consignee, the proprietary interest remains in the shipper, notwithstanding the goods are sent in pursuance of the orders of the consignee. Thus, if a merchant in H send goods to A in another country, by order of B and on account of B, but with directions not to deliver them unless satisfaction could be given for the payment, the property is not divested from the shipper, but remains his in transitu. (Cited in The Aurora, 4 Rob., 319.) The same principle applies where goods are shipped to the orders of the shippers, but to be delivered by their agents to the consignee upon the agents being satisfied for the payment. (The Aurora, 4 Rob., 218; The Merrimack, Kimmel & Albert's claim, 8 Cranch, 317; see The Marianna, 6 Rob., 24.) So even if the goods are stated in the invoice to belong to the claimants; yet if these papers are inclosed to the consignee as agents to the shippers, and are to be delivered to the claimants only upon conditions in the discretion of the agent, the property remains in the shippers. (The Merrimack, 8 Cranch, 317.) But if the goods are consigned to an agent of the shippers, but the invoice, &c., show them to be for the account of the claimants, and the invoice, &c., are, by the shippers, sent directly to the claimants, the possession of these documents gives them a title, and establishes the intention of the shipper to vest the property in the claimants at the time of the shipment. (The Merrimack, 34*] Messrs. *Wilkins' claim, 8 Cranch, 317.) So if the goods are shipped to the consignee unconditionally for the use of the claimants. (Id. Messrs. M'Kean & Woodland's claim, 8 Cranch, 317.) But if the goods are consigned to the agent of the shippers, and there are discretionary orders given, but no direction for an absolute delivery to the claimants, the property remains in the shippers. (The St. Jozé Indiano, Lizaur's claim, 2 Gallis., S. C. ante, Vol. I., p. 208.) In all these cases the goods are supposed to have been purchased in pursuance of the orders of the claimants; for if they are sent by the shippers without orders, or contrary to, or different from orders, either in quantity or kind, the proprietary interest remains in the shipper during the transit, notwithstanding they are sent by direct consignment to the consignee. (The Venus, 8 Cranch, 253; The Frances, Dunham & Randolph's claim, 1 Gallis., 445; S. C., 8 Cranch, 354, 9 Cranch, 183; The Frances, French's claim, 8 Cranch, 359.)

It is certainly competent for an agent abroad, who purchases goods in pursuance of orders, to vest the proprietary interest in his principal, immediately on the purchase. This is the case when he purchases exclusively on the credit of the principal, or makes an absolute appropriation and designation of the property for his principal. But where he sells his own goods, or purchases goods on his own credit (and thereby in reality becomes the owner), no property in such goods vests in his correspondent until he has done some notorious act to divest himself of his title, or has parted with the possession by an actual and unconditional delivery for the use of such correspondent. (The St. Jozé Indiano, 2 Gallis, S. C. ante, Vol. I., p. 208.) But such delivery or appropriation to the use of his correspondent need not be by a direct act, but it may constructively arise from the circumstances of the case, even where the shipper has made an intermediate assignment of the goods. (The Mary and Susan, ante, Vol. I., p. 25.)

In all these cases the material question is, whether the shipper retains or possesses any control over the property (independent of the mere right of stoppage in transitu in cases of insolvency), or has parted with the possession and all authority *over it. For if an [*35 enemy's shipper consign goods or money to his correspondent at H., for the purpose of answering drafts of his correspondent in A., without any letter of advice or document making it the absolute property of such correspondent, or putting it out of his own control, it still remains the property of the shipper, for he may at any time countermand the order, or give the goods or money a new direction. In substance it is the same transaction as if a person send a sum of money to his private banker, directing him to hold it subject to the order of A.; in which case, if on the next day, and before any such order had been given, or even the fact of lodgment known to the other party, he had changed his purpose, and directed a conversion of the money to another object, it is clear that the bankers could not resist with effect. (The Josephine, 4 Rob., 25.)

In respect to questions of illegal trade, little is necessary to be said in addition to the observations and cases cited in the former volume. It is a fundamental principle of prize law that all trade with the enemy is prohibited to all persons, whether natives, naturalized citizens, or foreigners domiciled in the country during the time of their residence, under the penalty of confiscation. (The Vigilantia, 1 Rob., 1, 14, 26; The Hoop, 1 Rob., 196; Potts v. Bell, 8 T. R., 548; The Rapid, 8 Cranch, 155; S. C. 1 Gallis., 295; The Alexander, 8 Cranch, 169; S. C. 1 Gallis., 582; The Joseph, 8 Cranch, 451; S. C. 1 Gallis., 545.)¹ *The same penalty [*36 is applied to subjects of allies in the war, trading with the common enemy. (The Nayade, 4

1.—Au surplus, l'intention de l'ordonnance, en exigeant que la police contienne, le nom et le domicile de celui qui se fait assurer—les effets sur lesquels l'assurance sera faite—le nom du navire, du lieu ou les marchandises seront chargées, et déchargées, est encore de connoître en temps de guerre, si malgré l'interdiction de commerce qu'emporte toujours toute déclaration de guerre, les sujets du Roi ne font point commerce avec les ennemis de l'Etat, ou avec des amis ou alliés, par l'interposition desquels on feroit passer aux ennemis des munitions de guerre et de bouche, ou d'autres effets prohibés: car tout cela étant défendu, comme préjudiciable à l'Etat, seroit sujet à confiscation, et à être déclaré de bonne prise, étant trouvé, soit sur les navires de la nation, soit sur ceux des amis et alliés, comme il sera observé sur le tit. des Prises. 39*] is *personally answerable, and for which the owner must look to him for indemnification. (The Elsebe, 5 Rob., 173, 175.) Whether a like principle ought not to be applied to the owner of the cargo in cases where the ship originally sails on the voyage under an enemy's license has not been decided. The point was made in the Supreme Court in a recent case; but knowledge being brought home to the actual agent of the owners of the cargo, it became unnecessary to decide the more general principle. (The Hiram, ante, Vol. I., p. 440.) There are many other cases in which the act of the master will bind the owner of the cargo as well as the ship; such are resistance of the right of search, suppressing or fraudulently destroying the ship's papers, rescue by the neutral crew after capture, &c. (The Elsebe, 5 Rob., 173; The Dispatch, 3 Rob., 279; The Nereide, 9 Cranch, 388, 451.) But though the act of a neutral master in resisting search binds both ship and cargo, yet it has been solemnly settled by the Supreme Court that the resistance of a belligerent master does not bind a neutral shipment, unless the proprietor has co-operated in the resistance. (The Nereide, 9 Cranch, 388.) In a very recent case, however, Sir W. Scott has asserted the contrary doctrine. (The Fanny, 1 Dodson, 443.) But the act of the agent or consignee of the cargo, whether he be the master or not, is conclusive upon the owner of the cargo. (The Vrouw Judith, 1 Rob., 150.) And the act of a general agent of the cargo in covering the enemy's property in the same shipment with his principal's property affects the whole with condemnation, although the principal had no knowledge of the illegal act. (The St. Nicholas, ante, Vol. I., p. 417; The Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Pratt, 2 Binney, 308.) And the same principle is applied in the case of simulated papers; for the carrying of simulated papers is an efficient cause of condemnation. (Oswell v. Vigne, 15 East, 70.) But in peculiar circumstances the act of an agent of the cargo will be liberally construed in favor of his principal. As if the agent be a belligerent, and has received orders to purchase goods before the war or before a blockade, his acts in making the shipment during a blockade are not binding on his principal, unless he had had an opportunity to countermand the orders, and neglected it; for the agent in such cases may have a personal interest in 40*] exporting *the goods. (The Neptunus, 1 Rob., 173; cases cited in The Hoop, 1 Rob., 196; The Dankbaarheid, 1 Dodson, 183.) But the act of the master will not bind even the owner of the ship unless it be in cases within the scope of his ordinary authority. If, therefore, the master of a non-commissioned merchant ship make a capture, the owner is not responsible in damages, if it turn out to be illegal. (Bynk. Q. J. Pub., lib. 1, ch. 19; Du Ponceau's ed., p. 147, 153.)

It frequently turns out, on examination of the claims and evidence in the prize court, that the case is a mere case of recapture; and questions arise, whether the original belligerent owner is entitled to restitution or not, and if so entitled, what is the compensation to be allowed by way of salvage? Bynkershoek asserts, that by the general maritime law, if, after capture, the ship and cargo be carried infra præsidia, of the enemy, or of his ally, or of a neutral, the title of the original belligerent proprietor is completely gone, and is not revived by a recapture. (Q. J. Pub. L. 1. ch. 5., Du Ponceau's ed., p. 36.) And in this he stands supported by learned authorities. (The Ceylon, 1 Dodson, 105; L'Actif, 1 Dodson, 185; but see Martens on Recaptures, ch. 3, p. 107.) In most of the states of Europe municipal regulations have been made which settle the rights of their own subjects. (Bynk. ubi supra; Valin, des prises, ch. 6, p. 84; Azuni, part 2, ch. 4; Martens on Recaptures, ch. 3, sec. 2, p. 146; The Adeline, 9 Cranch, 244, 288.)¹ And in *England the right of postliminy is by [*41 statute as between subjects preserved forever, except where the vessel, after capture, has been fitted out by the enemy for war; so that the original owner may, in all other cases, claim restitution upon the payment of a stipulated salvage. (Horne's Compend., ch. 4, p. 34; Marshall on Ins., b. 1, ch. 12, s. 8; The Sedulous, 1 Dodson, 253.) In cases, however, not governed by municipal regulations, although all nations agree that to change the property by capture a firm and secure possession is necessary, yet the practice of nations is so various that it seems difficult to collect a general rule, as to what constitutes such firm and secure possession, which might properly be asserted to be the law of nations. (The Santa Cruz, 1 Rob., 49; L'Actif, 1 Dodson, 185; The Ceylon, 1 Dodson, 105.) The rule of bringing infra præsidia, or, in proper cases, the rule of pernoctation, or twenty-four hours' possession, seems generally recognized by the most eminent jurists on the continent of Europe (The Ceylon, 1 Dodson, 105; L'Actif, 1 Dodson, 185. See the Santa Cruz, 1 Rob., 50,)² and it appears to have been anciently the doctrine of the British law. (Ib.) According, however, to the present law in Great Britain, property captured is not deemed to be changed so as to bar the owner in favor of a vendee or recaptor, till there has been a sentence of condemnation; and therefore, until that period, the title of the original owner is not divested, and he is entitled to *restitution, in the hands [*42 of whoever he may find the property. (Le Caux

v. Elen, Doug. 613, 616; Goss v. Withers, 2 Burr, 694; The Flad Oyen, 1 Rob., 134; The Santa Cruz, 1 Rob., 49; The Fanny and Elmira, 1 Edw., 117; The Ceylon, 1 Dodson, 105; L'Actif, 1 Dodson, 185.) If such sentence of condemnation is passed, it is a sufficient title to a vendee (The Purissima Conception, 6 Rob., 45; The Victoria, 1 Edw., 97); and would also have entitled a recaptor to condemnation of the property, if the statute had not stepped in, and, as to British subjects, revived the jus postliminii of the original owner, on payment of salvage. As to the interests of British subjects, a condemnation by an incompetent court is a mere nullity (The Flad Oyen, 1 Rob., 134); though, as to the interests of other parties, the British prize courts will not inquire into the sufficiency of the sentence. (The Cosmopolite, 3 Rob., 333.) A condemnation by an enemy's consul in a neutral port is deemed invalid. (The Flad Oyen, 1 Rob., 134.) But a condemnation of a prize ship, while lying in a neutral port, by a regular court of admiralty in the hostile country, is clearly valid. (The Henrick and Maria, 4 Rob., 43; The Christopher, 3 Rob., 207; The Victoria, 1 Edw., 97; Hudson v. Guestier, 4 Cranch, 293; S. C., 6 Cranch, 281; The Arabella and Madeira, 2 Gallis.) A condemnation originally defective from the incompetency of the court, may be made good by the valid decree of an appellate court. (The Falcon, 6 Rob., 194.) And a title originally defective, being acquired under the sentence of an incompetent court, is cured by an intervening peace, which has the effect of quieting all titles of possession arising from the war. (The Schooner Sophie, 6 Rob., 138.) Where a party has purchased a captured ship, under an invalid title, but which was not notoriously bad, the court on decreeing restitution to the original owner will allow the party for any amelioration beyond the ordinary repairs, but not for ordinary repairs. (The Kierlight, 3 Rob., 96; The Perseverance, 2 Rob., 239; The Nostra de Conceicao, 5 Rob., 294.) And where a ship has been captured and carried into a hostile port, and is afterwards sold to a neutral, a presumption arises that she has 43 been regularly condemned, *and the proof of the contrary rests on the claimant, and not the purchaser. (The Countess of Lauderdale, 4 Rob., 283.)

In the United States cases of recapture have been the object of several legislative provisions, which, as far as they apply, supersede all discussions upon the principles of general law. The act of Congress of the 3d March, 1800, ch. 14, (new edit., ch. 168,) directs, that in cases of recaptures of vessels or goods belonging to persons resident within, or under the protection of the United States, the same not having been condemned as prize by competent authority before the recapture, shall be restored on payment of salvage, of one-eighth of the value if recaptured by a public ship, and one-sixth if recaptured by a private ship; and if the recaptured vessel shall appear to have been set forth and armed as a vessel of war before such capture, or afterwards, and before the recapture, then the salvage to be one moiety of the value. If the recaptured vessel belong to the government and be unarmed, the salvage is to be one-sixth if recaptured by a private ship, and one-twelfth if recaptured by a public ship; if armed, then the Wheat. 2.

salvage to be one moiety if recaptured by a public ship. In respect to public armed ships, the cargo pays the same rate of salvage as the vessel by the express words of the act; but in respect to private ships, the rate of salvage (by some probable omission in the act) is the same on the cargo whether the vessel be armed or unarmed. (The Adeline, 9 Cranch, 244.)

What constitutes a setting forth as a vessel of war within the act has not been settled by any adjudications in the United States; but the same question has been decided by the British prize courts, in cases arising under a similar clause in the British prize acts, which, indeed, seems recognized as a part of their common law of prize. (The Ceylon, 1 Dodson, 105, 119.) And it has been there settled that where a ship was originally armed for the slave-trade, and after capture an additional number of men were put on board, but there was no commission of war, and no additional arming, it was not a setting forth as a vessel of war under the prize act. (The Horatio, 6 Rob., 320.) But a commission of war is decisive if there be guns on board. (The Nostra Signora del Rosario, 3 Rob., 10; The Ceylon, 1 *Dodson, 105.) [44 And where the vessel has, after the capture, been fitted out as a privateer, it is conclusive against her, although when recaptured she is navigating as a mere merchant ship; for where the former character of a captured vessel had been obliterated by her conversion into a ship of war, the legislature meant to look no further; but considered the title of the former owner forever extinguished. (L'Actif, 1 Dodson, 185.) Where it appeared that the vessel had been engaged in the military service of the enemy under the appointment of the minister of marine, it was held a sufficient proof of a setting forth as a vessel of war. (The Santa Brigada, 3 Rob., 56.) So, where she is armed, and is employed in the public military service of the enemy by those who have competent authority so to employ her, although she be not regularly commissioned. (The Ceylon, 1 Dodson, 105.) But the mere employment in the military service of the enemy is not a sufficient setting forth for war; but if there be a fair semblance of authority in the person directing the vessel to be so employed, and nothing upon the face of the proceedings to invalidate it, the court will presume that he is duly authorized; and the commander of a single ship may be presumed to be vested with this authority as a commander of a squadron. (The Georgiana, 1 Dodson, 397.) The valuation of the property, when restored under the acts respecting recapture, is to be made upon its value at the place of restitution, and not of recapture. (The Progress, 1 Edw., 210, 222.)

In respect to recaptures of the ships and cargoes of allies or co-belligerents, from the hands of a common enemy, the general rule is to apply the principle of reciprocity; and if they, under like circumstances, restore on salvage, or condemn generally, to deal out to them the same measure of reciprocal justice. (The Santa Cruz, 1 Rob., 50.)¹ If there should exist a country having no rule on the subject, then the recapturing country applies its own rule as to its own subjects to the case, and rests on the presumption that the same rule will be administered in the future practice of the other party. (The Santa Cruz, 1 Rob., 50; The San Francisco, 1 Edw., 179.) The act *of Congress of the 3d March, 1800, ch. 14, adopts the same regulation. (The Adeline, 9 Cranch, 244.)

Salvage is not, in general, allowed on the recapture of neutral property, unless there be danger of condemnation or such unjustifiable conduct on the part of the government of the captors as to bring the property into jeopardy. (The War Onskan, 2 Rob., 299; The Eleonora Catharina, 4 Rob., 156; The Carlotta, 5 Rob., 54; The Huntress, 6 Rob., 104; The Acteon, 1 Edw., 254; The Sanson, 6 Rob., 410; Talbot v. Seeman, 4 Dall., 34; S. C. 1 Cranch, 1.)¹ But even if in such a case of recapture the recaptors have entitled themselves to salvage, they may forfeit the claim by the irregularity of their conduct. (The Barbara, 3 Rob., 171.)

It is no objection to an allowance of salvage on a recapture that it was made by a non-commissioned vessel; for no letters of marque are necessary for this purpose, nor is a recapture at all made under the authority of prize. It is the duty of every citizen to assist his fellow-citizens in war, and to retake their property out of the possession of the enemy; and no commission is necessary to give a person so employed a title to the reward, which the law allots to that meritorious act of duty. (The Helen, 3 Rob., 224.) And if a convoying ship actually recapture one of her convoy, which has been previously captured by the enemy, it entitles her to salvage. (The Wight, 6 Rob., 315.) But a mere rescue of a ship associated in the same common enterprise gives no right to salvage. (The Belle, 1 Edw., 66.)

To entitle a party to salvage, as upon a recapture, there must have been an actual or constructive capture; for military salvage will not be allowed in any cases where the property has not been actually rescued from the enemy. (The Franklin, 4 Rob., 147.) But it is not necessary that the enemy should have *actual possession; it is sufficient if the property is completely under the dominion of the enemy. (The Edward and Mary, 3 Rob., 305; The Pensamento Felix, 1 Edw., 116.) If, however, a vessel be captured going in distress into an enemy's port, and is thereby saved, it is merely a case of civil and not of military salvage. (The Franklin, 4 Rob., 147.) But to constitute a recapture, it is not necessary that the recaptors should have a bodily and actual possession; it is sufficient if the prize be actually rescued from the grasp of the hostile captor. (The Edward and Mary, 3 Rob., 305.)

Where a hostile ship is captured, and afterwards is recaptured by the enemy, and is again recaptured from the enemy, the original captors are not entitled to restitution on paying salvage, but the last captors are entitled to all the rights of prize, for, by the first recapture, the whole right of the original captors is devested. (The Polly, 4 Rob., 217, note a; The Astrea, ante, Vol. I., p. 125.)² And where the original captors have abandoned their prize, and she is subsequently captured by other persons, the latter are solely entitled to the property. (The Lord Nelson, 1 Edw., 79; The Diligentia, 1 Dodson, 404.) But if the abandonment be involuntary and produced by the terror of superior force, and especially if produced by the act of the second captors, the rights of the original captors are completely revived. (The Mary, ante, p. 123.) And where the enemy has captured a ship, and afterwards deserted her, and she is then recaptured, it is not to be considered as a case of derelict, for the original owner never had the animus derelinquendi; and, therefore, she is to be restored on payment of salvage; but as it is not strictly a recapture within the prize act, the rate of salvage is discretionary. (The John and Jane, 4 Rob., 216; The Gage, 6 Rob., 273; [47 The Lord Nelson*, 1 Edw., 79].)³ But if the abandonment by the enemy be produced by the terror of hostile force, it is a recapture within the terms of the prize act. (The Gage, 6 Rob., 273.) Where the captors abandon their prize, and she is afterwards brought into port by neutral salvors, it has been held that the neutral court has jurisdiction to decree salvage, but cannot restore the property to the original belligerent owners; for by the capture, the captors acquired such a right of property as no neutral nation could justly impugn or destroy, and consequently, the proceeds (after deducting salvage) belong to the original captors; and neutral

3.—Si le navire, sans être recous est abandonné par les ennemis, ou si par tempête ou autre cas fortuit, il revient en la possession de nos sujets, avant qu'il ait été conduit dans aucun port ennemi, il sera rendu au propriétaire qui le réclamera dans l'an et jour, quoiqu'il ait été plus de vingt-quatre heures entre les mains des ennemis. Ordonnance de 1681, liv. 3, tit. 9, des Prises, art. 9. Pothier is of the opinion that these words, avant qu'il soit entré dans aucun port ennemi, are to be understood not as restricting the right of restitution on payment of salvage to the particular case mentioned of a vessel which is abandoned by the enemy before being carried into port, which case is mentioned merely as an example of what ordinarily happens, parce que c'est le cas ordinaire auquel un vaisseau échappe à l'ennemi qui l'a pris, ne pouvant plus guère lui échapper lorsqu'il a été conduit dans ses ports. De Propriété, No. 99. But Valin holds that the terms of the ordinance are to be literally construed, and that the right of the original proprietor is completely devested by the carrying into an enemy's port. Sur l'Ordonnance, Id. He is also of the opinion that this species of salvage is to be analogized to the case of shipwreck, and that the recaptors are entitled to one-third of the value of the property saved. Id. But Azuni contends that the rate of salvage in this case is not regulated by the ordinance, but is discretionary, to be proportioned to the nature and extent of the service performed, which can never be equal to the rescue of property from the hands of the enemy by military force, or to the recovery of goods lost by shipwreck. Part 2, ch. 4, sec. 8, 9. Emerigon is also opposed to Valin on this subject, and cites, in support of his own doctrine, the Consolato del Mare, ch. 287, and Targa, ch. 46, n. 10. Emerigon, Des Assurances, tom. 1, p. 504, 505.

48*] nations *ought not to inquire into the validity of a capture, as between belligerents. (The Mary Ford, 3 Dall., 188.) But if the captors make a donation of the captured vessel to a neutral crew, the latter are entitled as salvors, but after deducting salvage, the remaining proceeds will be decreed to the original owner. (The Adventure, 8 Cranch, 227; S. C. ante, Vol. I. p. 128, note f.) And it seems to be a general rule, liable to but few exceptions, that the rights of capture are completely divested by a hostile recapture, escape, or voluntary discharge of the captured vessel. (Hudson v. Guestier, 4 Cranch, 293; S. C. 6 Cranch, 281; The Diligentia, 1 Dodson, 404.) And the same principle seems applicable to a hostile rescue; but if the rescue be made by a neutral crew of a neutral ship, it may be doubtful how far such an illegal act, which involves the penalty of confiscation, would be held in the courts of the captor's country, to divest his original right in case of a subsequent recapture.

As to recaptors, though their right to salvage is extinguished by a subsequent hostile recapture and regular sentence of condemnation, carried into execution, divesting the owners of their property, yet, if the vessel be restored upon such recapture, and resumes her voyage, either by an acquittal in court or a release of the sovereign power, the recaptors are reintegrated in their right of salvage. (The Charlotte Caroline, Dodson, 192.) And recaptors and salvors have a legal interest in the property, which cannot be divested by other subjects without an adjudication in a competent court; and it is not for the government's ships or officers, or for other persons, upon the ground of superior authority, to dispossess them without cause. (The Blendenhall, 1 Dodson, 414.)

In all cases of salvage, where the rate is not fixed by positive law, it is in the discretion of the court, as well upon recaptures as in other cases. (Talbot v. Seeman, 1 Cranch, 1; The Apollo, 8 Rob., 308; Bynk. Q. J. Pub., lib. 1, ch. 5; Du Ponceau's ed., p. 36, 41, 42.) And where, upon a recapture, the parties have entitled themselves to a military salvage under the prize acts, the court may also award them, in addition, a civil salvage, if they have subsequently rendered services by *succoring the vessel in distress from perils of the seas. (The Louisa, 1 Dodson, 317.)

In the construction of the British prize acts (and similar questions may arise under our own acts respecting recaptures), it has been held that a revenue cutter, having a letter of marque, is to be deemed a private ship of war, and entitled to a salvage of one-sixth. (The Helen, 3 Rob., 224; The Sedulous, 1 Dodson, 253.) But the British revenue cutters belonging to private individuals, although fitted out, manned, and armed at the expense of the government, it may be thought doubtful whether this authority applies in the United States, where the revenue cutters are generally built and owned, as well as equipped, manned and armed by the government. But a store-ship, armed at the public expense, and commanded by commissioned officers, is clearly to be deemed a public armed ship. (The Sedulous, 1 Dodson, 253.)

In the progress of the cause an unlivery of the cargo often becomes necessary either to ascertain its nature and quality (The Liverpool Wheat, 2.

Packet, 1 Gallis., 518; Marriott's Form, 229; The Carl Walter, 4 Rob., 207; The Richmond, 5 Rob., 325; The Jonge Margaretha, 1 Rob., 189; The Oster Risoer, 4 Rob., 199); or more effectually to preserve it from injury and pillage (Marriott's Form, 323;) or because the ship stands in a predicament altogether distinct from that of the cargo. (The Hoffnung, 6 Rob., 231; The Prosper, Edw., 72; Marriott's Form, 224.) In all these, and other proper cases, the prize court will, upon proper application, decree an unlivery. Upon ordering an unlivery, a warrant or commission of unlivery is directed to some competent person, and usually to the marshal to unlade the cargo, and to make a true and perfect inventory thereof. (Marriott's Form, 224.) At the same time a warrant or commission of appraisement is usually directed to some competent persons, who are to reduce into writing a true and perfect inventory of the cargo, and upon oath to appraise the same according to its true value. In England, this commission is sometimes *directed to a person who is [*50 authorized to choose and swear the appraisers and himself. (Marriott's Form, 227.) But in the United States the general practice is for the courts to appoint the appraisers in the first instance. And where it becomes necessary or proper to unlade the cargo for inspection of its nature or quality, a commission of inspection is issued, directed to some competent persons in like manner to return an inventory thereof, with a certificate of the particulars, names, descriptions, and sortments of the goods, together with their several marks and numbers, and the nature, use, quantities and qualities thereof. (Marriott's Form, 229.)¹ The court may also, in its discretion, order the ship or cargo, or both, to be removed to another place or port; for having the custody of the thing, it is bound to use all reasonable precautions to preserve it, and to consult the best interests of all parties; and in such case a commission of removal is issued, which is usually directed to the marshal; but the court may direct it to any other person. (Marriott's Form, 234; The Rendsborg, 6 Rob., 142; The Sacra Familia, 5 Rob., 360.)

An unlivery of the cargo is considered as done for the benefit of all parties, and, therefore, the expense is generally borne by the party ultimately prevailing. If the captors apply for an unlivery, and the property is condemned, the expense falls on the captors; but if restitution be awarded, the court, in its discretion, usually makes the expense a charge on the cargo. (The Industrie, 5 Rob., 88.)²

Salvage is not, in general, allowed on the recapture of neutral property, unless there be danger of condemnation or such unjustifiable conduct on the part of the government of the captors as to bring the property into jeopardy. (The War Onskan, 2 Rob., 299; The Eleonora Catharina, 4 Rob., 156; The Carlotta, 5 Rob., 54; The Huntress, 6 Rob., 104; The Acteon, 1 Edw., 254; The Sanson, 6 Rob., 410; Talbot v. Seeman, 4 Dall., 34; S. C. 1 Cranch, 1.)¹ But even if in such a case of recapture the recaptors have entitled themselves to salvage, they may forfeit the claim by the irregularity of their conduct. (The Barbara, 3 Rob., 171.)

It is no objection to an allowance of salvage on a recapture that it was made by a non-commissioned vessel; for no letters of marque are necessary for this purpose, nor is a recapture at all made under the authority of prize. It is the duty of every citizen to assist his fellow-citizens in war, and to retake their property out of the possession of the enemy; and no commission is necessary to give a person so employed a title to the reward, which the law allots to that meritorious act of duty. But a mere rescue of a ship associated in the same common enterprise gives no right to salvage. (The Belle, 1 Edw., 66.)

To entitle a party to salvage, as upon a recapture, there must have been an actual or constructive capture; for military salvage will not be allowed in any cases where the property has not been actually rescued from the enemy. (The Franklin, 4 Rob., 147.) But it is not necessary that the enemy should have *actual possession; it is sufficient if the property is completely under the dominion of the enemy. emy's port, and is thereby saved, it is merely a case of civil and not of military salvage. (The Franklin, 4 Rob., 147.) But to constitute a recapture, it is not necessary that the recaptors should have a bodily and actual possession; it is sufficient if the prize be actually rescued from the grasp of the hostile captor. (The Edward and Mary, 3 Rob., 305.)

Where a hostile ship is captured, and afterwards is recaptured by the enemy, and is again recaptured from the enemy, the original captors are not entitled to restitution on prize salvage, but the last captors are entitled to the rights of prize, for, by the first recapture, the whole right of the original captors is destroyed. But if the capture be involuntary and produced by the terror of superior force, and especially induced by the act of the second captors, the rights of the original captors are revived. (The Mary, ante, p. 123.) And if the enemy has captured a ship, and she has deserted her, and she is then recaptured, it is not to be considered as a case of recapture; the original owner never had the animus relinquendi; and, therefore, she is restored on payment of salvage; but strictly a recapture within the principle of prize. The rate of salvage is discretionary. (The Jane, 4 Rob., 216; The Gage, 6 Rob., 179; The Lord Nelson, 1 Edw., 79.)³ But if the capture by the enemy be produced by hostile force, it is a recapture within the principle of prize. (The Gage, 6 Rob., 179.) If the captors abandon their prize, and afterwards brought into port by others, it has been held that the neutral captors have no right to decree salvage, but can only restore the property to the original belligerent. By the capture, the captors acquire a right of property as no other could justly impugn or destroy it. Consequently, the proceeds (after deducting expenses) belong to the original captors.

pose of this note to discuss these topics at large with all the distinctions which belong to them. Indeed, such a discussion would of itself require a very considerable treatise. It may, however, be of some use to give a rapid sketch of the leading principles which regulate the decisions of prize courts on some of these subjects.

In respect to the question who are to be considered enemies or not, the general principle is, that every person is to be considered as belonging to that country where he has his domicile, whatever may be his native or adopted country. (The Vigilantia, 1 Rob., 1; The Endraught, 1 Rob., 19; The Sarah Christina, 1 Rob., 237; The Indian Chief, 3 Rob., 23; The President, 5 Rob., 277; The Neptunus, 6 Rob., 408; The Venus, 9 Cranch, 253; The Frances. Gillespie's claim, 1 Gallis., 614; The Mary and Susan, Richardson's claim, ante, vol. I, p. 46, S. C. p. 55; note f; M'Connel v. Hector, 3 Bos. & Pull., 113; Bynk. Q. J. Pub., ch. 3; Du-ponceau's edit., p. 19, 25.)¹ And the masters and crews of ships are deemed to possess 28 the national character of the ships to which they belong during the time of their employment. (The Endraught, 1 Rob., 21; The Bernon, 1 Rob., 101; vide The Embden, 1 Rob., 17; The Frederick, 5 Rob., 8; The Ann, 1 Dodson, 221.) And even if a person goes into a belligerent country originally for temporary purposes, he will not preserve his neutral character, if he remain there several years, paying taxes, &c. (The Harmony, 2 Rob., 322; The Embden, 1 Rob., 17.) And a neutral consul, resident and trading in a belligerent country, is, as to his mercantile character, deemed a belligerent of that country. (The Indian Chief, 3 Rob., 22; The Josephine, 4 Rob., 25.) And the same rule applies to the subject of one belligerent country, resident in the country of its enemy, and carrying on trade there. (The Citto, 3 Rob., 88; M'Connel v. Hector, 3 Bos. & Pull., 113.) But a character acquired by mere domicile ceases upon removal from the country. (The Indian Chief, 3 Rob., 12.) The native character easily reverts, and it requires fewer circumstances to constitute domicile in the case of a native than to impress the national character on one who is originally of another country. (La Virginie, 5 Rob., 98.) And in his favor, a party is deemed to have changed his domicile and his native character reverts as soon as he puts himself in intinere to return to his native country animo revertendi. (The Indian Chief, 3 Rob., 12; The St. Lawrence, 1 Gallis., 467.)

In general, a neutral merchant trading in the ordinary manner with a belligerent country, does not, by the mere accident of his having a stationed agent there, contract the character of the enemy. (The Anna Catharina, 4 Rob., 107, 121.) But it is otherwise if he be not engaged in trade upon the ordinary footing of a neutral merchant, but as a privileged trader of the enemy; for then it is in effect a hostile trade. (The Anna Catharina, 4 Rob., 107, 121.) So if the agent carry on a trade from the hostile country, which is not clearly neutral. (Ib.) And if a person be a partner in a house of trade in the enemy's country, *he is, as to the [*29] concerns and trade of that house, deemed an enemy, and his share is liable to confiscation, as such, notwithstanding his own residence is in a neutral country; for the domicile of the house is considered in this respect as the domicile of the partners. (The Vigilantia, 1 Rob., 1, 14, 19; The Susa, 2 Rob., 255; The Indiana, 3 Rob., 44; The Portland, 3 Rob., 41; The Vriendchap, 4 Rob., 166; The Jonge Klassina, 5 Rob., 297; The Antonia Johanna, ante, Vol. I. p. 159; The St. Joze Indiano, 2 Gallis.) But if he has a house of trade in a neutral country, he has not the benefit of the same principle; for if his own personal residence be in the hostile country, his share in the property of the neutral house is liable to condemnation. (Ib. and The Frances, 1 Gallis, 618; S. C., 8 Cranch, 348.) However, where a neutral is engaged, in peace, in a house of trade in the enemy's country, his property so engaged in the house is not, at the commencement of war, confiscated; but if he continues in the house after knowledge of the war, it is liable, as above stated, to confiscation. (The Vigilantia, 1 Rob., 1, 14, 15; The Susa, 2 Rob., 251, 255.) It is a settled principle that traffic alone, independent of residence, will, in some cases, confer a hostile character on the individual. (Ib. The Susa, 2 Rob., 251, 255; The Vriendchap, 4 Rob., 166.) And if a neutral be engaged in the enemy's navigation, it not only affects the particular vessel in which he is employed, but all other vessels belonging to him, that have no distinct national character impressed upon them. (The Vriendchap, 4 Rob., 166.)

Ships are deemed to belong to the country under whose flag and pass they navigate, and this circumstance is conclusive upon their character. (The Vigilantia, 1 Rob., 1, 19, 26; The Vrouw Anna Catharina, 5 Rob., 161; The Success, 1 Dodson, 181.) So, even if purchased by a neutral, if they are habitually engaged in the trade of the enemy's country (The Vigilantia, 1 Rob., 1, 19, 26; The Planter's Wench, 5 Rob., 22); even though there be no sea-port in the territory of the neutral. (Ib. But in general, and unless under special circumstances, the national character of ships depends on the residence of the owner. (Ib. The Magnus, 1 Rob., 81.) When, however, it is said that the flag and pass is conclusive on the character of the ship, the *meaning is this, that the party [*30] who takes the benefit of them is himself bound by them; he is not at liberty, when they happen to turn to his disadvantage, to turn round and deny the character which he has worn for his own benefit, and upon the credit of his own oath or solemn declarations. But they do not bind other parties as against him; other parties are at liberty to show that these are spurious credentials, assumed for the purpose of disguising the real character of the vessel; and it is no inconsiderable part of the ordinary occupation of a prize court to pull off this mask and exhibit the vessel so disguised in her true character of an enemy's vessel. (The Fortuna, 1 Dodson, 87; The Success, Id., 131.) Ships and cargoes engaged in the privileged and peculiar trade of a nation, under a special contract, and the sanction of the government, are considered as affected by the character of the nation, and if it be hostile, the trade is stamped with the same character. (The Princess, 2 Rob., 49; The Anna Catharina, 4 Rob., 197; The Rendsborg, 4 Rob., 121; The Vrouw Anna Catharina, 5 Rob., 161; The Commercen, ante, Vol. I, p. 382; Vide 5 Rob., 5, note a.) And the produce of an estate situated in a hostile colony is so impressed with the character of the soil that although the owner of the estate be resident in a neutral country, his interest in the produce is deemed enemy's property. (The Phoenix, 5 Rob., 20; The Vrouw Anna Catharina, 5 Rob., 161; The Dree Gebroeders, 4 Rob., 232; Bentzon's claim, 9 Cranch, 191.)

In respect to the transfers of enemies' ships during war, it is certain that purchases of them by neutrals is not, in general, illegal; but such purchases are liable to great suspicion, and if good proof be not given of their validity, by a bill of sale and payment of a reasonable consideration, it will materially impair the validity of the neutral claim (The Bernon, 1 Rob., 102; The Sechs Gedschwiestern, 4 Rob., 100); and if the purchase be made by an agent, his letters of procuration must be produced and proved. (The Argo, 1 Rob., 158.)¹ And if, after such [31*] transfer, the ship *be employed habitually in the enemy's trade or under the management of a hostile proprietor, the sale will be deemed merely colorable and collusive. (The Jemmy, 4 Rob., 31; The Omnibus, 6 Rob., 71.) But the right of purchase, by neutrals, extends only to merchant ships of enemies (The Minerva, 6 Rob., 396, 399); for the purchase of ships of war belonging to enemies, is held to be invalid. (The Minerva, 6 Rob., 396.) And a sale of a merchant ship, made by an enemy to a neutral, during war, must be an absolute, unconditional sale. (The Packet de Bilbao, 1 Rob., 133; The Noydt Gedeckt, 1 Rob., 137, note a.) Anything tending to continue the interest of the enemy in the ship vitiates a contract of this description altogether. (The Sechs Gedschwiestern, 4 Rob., 100.)

In respect to proprietary interests in cargoes, though, in general, the rules of the common law apply, yet there are many peculiar principles of prize law to be considered. It is a general rule that during hostilities, or imminent and impending danger of hostilities, the property of parties belligerent cannot change its national character during the voyage, or, as it is commonly expressed, in transitu. (The Dankbaar Africaan, 1 Rob., 107; The Herstelder, 1 Rob., 114.) This rule equally applies to ships and cargoes; and it is so inflexible that it is not relaxed even in favor of owners who become subjects by capitulation after the shipment and before the capture. (Ib.) But if the ship sails before hostilities, when there is a decided state of amity between the two countries, and before the capture, the owner again becomes a friend, and at the time of the capture, and also at the time of adjudication, he is in a capacity to claim; the prize courts will then give him the benefit of the principle, that the national character cannot be altered in transitu, and will restore to him. (Ib.) The same distinction is applied to purchases made by neutrals, of property in transitu; if purchased during a state of war existing, or imminent and impending danger *of war, the con- [*32 tract is held invalid, and the property is deemed to continue as it was at the time of shipment, until the actual delivery. It is otherwise, however, if the contract be made during a state of peace, and without contemplation of war; for, under such circumstances the prize courts will recognize the contract, and enforce the title acquired under it. (The Vrouw Margaretha, 1 Rob., 336; The Jan Frederick, 5 Rob., 128.) And property is still considered in transitu if it be ultimately destined to the hostile country, notwithstanding it has arrived at a neutral port, and the ship is there changed. (The Carl Walter, 4 Rob., 207.) The reason why courts of admiralty have established this rule as to transfers in transitu during a state of war, or expected war, is asserted to be, that if such a rule did not exist, all goods shipped in the enemy's country would be protected by transfers, which it would be impossible to detect. (The Vrouw Margaretha, 1 Rob., 336.)

The same public policy has established the rule of the prize courts, that property going, during war, to be delivered in the enemy's country, and under a contract to become the property of the enemy immediately on arrival, if taken in transitu, is to be considered as enemy's property. (The Sally, 3 Rob., 300, note a.) And all contracts of purchase effected on the part of the belligerent, where the payment is executory and contingent on delivery at an ulterior port, at the risk of the neutral vendor or shipper, are considered as contracts in fraud of the prize law, and the goods, if captured in transitu, are condemned as the absolute property of the enemy. (The Atlas, 3 Rob., 299; The Anna Catharina, 4 Rob., 107, 113, note.) But when the contract is made in time of peace, and without any contemplation of war, no such rule exists. (Ib.) But the rule is applied where such a contract is originally made between allies in the war, if a party to it becomes neutral after the contract, and before the execution of it, and the shipment is made afterwards. (The Anna Catharina, 4 Rob., 107, 112.) A contract by a neutral with a privileged company of the enemy, with a view to the transportation of the whole produce of a colony, or of the company itself, if made during war, or in contemplation of war, is pronounced illegal, and the property is liable to *condemnation as hostile property. (The [*33 Rendsborg, 4 Rob., 121; The Jan Frederick, 5 Rob., 128.) But if a neutral, during peace, and without contemplation of war, purchase goods in a colony from a regular privileged company there, and it is agreed that they shall be transported and sold in the mother country by the company's agents for the benefit of the

1.—Que tout vaisseau qui sera de fabrique ennemie, ou qui aura eu originairement un propriétaire ennemi, ne pourra être censé neutre, s'il n'en a été fait une vente pardevant les officiers publics qui doivent passer cette sorte d'actes, et si cette vente ne se trouve à bord, et n'est soutenue d'un pouvoir authentique donné par le premier propriétaire, lorsqu'il ne vend pas lui-même. neutral, the contract is good, and the property remains neutral during its transit, notwithstanding an intervening war of the mother country. (The Vrow Anna Catharina, 5 Rob., 161.)

In ordinary shipments of goods, unaffected by the foregoing principles, the question of proprietary interest often turns on minute circumstances and distinctions, the general principle being that if they are going for account of the shipper, or subject to his order or control, the property is not divested in transitu. If there be any condition annexed to the delivery of the goods to the consignee, the proprietary interest remains in the shipper, notwithstanding the goods are sent in pursuance of the orders of the consignee. Thus, if a merchant in H send goods to A in another country, by order of B and on account of B, but with directions not to deliver them unless satisfaction could be given for the payment, the property is not divested from the shipper, but remains his in transitu. (Cited in The Aurora, 4 Rob., 819.) The same principle applies where goods are shipped to the orders of the shippers, but to be delivered by their agents to the consignee upon the agents being satisfied for the payment. (The Aurora, 4 Rob., 218; The Merrimack, Kimmel & Albert's claim, 8 Cranch, 317; see The Marianna, 6 Rob., 24.) So even if the goods are stated in the invoice to belong to the claimants; yet if these papers are inclosed to the consignee as agents to the shippers, and are to be delivered to the claimants only upon conditions in the discretion of the agent, the property remains in the shippers. (The Merrimack, 8 Cranch, 317.) But if the goods are consigned to an agent of the shippers, but the invoice, &c., show them to be for the account of the claimants, and the invoice, &c., are, by the shippers, sent directly to the claimants, the possession of these documents gives them a title, and establishes the intention of the shipper to vest the property in the claimants at the time of the shipment. (The Merrimack, 34*] Messrs. *Wilkins' claim, 8 Cranch, 317.) So if the goods are shipped to the consignee unconditionally for the use of the claimants. (Id. Messrs. M'Kean & Woodland's claim, 8 Cranch, 317.) But if the goods are consigned to the agent of the shippers, and there are discretionary orders given, but no direction for an absolute delivery to the claimants, the property remains in the shippers. (The St. Joze Indiano, Lizaur's claim, 2 Gallis., S. C. ante, Vol. I., p. 208.) In all these cases the goods are supposed to have been purchased in pursuance of the orders of the claimants; for if they are sent by the shippers without orders, or contrary to, or different from orders, either in quantity or kind, the proprietary interest remains in the shipper during the transit, notwithstanding they are sent by direct consignment to the consignee. (The Venus, 8 Cranch, 258; The Frances, Dunham & Randolph's claim, 1 Gallis., 445; S. C., 8 Cranch, 354, 9 Cranch, 183; The Frances, French's claim, 8 Cranch, 359.)

It is certainly competent for an agent abroad, who purchases goods in pursuance of orders, to vest the proprietary interest in his principal, immediately on the purchase. This is the case when he purchases exclusively on the credit of the principal, or makes an absolute appropriation and designation of the property for his principal. But where he sells his own goods, or purchases goods on his own credit (and thereby in reality becomes the owner), no property in such goods vests in his correspondent until he has done some notorious act to divest himself of his title, or has parted with the possession by an actual and unconditional delivery for the use of such correspondent. (The St. Joze Indiano, 2 Gallis, S. C. ante, Vol. I., p. 208.) But such delivery or appropriation to the use of his correspondent need not be by a direct act, but it may constructively arise from the circumstances of the case, even where the shipper has made an intermediate assignment of the goods. (The Mary and Susan, ante, Vol. I., p. 25.)

In all these cases the material question is, whether the shipper retains or possesses any control over the property (independent of the mere right of stoppage in transitu in cases of insolvency), or has parted with the possession and all authority *over it. For if an [*35 enemy's shipper consign goods or money to his correspondent at H., for the purpose of answering drafts of his correspondent in A., without any letter of advice or document making it the absolute property of such correspondent, or putting it out of his own control, it still remains the property of the shipper, for he may at any time countermand the order, or give the goods or money a new direction. In substance it is the same transaction as if a person send a sum of money to his private banker, directing him to hold it subject to the order of A.; in which case, if on the next day, and before any such order had been given, or even the fact of lodgment known to the other party, he had changed his purpose, and directed a conversion of the money to another object, it is clear that the bankers could not resist with effect. (The Josephine, 4 Rob., 25.)

In respect to questions of illegal trade, little is necessary to be said in addition to the observations and cases cited in the former volume. It is a fundamental principle of prize law that all trade with the enemy is prohibited to all persons, whether natives, naturalized citizens, or foreigners domiciled in the country during the time of their residence, under the penalty of confiscation. (The Vigilantia, 1 Rob., 1, 14, 26; The Hoop, 1 Rob., 196; Potts v. Bell, 8 T. R., 548; The Rapid, 8 Cranch, 155; S. C. 1 Gallis., 295; The Alexander, 8 Cranch, 169; S. C. 1 Gallis., 532; The Joseph, 8 Cranch, 451; S. C. 1 Gallis., 545.)¹ *The same penalty [*36 is applied to subjects of allies in the war, trading with the common enemy. (The Nayside, 4

1.—Au surplus, l'intention de l'ordonnance, en exigeant que la police contienne, le nom et le domicile de celui qui se fait assurer—les effets sur lesquels l'assurance sera faite—le nom du navire, du lieu où les marchandises seront chargées, et déchargées, est encore de connoître en temps de guerre, si malgré l'interdiction de commerce qu'emporte toujours toute déclaration de guerre, les sujets du Roi ne font point commerce avec les ennemis de l'Etat, ou avec des amis ou alliés, par l'interposition desquels on feroit passer aux ennemis des munitions de guerre et de bouche, ou d'autres effets prohibés: car tout cela étant défendu, comme préjudiciable à l'Etat, seroit sujet à confiscation, et à être déclaré de bonne prise, étant trouvé, soit sur les navires de la nation, soit sur ceux des amis et alliés, comme il sera observé sur le tit. des Prises. Valin, sur l'Ordonnance, Liv. 3, tit. 6; Des Assurances, art. 3; Id., tit. 9; Des Prises, art. 7.

Rob., 251; The Neptunus, 6 Rob., 403; Bynk. Q. J. Pub. Ch. 10; Du Ponceau's edit., p. 81.) But a citizen of a belligerent country, domiciled in a neutral country, may lawfully trade with the enemy of his native country (The Danaos, 4 Rob., 255, note), with the exception of the case of trade in articles contraband of war. (The Neptunus, 6 Rob., 403; The Ann, 1 Dodson, 221.) And if the party intends to trade with the enemy, but during the voyage the port becomes neutral, the penalty is saved, for there must be the act as well as the intention. (The Abby, 5 Rob., 251.) And even assuming that after the knowledge of a war, a citizen domiciled in the enemy's country may lawfully withdraw his property without a license from his government which has been denied (The Mary, 1 Gallis., 620), at all events, it must be done in a reasonable time, and ten months after the war is too late, and the party will then be deemed engaged in a trade with the enemy. (The St. Lawrence, 1 Gallis., 467; S. C. 9 Cranch, 120.) And if a vessel take on board a cargo from an enemy's ship, under the pretense that it is ransomed, it is an illegal traffic. Even admitting the ransoming of captured property to be legal, it cannot be admitted to be made at any distance of time, and by any new voyages undertaken for this special purpose. (The Lord Wellington, 2 Gallis., 103.) And sailing under the enemy's license is deemed, per se, an efficient cause of condemnation. (The Julia, 1 Gallis., 594; S. C., 8 Cranch, 181; The Aurora, 8 Cranch, 203; The Hiram, 8 Cranch, 444; S. C. ante, Vol. I., p. 440. The Ariadne, ante, Vol. II., p. 143.)

These observations on the subject of proprietary interests may be concluded with the remark that to entitle the claimant to sustain his claim in the prize court the property must be proved to be neutral at all periods from the time of shipment, without intermission, to the arrival and subsequent sale in the port of the enemy. (The Atlas, 3 Rob., 299; The Sally, 4 Rob., note a.) And if it be hostile at the time of shipment, it is (as has been already stated) a universal rule to condemn it, although 37*]the owner has become a friend or subject. (The Boedes Lust, 5 Rob., 233.)

In this connection we might treat of the principles of international law respecting blockade, contraband of war (vide ante, vol. 1, p. 38-9, note i, p. 394, note m), engagements in the coasting and colonial trade of an enemy (vide ante, vol. 1, p. 507, Appendix, note 3), the right of search, the effect of resistance or rescue of neutral ships, and the circumstances of unneutral conduct, which are visited with a forfeiture of the ship or cargo, or both. These topics would lead us into a very enlarged inquiry, incompatible with the object of this summary sketch; but they deserve the attention of all students of the law of prize, and it is to be hoped that some eminent jurist will, hereafter, examine them with a diligence and learning proportioned to their importance. It may, however, be useful here to consider how far the illegal acts of the master bind the interests of the owner of the ship or cargo.

It is a general principle that the act of the master at all events binds the owner of the ship, as much as if the act were committed by himself. (The Vrouw Judith, 1 Rob. 150.) If, therefore, the master deviate into a blockaded port, the owner is bound by the act, and is not permitted to aver his ignorance of the act, or that the master acted against his orders. (The Adonis, 5 Rob., 256.) And the same principle is applied to the case of carrying goods contraband of war. (The Imina, 3 Rob., 167.) But Grotius (De J. B. et P., lib. 3, ch. 6, sec. 6), Loccenius (De Jur. Mar., lib. 2, ch. 4, no. 12), Pothier (De Propriété, no. 103), and Bynkershoek (Q. J. Pub., lib. 1, ch. 12, p. 97, Du Ponceau's Ed.), all contend for a favorable distinction where the owner is ignorant of the fact of unlawful goods being on board. They are, however, contradicted by Valin (Sur l'Ord., tom. 2, p. 253), and Emerigon (Des Assurances, tom. 1, p. 449), whose doctrine is followed in the practice of prize courts. The law, indeed, is established that the principal is answerable for the acts of his agent (and the master *is the [*38 accredited agent of the ship-owner), not only civilly but penally to the amount of the property entrusted to his care. (The Mars, 6 Rob., 79, 87.) It would be impossible for a court of prize to affect the proprietor in any other way; and, whatever the hardship may be, it is very much softened by recollecting that if he has sustained any injury by the fraudulent and unauthorized acts of his agent he will be entitled to his remedy against him. (The Mars, 6 Rob., 79, 87.) But the act of the master does not, in general, bind the owner of the cargo, unless he be owner of the ship, or consant of the intended violation of law, or the master be his agent. (The Vrouw Judith, 1 Rob., 150; The Imina, 3 Rob., 169; The Rosalie and Betty, 2 Rob., 343, 351; The Alexander, 4 Rob., 93; The Elsebe, 5 Rob., 173.) In cases of blockade the deviation into the blockaded port is presumed to be in the service of the cargo, and, therefore, the owner is bound by it, unless where there was no notice of the blockade at the time the ship sailed. (The Alexander, 4 Rob., 93; The Shepherdess, 5 Rob., 256.) And if the master at the time of sailing put his ship under convoy, whose instructions he is presumed to know, the act is illegal, and binds both the ship and cargo. (The Elsebe, 5 Rob., 173.) It is not considered like the case of an unforeseen emergency happening to a ship at sea, where the fact itself proves the owners to be ignorant and innocent, and where the court has held that being proved innocent by the very circumstances of the case, the owners of the cargo should not be bound by the mere principle of law, which imposes on the employer a responsibility for the acts of his agent. On the contrary, it is a matter done antecedently to the voyage, and must, therefore, be presumed to be done on communication with the owners, and with their consent; the effect of this presumption is such that it cannot be permitted to be averred against, inasmuch as all the evidence must come from the suspected parties themselves, without a possibility of meeting it, however prepared. The court, therefore, applies the strict principle of law, and holds, as it does in blockade cases of that description, that the master must be taken to be the authorized agent of the cargo, and that if he has exceeded his authority it is barratry, for which he ante, Vol. I, p. 159.) And in like manner to allow him his expenses. (The Hoop, 1 Rob., 196; The Bremen Flugge, 4 Rob., 90; The Der Mohr, 4 Rob., 314; Smart v. Wolff, 3 T. Rep., 323; Vattel, liv. 3, ch. 7, sec. 115; The Consolato del Mare, ch. 273; Sir W. Scott and Sir J. Nicholl's letter to Mr. Jay, ubi supra; The Copenhagen, 1 Rob., 289; The Anna Catharina, 6 Rob., 10; Katharina Elizabeth, Acton, 309; The Fortuna, Edw., 56.) The freight allowed is not, however, necessarily the rate agreed on by the parties, if it be inflated by extraordinary circumstances; but a reasonable freight only will, in such cases, be allowed. (The Twilling Riget, 5 Rob., 82.) And where the goods have been once unlivered by order of court, the whole freight for the voyage is due, and the owner of the goods, even in case of restitution, cannot demand the ship to reload them, and carry them to the original port of destination; for by the separation the ship is exonerated. (The Hoffnung, 6 Rob., 231; The Prosper, Edw., 72.) But it would be otherwise if there had been no unlivery. (The Copenhagen, 1 Rob., 289.) And the neutral will be allowed his freight where he carries the goods of one belligerent to its enemy, for though such a trade be illegal as to the subjects, it is not so as to neutrals. (The Hoop, 1 Rob., 196, 219.) So on a voyage from the port of one enemy to the port of another enemy. (The Wilhelmina, 2 Rob., 210, note.) But if the neutral has conducted himself fraudulently or unfairly, or in violation of belligerent rights, he will not be allowed freight or expenses, and in flagrant cases, will be visited with confiscation, even of the ship itself. And he is never allowed freight where he has used false papers (The Atlas, 3 Rob., 299, 304, note; Sir W. Scott and Sir J. Nicholl's letter to Mr. Jay, ubi supra); nor upon the carriage of contraband goods (Ib. Bynk. Q. J. Pub., Duponceau's ed., 81; The Sarah Christina, 1 Rob., 237; The Mercurius, 1 Rob., 288; The Emanuel, 1 Rob., 286; The Neptunus, 3 Rob., 108; The Neutralitet, 3 Rob., 295; The Oster Risoer, 4 Rob., 199; The Commercen, ante, Vol. I, p. 382); nor where there has been a spoilation of papers (The Rising Sun, 2 Rob., 55*) 104; *The Madonna del Burso, 4 Rob., 169, 183); nor where the cause of capture was the ship and not the cargo. (The Fortuna, 1 Edw., 56.) But where part of the goods are condemned as contraband and part restored, after unlivery of the cargo, freight may be decreed as a charge upon the part restored. (The Oster Risoer, 4 Rob., 199.) If the goods are unlivered under a hostile embargo upon neutral ships, they are discharged of the lien of the freight; and if freight be decreed, it can only be against the original consignees or freighters, and not against a prior purchaser, who has received them on bail. (The Theresa Bonita, 4 Rob., 236.)

When a decree is made that the freight shall be a charge on the cargo, application must be made to the court for the sale of so much as is necessary for this purpose. (The Vrow Margaretha, 4 Rob., 304, note.) In general, where a ship and cargo are restored, with a decree that the freight shall be a charge on the cargo, if the proceeds of the cargo are not sufficient to pay the freight, the captors are not responsible for the deficiency. (The Haabet, 4 Rob., 302.)

Wheat. 2.

But although the capture be right, yet if afterwards the cargo is lost by the negligence of the captors, and the freight be decreed a charge on the cargo, the captors are responsible to pay it. (The Der Mohr, 4 Rob., 314.) Where the freight of the neutral and the expenses of the captors are both decreed to be a charge on the cargo, and the proceeds are insufficient to discharge both, priority of payment of the freight is, in ordinary cases, allowed by the court, as a lien that takes place of all others. (The Bremen Flugge, 4 Rob., 90.)

In the next place, as to the allowance of freight to the captors. This may happen when the ship is hostile, and the cargo, or a part thereof, is neutral. The general rule is, that if neutral goods are found on board of a hostile ship, the captors are not entitled to freight therefor, unless they carry the goods to the port of destination. (Bynk. Q. J. Pub. l, 1, ch. 13; Du Ponceau's ed. p. 105; The Diana, 5 Rob., 67; The Fortuna, 1 Edw., 56.) And the rule is applied notwithstanding there may have been a sale of the goods beneficial to the owners. (The Vrow Anna Catharina, 6 Rob., 289; The Fortuna, 1 Edw., 56.) But there are exceptions to the rule itself; for if the captors bring the cargo to the country where [*56] the claimants ultimately designed to send it, but were compelled to take a circuitous route under existing circumstances, the captors are entitled to freight, notwithstanding the ship was actually destined to another country, there to land it. (The Diana, 5 Rob., 67.) So, if brought to the same country, but not to the port of actual destination. (The Vrow Henrietta, 5 Rob., 75, note. But see The Wilhelmina Eleonora, 3 Rob., 234.) So, where the goods are brought to the country where the proceeds were ultimately destined, and would have been brought directly, but for a prohibition of municipal law. (The Ann Green, 1 Gallis., 274.) Where freight is decreed to the captors, it will be paid by the court out of the cargo or its proceeds, if yet remaining in the admiralty. (The Fortuna, 4 Rob., 278.) And under particular circumstances, application may be made to the court to decree the sale of so much of the cargo as may be necessary to be sold for the discharge of freight. (4 Rob., 304, note.) And where freight is allowed to the captors, if they have done any damage to the cargo, the amount may be deducted by way of set-off or compensation. (The Fortuna, 4 Rob., 278.)

As to the allowance of costs and expenses. In cases where further proof is directed, costs and expenses are never allowed to the claimant. (The Einigheden, 1 Rob., 323.) Nor where the neutrality of the property does not appear by the papers on board and the preparatory evidence (Sir W. Scott and Sir J. Nicholl's letter to Mr. Jay, ubi supra; opinion of M. Portalis in The Statira, 2 Cranch, 102, note a); nor where papers are spoliated or thrown overboard, unless the act be produced by the captors' misconduct, as by firing under false colors (The Peacock, 4 Rob., 185); nor where the master or crew, upon the preparatory examinations, grossly prevaricate (Ib.); nor where any part of the cargo is condemned (The William, 6 Rob., 316);

nor where the ship comes from a blockaded port (The Frederick Malke, 1 Rob., 38; The Betsey, 1 Rob., 93; The Vrow Judith, 1 Rob., 150), nor if the ship be restored by consent, 57*] *without reserving the question of costs and expenses. (The Maria Poelona, 6 Rob., 236.) But in all these cases it is in the discretion of the court to allow the captors their costs and expenses. (Sir W. Scott and Sir J. Nicholl's letter to Mr. Jay, ubi supra.) And, in general, wherever the captors are justified in the capture, their costs and expenses are decreed to them by the court in case of restitution of property. (The Imina, 3 Rob., 167; The Principe, 1 Edw., 70.) Therefore, they are allowed where the original destination was to a blockaded port, although changed on hearing of the blockade (The Imina, 3 Rob., 167); where ships, even of our own country, are captured sailing under false papers (The Sarah, 3 Rob., 330); where the nature of the cargo is ambiguous as to contraband (The Twende Brodre, 4 Rob., 33; The Gute Gesellschaft Michael, 4 Rob., 94; The Christina Maria, 4 Rob., 166); and generally, in all cases of false papers (The Nostra Signora de Piedade Nova Aurora, 6 Rob., 41); and in all cases where further proof is required. (See The Frances, 1 Gallis., 445; The Apollo, 4 Rob., 158; The Mary, 9 Cranch, 126.) In cases where the captors' expenses are allowed, the expenses intended are such as are necessarily incurred in consequence of the act of capture. (The Catharine and Anna, 4 Rob., 39.) Such are the expenses of the captors' agent. (The Asia Grande, Edw., 45.) But not insurance made by the captors (The Catharine and Anna, 4 Rob., 39); nor expenses of transmitting a cargo from a colony to the mother country. (The Narcissus, 4 Rob., 17.) And property restored to the claimant is not to be charged with any expenses for agency, or for taking care of it, unless made a charge by the court. (The Asia Grande, 1 Edw., 45.) And the expense of an unlivery or delivery of the property which is restored is to be borne by the captors or releasing party, and not by the property, unless it is so directed by the court. (The Rendsborg, 6 Rob., 142.) In general, where the property is condemned, the expenses of unlivery and warehousing, &c., fall on the captors (The Industrie, 5 Rob., 88); and where it is restored, the court will apportion them in its discretion, on the captors and on the cargo. (The Industrie, 5 Rob., 88.)

58*] *In the cases of neutral ships, it is usual to allow the master his adventure and personal expenses, if his conduct has been fair and unimpeachable. (The Calypso, 2 Rob., 298; The Anna Catharina, 6 Rob., 10.) But where the master and crew prevaricate in their evidence, their adventures are never restored (The Anna Catharina, 4 Rob., 120); nor where the ship is engaged in a fraudulent trade. (The Christiansberg, 6 Rob., 876.)

final decree of condemnation (Per Croke, J., in The Herkimer, 2 Hall's Law Journ. 133, 146; S. C. Stewart, 128, 144; Home v. Camden, 2 H. Bl., 538), yet, as it may be asserted with legal propriety at any stage of the cause, it may be as well here to examine the doctrines which have been applied to this subject.

In respect to privateers, it is a general principle that no right to share as joint captors accrues merely by being in sight at the time when the prize is captured. There must be actual intimidation, or actual or constructive assistance. (Bynk. Q. J. Pub. lib. 1, ch. 18., and a learned note of Mr. Duponceau, in his translation, p. 144; Talbot v. Three Brigs, 1 Hall's Law Journ. 266; S. C. 1 Dall, 95; Martens on Capt. sec. 32, p. 91; The Santa Brigada, 3 Rob., 52; The Forsighied, 811; L'Amitié, 6 Rob., 261.)¹ And the same principle is applied to *captures in sight of fortresses, and [*59 of land forces, and armies, for they do not share, unless there be actual co-operation. (Bynk. Q. J. Pub., lib. 1, ch. 18., Duponceau's ed. p. 146; The Dordrecht, 2 Rob., 55.) And in such cases, the assistance ought to be material in order to entitle the parties to share as joint captors. (The Dordrecht, 2 Rob., 65.) The reason of this rule in relation to privateers is, that the being in sight is not sufficient with respect to them to raise the presumption of co-operation in the capture. They clothe themselves with commissions of war from views of private advantage only. They are not bound to put their commissions in use on every discovery of an enemy. And, therefore, the court does not presume in their favor, from the mere circumstance of their being in sight, that they were there with a design of contributing assistance, and engaging in the contest. There must be as to them the animus capiendi demonstrated by some overt act; by some variation of conduct, which would not have taken place, but with reference to that particular object, and if the intention of acting against the enemy had not been entertained. (L'Amitié, 6 Rob., 261; La Flore, 5 Rob., 268.) Formerly the principle of constructive assistance was carried a great way; but the later inclination of courts has been rather to restrain than to extend the rule. (The Vryheid, 2 Rob., 16; The Odin, 4 Rob., 318; La Furieuse, Stewart, 177.) And where no actual assistance is alleged, the presumption of law leans in favor of the actual captors. (The Robert, 3 Rob., 194.) But even with respect to privateers, it is not necessary that a joint chaser should actually board a prize; it will be enough if there is the animus persequendi sufficiently indicated by the conduct of the vessel. The act of chasing, therefore, if continued for any length of time, and not abandoned at the time of capture, will be sufficient to found a title of joint capture. (L'Amitié, 6 Rob., 261.) But if the chase be discontinued, it is otherwise. (Ib. The

1.—Aucun ne pourra être admis au partage d'un vaisseau pris sur les ennemis, s'il n'a contribué à l'arrêter, ou contracté société avec celui qui s'en est rendu maître. II. Celui qui prétend partager un vaisseau, ne sera point sensé avoir contribué à l'arrêter, s'il n'a combattu, ou s'il n'a fait tel effort, qu'en intimidant l'ennemi par sa présence, ou en lui coupant chemin, et l'empêchant de s'échapper, il l'ait obligé à se rendre, sans qu'il lui suffise d'avoir été en vue, et d'avoir donné chasse, lorsqu'il été inutile. Règlement du 27 sera prouvé que cette chasse aura Janv. 1708.

Waaksamheid, 3 Rob., 1.) And if a ship has actually engaged another, and been beaten off, and yet remains in sight about the enemy, with 60*] an evident intention *of persisting in the contest, and another vessel then comes up and makes the capture, the first is entitled to share in the capture. (La Virginie, 5 Rob., 124.)

Public policy has introduced a different rule as to public ships of war; and all such ships being in sight are deemed to be constructively assisting, and, therefore, entitled to share in the capture. (The Dordrecht, 2 Rob., 55; The Robert, 3 Rob., 194; The Foreigner, 3 Rob., 311; La Flore, 5 Rob., 268; The Bellona, Edw., 63; The Furieuse, Stewart, 177; The Sparkler, 1 Dodson, 359.)¹ The reason of this distinction is, that public ships are under a constant obligation to attack the enemy wherever seen; and, therefore, from the mere circumstance of being in sight, a presumption is sufficiently raised that they are there animo capiendi. In the case of privateers, the same obligation does not exist; the law, therefore, does not give them the benefit of the same presumption (La Flore, 5 Rob., 268.) Where the actual captor is a public armed ship, the rule is additionally supported by the obvious policy of promoting harmony in the service. But the rule equally applies where the actual captor is a privateer (La Flore, 5 Rob., 268); though the privateer in the converse case is not entitled to share, from merely being in sight. (The Santa Brigada, 3 Rob., 52.) There are exceptions, however, to the rule, where the circumstances of the case repel the presumption of the animus capiendi; such is the case where a public ship is in sight, but steering an opposite or different course in 61*] consistent with the notion of an intent *to capture. (The Robert, 3 Rob., 194; The Dree Gebroeders, 5 Rob. 339.) But the mere sailing on a different course is not sufficient to defeat a title of joint capture; for it is not necessary that the two ships should pursue the enemy in the same line. If one vessel sail in one direction, and the other in a different direction, with the purpose of capturing, that difference of course would not defeat a unity of purpose, nor destroy the claim of joint capture. (Le Niemen, 1 Dodson, 9.) But if the ship, claiming as joint captor, has changed her course, and discontinued the chase before the capture, the claim is defeated, unless this conduct be occasioned by the fraud or misconduct of the capturing ship; for then the court will let in the claim with a view to punish the fraud or misconduct. (The Waaksamheid, 3 Rob., 1; The Robert, 3 Rob., 194; La Virginie, 5 Rob., 124; The Dree Gebroeders, 5 Rob., 339.) So, if the persons claiming as joint captors, have reconnoitred the prize, and abandoned all design of capture, they are not entitled to share. (The Lord Middleton, 4 Rob., 153; The Dree Gebroeders, 5 Rob., 339; L'Amitié, 6 Rob., 261.)

But even with regard to public ships, cases of constructive assistance in joint capture are not to be extended, and, therefore, the court requires that the ship should be actually in sight. (The Vryheid, 2 Rob., 16; The Odin, 4 Rob., 318; The Furieuse, Stewart, 177.) Therefore, being in sight a day or two before the capture is not sufficient. It must be at the commencement of the engagement, or chase, or during its continuance. (The Vryheid, 2 Rob., 16.) And being in sight when the enemy was first descried, and being detached before the chase or preparations therefor, is not sufficient. (The Vryheid, 2 Rob., 16.) But it would be otherwise if detached in sight of the enemy at the moment of the chase, and under preparation for chase; for there must be some actual contribution of endeavor as well as of general intention. (The Vryheid, 2 Rob., 16.) And it would seem to be very doubtful whether the prize being seen from the mast head would bring the case within the rule of being in sight. (The Robert, 3 Rob., 194.) And a like rule is applied to the capitulation of an island; for to entitle a public ship to share in the capture she must not be detached upon another service, *but must be actually in sight at the [*62 time. (The Island of Trinidad, 5 Rob., 92.) And no antecedent or subsequent services in the expedition will help the case where the party would not otherwise be entitled to share. (Buenos Ayres, 1 Dodson, 28.) In respect also to a joint chase, if both ships are in chase without any common co-operation, except such as the two parties acting separately, with a common object in view, might produce, and during the chase night comes on, and the enemy is lost sight of, and the ships still are in pursuit, but one of them cruising merely in search, and from conjecture adopts an erroneous course, and in consequence thereof the prize is captured either by the other or by a third ship on the next day, out of sight, the ship so erroneously cruising is not entitled to share as a joint captor, for it is a discontinuance of the chase to change a course upon conjecture. (Le Niemen, 1 Dodson, 9; The Financier, 1 Dodson, 61.) Nor will it vary the case that the position or course run by such ship had the effect of throwing the prize into the hands of the other ship, by inducing the prize to alter her own course. (Ib.) It would, indeed, be an extravagant position to admit that every fleet or ship which, either by accident or design, diverts the course of an enemy, and by so doing occasions her capture by a totally distinct force, should be considered as a joint captor. (Le Niemen, 1 Dodson, 9.) It is certainly true that darkness preventing sight will not universally exclude from a right to share; nor can the rule be laid down universally the other way; for there may not in every case be evidence to show the proximity to the scene of action. Where it can be shown that the asserted joint captor was in sight when the darkness came on, and that it continued steering the same course, by which it was before nearing the prize, and that the prize itself also continued the same course, it amounts almost to demonstration that the ships would have seen, and 1—Si plusieurs vaisseaux ont part à une même prise, et par vaisseaux preneurs sont entendus ceux qui se seront trouvés ensemble et à vue de la prise lorsqu'elle aura été faite, ou faisant partie d'une même escadre, le montant de ce qui reviendra à chaque vaisseau, frégat et autre bâtiment de Sa Majesté, sera constaté sur la proportion du nombre de leur canons en batterie et de leur calibre, à commencer par celui de quarte livres et au dessus, et du nombre d'équipage étant à bord de chaque vaisseau; et cette proportion ainsi établie, la répartition de ce qui reviendra à chaque vaisseau, sera faite sur le pied qui est prescrit dans l'article précédent. Ordonnance du Roi, concernant les prises faites par les vaisseaux, frégates et autres bâtimens de S. M. du 15 Juin, 1757.

been seen by each other, at the time of capture, if darkness had not intervened; and, in such case it ought to be let in to the benefit of joint capture. (The Union, 1 Dodson, 346.) But if the chase is lost sight of in the night, and the capture is afterwards made at such a distance that the asserted joint captor would not at the time of capture have been in sight even if it 63 had been day, the claim of joint capture cannot be sustained. Indeed, Sir W. Scott has declared that where a ship is lost sight of, in the night, the pursuit of that ship cannot properly be denominated a chase; it is a conjectural pursuit only; it is a feeling about in the dark, a search and inquiry, but no chase. (The Financier, 1 Dodson, 61.) And where a ship is herself only a constructive captor, it is not a sufficient ground to let in another ship that she had joined in a previous chase with the constructive captor, and lost sight of the prize in the night. (The Financier, 1 Dodson, 61.) Therefore, in a case where one or two joint chasers were ordered to pick up the boats of the other, and in consequence of the delay occasioned by her obedience to those orders she lost sight of the prize, which was in the meantime captured by a third ship coming up in the presence of the other, it was held that the ship so out of sight was not entitled to share. (The Financier, 1 Dodson, 61.) A revenue cutter, though having a letter of marque, is not considered in England as a public ship of war entitled to the benefit of the rule of constructive assistance from being in sight. (The Bellona, 1 Edw., 68.) A convoying ship, notwithstanding her special employment, may be entitled as a joint captor, if by chase or intimidation she aid in the capture, when it does not interfere with convoy duty. (The Waaksamheid, 3 Rob., 1; La Furie, 3 Rob., 9.) In captures made by boats it is a general rule that the ships to which they belong are entitled to share. (The Anna Maria, 3 Rob., 211; The Odin, 4 Rob., 318.) But if a boat be detached from the ship to which she belongs, and attached to another, the ship only shares to which she is attached at that time; for she must be taken at that time, and in those operations to be acting under the authority and for the benefit of such ship only. (The Melomane, 5 Rob., 41.) But constructive assistance by boats will not entitle the ships to which they belong to share in the prize, though actual capture by the boats would be sufficient for this purpose; for they are a part of the force of the ship. And in cases of mere constructive assistance the right of participation must be in proportion to the intimidation caused, and cannot go beyond the force actually seen by the enemy. (La Belle Coquette, 1 Dodson, 18; The 64 Odin, 4 Rob., 318; The Nancy, 4 Rob., 327, note a.) And it is extremely questionable whether a boat of a ship of war could support a title to share on the mere principle of being in sight. In the case of mere constructive capture, the construction which is laid upon the supposed intimidation of the enemy, and the encouragement of the friend, from a ship of war being seen or in sight, applies very weakly to the case of a boat, an object that attracts very little notice upon the water, and whose character even if discerned by either of the parties may be totally unknown to both. (The Odin, 4 Rob., 318.) Nor will the fact that the ship to which the boat belongs is in sight lying at anchor in a harbor, entitle the ship to share. (The Odin, 4 Rob., 318; The Nancy, 4 Rob., 327, note a; La Belle Coquette, 1 Dodson, 18.)

In respect to captures made by ships which are associated in the same service, or are engaged in a joint enterprise under the orders of the same superior officer, it is a general rule that they are entitled to share in each other's prizes, made while in such service or joint enterprise. (The Forsigheid, 3 Rob., 311; The Guillaume Tell, Edw., 6; The Empress, 1 Dodson, 368.) Therefore, if one ship of a squadron takes a prize in the night, unknown to the rest, it will entitle the whole fleet to share, although, possibly, the capture may have been made at a distance out of sight of most of the ships of war, even if it had been noonday, for the fleet so associated is considered as one body, unless detached by orders, or entirely separated by accident; and what is done by one, continuing to compose in fact a part of the fleet, enures to the benefit of all. (The Forsigheid, 3 Rob., 311, S. C. Edw., 124.) Where a fleet is employed in a blockade, the service is considered as joint, and all the ships are entitled to share in all captures, although all the ships have not joined in the chase, and the capture has been made after the chase, at a great distance from the blockaded port. (The Guillaume Tell, Edw., 6; The Forsigheid, Edw., 124.) But if a part of the fleet be detached on a separate service, or if the capture be not within the purposes for which they were associated, then the rest of the fleet, not actually or constructively assisting in the capture, are not entitled to share. (The Forsigheid, 3 Rob., 311; The Nordsten, cited in the Forsigheid, Edw., [65 124, 127; S. C. 1 Acton, 128; The Island of Trinidad, 5 Rob., 92; The Stella del Norte, 5 Rob., 349.) And this rule applies to all detachments for some distinct and separate purpose, which, though possibly connected with the main service, carries the detached ships out of the scene of the common operations for the time. (The Forsigheid, 3 Rob., 311.) But if they are only sent to look out, and they preserve their connection with the fleet, and maintain their dependence upon it, and keep within signal distance, this is not a detached service. It is more like stretching one of the arms of the fleet without dissolving, in any manner, the connection between them and the main body. (The Forsigheid, 3 Rob., 311.) In respect to transports, mere association in service is not sufficient to entitle them to share as constructive joint captors; but for this purpose they must actually acquire a military character, and must be employed in military operations, and there must be an animus capiendi, while so employed. (The Cape of Good Hope, 2 Rob., 274.) It is not sufficient that the enemy may have been intimidated by their presence. Mere intimidation may be produced without any co-operation having been given or intended. If a frigate were going to attack an enemy's vessel, and four or five large merchant ships, unconscious of the transaction, should appear in sight, they might be objects of terror to the enemy, but no one would say that such terror would entitle them to share. Though the fact of terror were ever so strongly proved, there would not be that co-operation which the law requires to entitle non-commissioned vessels to be considered as joint captors. (Ib.) But if non-commissioned ships chase, animo capiendi, they are entitled to share if the capture be made by their contribution in this service. (The Three Gesuster, and Le Franc, cited 2 Rob., 284, 285, notes a, b.)

As to conjunct operations by land and naval forces, how far the former are permitted to share in prizes made by the latter, where no express provision is made by statute, depends upon the circumstances of the case. A mere general co-operation in the same general objects would not be sufficient. (The Stella del Norte, 5 Rob., 349.) But an actual co-operation in the [66*] particular capture is clearly sufficient. (Ib. The Dordrecht, 2 Rob., 55.)

If the fleet of an ally and our own fleet serve together under our commander, who detaches the squadron of the ally, the latter is not entitled to share in captures subsequently made. But if an ally actually co-operates in effecting a capture, he is entitled to share as a joint captor; but the question whether he is a joint captor or not, is a question of which courts of common law have no jurisdiction, and which belongs exclusively to the admiralty. (Duckworth v. Tucker, 2 Taunt., 7.)

As to the manner in which claims of joint capture are to be asserted. It has been already stated that it is usual not to file such claims before a decree of condemnation; but if they are not filed before a decree ascertaining who are the captors, and who are entitled to share, and especially after a distribution decreed, it is too late to assert the right. (See The Stella del Norte, 5 Rob., 349; Duckworth v. Tucker, 2 Taunt., 7; Home v. Camden, 2 H. Bl., 533.) But if the sentence below be suspended by an appeal, it seems that a joint claim may be interposed upon the appeal. (Home v. Camden, 2 H. Bl., 533; The Nostra Signora de los Dolores, 1 Acton, 262; The Soci  t  , 9 Cranch, 209.) It is, however, best to interpose such claims at an earlier stage of the proceedings, and before any decree of condemnation has passed in any court.

A question of joint capture is never permitted to be settled by affidavits. It must be brought forward by a regular allegation, containing a statement of the facts; and if the allegation contain such facts as, if proved, may entitle the parties to share, the court direct it to be admitted and filed; and, thereupon, the actual captors are entitled to file a counter allegation; and the cause is then regularly to be sustained by proofs to be taken and established as in other causes, that is to say, by documentary proofs, and the depositions of competent witnesses. (The Urania, 5 Rob., 148; La Virginie, 5 Rob., 124.) If, indeed, upon the statement made in the original allegation, the claim cannot, in point of law, be sustained, the court will not inquire into the facts, but reject the application in limine. (The Waaksamheid, 3 Rob., 1.) The [67*] case, however, must be very clear, *where this course is adopted. When the claim of joint capture is admitted to proof, the onus probandi lies on the asserted joint captor. (The Union, 1 Dodson, 346; The John, 1 Dodson, 363.) The single evidence of witnesses on board of the claiming ship, though they release their right, is never deemed sufficient to establish the fact of joint capture; it must be corroborated by evidence aliunde, or it will be rejected. (The Fadrelandet, 5 Rob., 120; La Flore, 5 Rob., 268; The John, 1 Dodson, 63.) If, at the moment of capture, the capturing ship admits the fact of joint capture, it is conclusive, unless there be some circumstance invalidating the admission. (The San Jose, 6 Rob., 244.) And if the asserted joint captors expressly renounce all claim to the prize at the time of capture, their claim is entirely waived, though, from subsequent circumstances, they may be disposed to assert it. (The William and Mary, 4 Rob., 381.)

In case of joint captures by public ships, the rule as to the proportion in which they are to share is established generally by statute. This is fixed in the United States by the act of the 22d April, 1800, ch. 33, which provides that the capturing ships shall share "according to the number of men and guns on board each ship in sight." In respect to privateers, no statute regulation exists; and by the general rule of the prize law, they are to share in proportion to their relative strength. (Bynk. Q. J. Pub., lib. 1, ch. 18, Du Ponceau's ed., p. 164.) This relative strength is, by the law of Great Britain and the United States, ascertained by the number of men on board of such ship assisting in the capture. (Roberts v. Hartley, Doug., 311; The Despatch, 2 Gallis., 1.) Such, too, is the rule where an ally co-operates in the capture. (Duckworth v. Tucker, 2 Taunt., 7.) And the same rule seems applicable to the case of a joint capture by a public ship and a private ship of war; and this, whether the latter be commissioned or not. (The Three Gesuster, 2 Rob., 284; Le Franc, 2 Rob., 285.)

*Upon the hearing of the proofs, if the [68 case does not require or admit further proof, the court proceeds to pronounce a sentence of acquittal or condemnation, as the justice of the case requires. And it may proceed to make its decree as well after as before the death of the parties; for in proceedings in rem the suit does not abate by the death or absence of all or any of the parties named in the proceedings. (Penhallon v. Doane, 3 Dall., 54, 86, 117; The Falcon, 6 Rob., 194, 199.) It may be proper in many cases, where all the parties on either side are dead, not to proceed to make a decree in rem without serving a monition upon the representatives of the deceased party to appear and pursue or defend his rights. And where the decree is in personam the court will generally require that the representative should be duly cited to appear to protect his interests, so far as they may be affected by the decree. (Vide The Nostra Signora de los Dolores, 1 Dodson, 290.) It is, indeed, the duty of the court to take notice of all interests that result from evidence before it, and not to suffer any persons to be precluded from their just demands from want of notice of any facts that appear in the course of the proceedings. (The Maria Francaise, 6 Rob., 282.) And where parties are not formally before the court, it acts as a general guardian of all interests which are brought to its notice. (Ib.) Indeed, in the common cases of condemnations, the enemy proprietor is necessarily absent by operation of law; and yet the sentence is completely valid, as well against him as against all the world. (The Falcon, 6 Rob., 194, 199.) To give validity, therefore, to decrees in rem, it is not necessary that the adverse parties should be before the court. (Ib.)

When a sentence is pronounced, either of acquittal or condemnation, it is, in general, by an interlocutory decree. An interlocutory decree is proper in all cases, where anything further remains to be done by the court, as in ascertaining damages in cases of illegal capture, or in deciding who are captors, after deciding that the property is to be condemned. The right to decide who are captors entitled to distribution, belongs exclusively to the prize court, and its adjudication cannot be examined by a court of common law (Home v. Camden, 69*] 2 H. Bl., 533; 4 T. Rep., 382; Duckworth v. Tucker, 2 Taunt., 7); and no title vests in the captors until the final adjudication of the prize court. (Ib.) In England the usual practice is to acquit or condemn by interlocutory decree in all cases (Marriott's Form, 194, 196); and a definitive sentence is reserved until all other questions and interests are finally disposed of. (Ib. 198, 203.) In the United States it is more common to reserve a decree until a final decision of all the questions before the court; but there can be no doubt of the propriety of an adherence to the English practice, where the circumstances of the case require a suspension of a final sentence, although the propriety of an acquittal or condemnation is perfectly clear. And in case of an acquittal or condemnation by interlocutory decree there can be no question that an appeal immediately lies to the proper Appellate Court by the parties affected by that decree; for as to them it is an interlocutory having the effect of a final decree.

In respect to cases of acquittal. This may be either with or without damages and costs, or upon the terms of paying costs and expenses. In either case where the damages or expenses are uncertain, and to be ascertained, the court itself may proceed directly to assess them. (The Lively, 1 Gallis, 315.) But the usual practice is, to refer it to commissioners to hear the parties, examine their statements and accounts, and to report to the court in detail, such allowance as they think equitably or legally due to the parties. Accompanying the report, the reasons of the commissioners for the allowance or disallowance of any particular item are usually given; and the report, when returned to the court, is heard upon exceptions by the parties substantially, though not formally, as in a suit in chancery; for the prize court almost always proceeds as in summary suits, and not as in plenary suits, in the civil law.

When restitution is decreed, if the property remains specifically in the custody of the court, a warrant issues for the delivery, to the claimant; and in such case, unless it is otherwise ordered by the court, the expenses of the delivery are to be borne by the captors. (The Rendborg, 6 Rob., 142.) If the proceeds of the property are in court, an order for delivery is usually made by the court; and after a decree 70*] of restitution, the captors have no right to arrest the proceeds in the registry of the court by a caveat; that can only be done by an application to the court itself. (The Fortuna, 4 Rob., 278.) If the proceeds are in the hands of the captors or their agents, a monition, and, if necessary, an attachment, issues to them to bring in the proceeds. But where the captors have not conducted unfairly, on restitution decreed, they will not be held answerable for more than the proceeds, although the sale made was less than the original value of the property. (The Two Susannahs, 2 Rob., 152.) The property upon a decree of restitution may be delivered to the master as agent of the shipper, for in such case the master is the agent of the shipper, and is answerable to him. (Sir W. Scott and Sir J. Nicholl's letter to Mr. Jay, ubi supra.) But in such a case neither the master nor any other prize-agent can claim the property against his principal, unless so far as to cover his expenses; and the court will thus far protect his rights; but when his expenses and his liens on the property are discharged, the court will deliver it directly to the principle upon his own application. (The Franklin, 4 Rob., 404; The St. Lawrence, 2 Gallis, 19.) After a decree for restitution of partnership property to a foreign house in solidum, the court will not sever the property merely because one partner is a bankrupt here; but if the assignees had put in a claim for this purpose before a decree, it would be otherwise. (The Jefferson, 1 Rob., 325.)

Where damages are decreed, the decree is either against the parties by name or by a description of their relation to the ship. Where a decree is against the owners of a privateer generally, a monition issues against them personally, to pay the damages assessed; and it may also issue against the sureties to the bond given on taking out the commission. In a court of the law of nations, a person may be considered as a part owner, though his name has not been inserted in the bill of sale, or ship's register; and the representatives of a person so deemed a part owner is responsible for costs and damages decreed against the owners generally, though the party of whom he is the representative was not the actual wrong-doer. (The Nostra Signora de los Dolores, 1 Dodson, 290.) And, as has been already *stated, a part owner [*71 is not exempted from being a party to a suit for the proceeds, by having a release from the claimant for his share. (The Karasun, 5 Rob., 291.)

In respect to cases of condemnation. Where an interlocutory decree of condemnation passes in favor of a privateer, it seems to be usual in England to deliver that decree with a proper commission to the master of the privateer, to make sale of the prize, and to return an account into court. (Semble, The Venus, 6 Rob., 285.) But in the United States, all sales of prizes, before, as well as after condemnation, are made by the marshal; and in respect to sales after condemnation, this practice is further enforced by the statute of January 27th, 1813, ch. 155. (new edit. ch. 478.)

It has been already stated that no right vests in the captors until after a final sentence of condemnation, and that the right to decide who are the captors entitled to distribution, belongs exclusively to the prize court, and cannot be entertained in a court of common law. (Duckworth v. Tucker, 2 Taunt., 7; Home v. Camden, 2 H. Bl., 533.) When the case is pronounced to be a case of condemnation, the next question therefore is, to whom it is to be condemned. This generally depends upon the question whether the capturing ship be a commissioned or non-commissioned ship; and, if the former, whether a public or private armed vessel; and, in each of these cases, questions as to the rights of asserted joint captors may also arise before the court. Captures or seizures may also take place in port; or be made on land by conjunct land and naval forces; and in these cases questions may arise as to the right of the army and navy to share in the prizes or booty.

It is an elementary principle of prize law that all rights of prize belong originally to the government (The Melomane, 4 Rob., 41); and the beneficial interests derived to others can proceed only from the grant of the government; and therefore all captures wherever made enure to the use of the government, unless they have been granted away. (The Elaebe, 5 Rob., 173; Sterling v. Vaughan, 11 East, 619; The Maria Francaise, 6 Rob., 282; The Joseph, 1 Gallis, 545.) In cases of public armed ships, duly commissioned for the capture, the condemnation *is always to the government, but the proceeds are to be distributed according to the act of the 23d April, 1800, ch. 33, s. 5 and 6. In cases of privateers duly commissioned for the capture, condemnation is, by the prize act of the 26th of June, 1812, ch. 107, to the owners, officers, and crew of the privateer, and the proceeds are to be distributed according to the regulations of the same statute. But captors, even though duly commissioned, may forfeit their rights of prize by misconduct; and this, independent of any statutable provision, by the old-established law of the admiralty. (La Reine des Anges, Stewart, 9; The Cossack, Stewart, 513, 517; The Herkimer, Stewart, 128; S. C., 2 Hall's Am. Law Journ., 133; The Clarissa, cited in Stewart, 144, and 2 Hall's Am. Law Journ., 145.) And an obstinate neglect or refusal to comply with the instructions of the government, or the regulations of the prize act, have been held sufficient to authorize an infliction of the forfeiture; and, in such case, the prize is condemned to the government. (ib. The Bothnea & Jahnstoft, 2 Gallis, 78, 92.) So, the unlawful rescue of the prize by the captors from the custody of the court. (The Cossack, Stewart, 513.) And where the claimant has not affected his property with a hostile character, as by a trade with the enemy, &c.; but has been engaged in some other traffic, contravening the municipal law of his own country, so that he cannot entitle himself to a restitution of the property, it will be condemned to the government, and not to the captors. (The Walsingham Packet, 2 Rob., 77; The Etrusco, 4 Rob., 262, note; The Venus, 8 Cranch, 277, 287.)

In cases of non-commissioned ships, and ships commissioned against one enemy, having no commission against another whose property is captured, the captors are not entitled to any share in the prize, and the property is to be condemned to the government, or to its special grantee, if any such exist. Bynkershoek, indeed, contends, that if a non-commissioned ship is attacked, and captures the assailant in her own defense, the officers and crew are solely entitled to the prize; and this doctrine seems also to be supported by Grotius. (Bynk. Q. J. Pub., lib. 1, ch. 20, Du Ponceau's ed., 155 to 161; Grotius de J. B. et P. lib. 3, ch. 6, s. 10.) However, the general prize law 73] of France, Great Britain, and the United States, is as has been above stated. (Du Ponceau's Bynk., p. 162, note d; 1 Valin, Sur l'Ord. tom. 1, p. 79; The Haase, 1 Rob., 286; The Rebecca, 1 Rob., 227; The Amor Parentum, 1 Rob., 303; The Two Gesuster, 2 Rob., 284, note a; The Melomane, 5 Rob., 41; The Joseph, 1 Gallis, 545.) If, at the time of a capture by a letter of marque, the master of the capturing vessel be not on board, the capture is considered as made without a commission, and it enures to the government, or its special grantee. (The Charlotte, 5 Rob., 280.) And if a capture be made by a cutter fitted out by a captain of a man-of-war as a tender, and manned from his ship, but without any authority or commission, it is deemed to be made by a non-commissioned vessel, and the capture will not enure to the benefit of the man-of-war. It would be otherwise if the tender were attached to the ship by public authority; for then the ship would share. (The Melomane, 5 Rob., 41; The Charlotte, 5 Rob., 280; Capture of Curraçoa, 4 Rob., 282, note a; The Dos Hermanos, ante, 76.) And if persons in the navy, land from their ships and man a fort, and thereby compel a ship to strike as prize, it is considered as a capture made at sea by a force upon land, which is a non-commissioned capture. (The Rebecca, 1 Rob., 227.) But it would be otherwise if the place on shore were a resort for naval purposes by persons in the navy only, for then it may be deemed a stationary tender, rather attached to, and dependent upon, the vessels, then having the vessels attached to, and dependent upon it. (ib.) If a foreign cartel ship be engaged in trade, it is contrary to the duties of the ship, and the goods will be condemned to the government. (La Rosine, 2 Rob., 372.) And the cartel ship also, if belonging to our own citizens, will, if the trading has been very gross, be condemned also. (The Venus, 4 Rob., 355.)

In England, by very ancient grants from the crown, the Lord High Admiral has the benefit of all captures made at sea by non-commissioned vessels, and also of all captures by whomsoever made, of all ships and goods coming or already come into ports, creeks or roads of England and Ireland, by stress of weather or other accident, or by mistake of port, or by ignorance, not knowing *of the war; and also of all [*74 derelicts. But the crown has still reserved to itself all such ships and goods as shall be seized in port before any declaration of war, or reprisals; and also all such as shall voluntarily come in, upon revolt from the enemy, and as shall be driven or forced into port by the king's men-of-war. (The Rebecca, 1 Rob., 227 and 230, note a; The Gertruyda, 2 Rob., 211; The Melomane, 5 Rob., 22; The Maria Francaise, 6 Rob., 282; The Joseph, 1 Gallis, 545.) The office of Lord High Admiral has for more than a century past been put in commission. But as the office is still considered to have a legal existence, though now residing in the person of the king, the right and perquisites of that office are still distinguished as they were anciently, and are ascertained by an observance of the ancient rules, with the same exactness as if the proceeds were carried in the ancient and distinct course. (The Gertruyda, 2 Rob., 211; The Maria Francaise, 6 Rob., 282.) Hence arises the well-known distinction of condemnation to the king jure coronæ, and to the king in his office of admiralty, as droits of admiralty; the former applying in all cases where the crown is still entitled to the prize property, in virtue of its sovereignty and inherent prerogatives; the latter applying to all cases where the same belongs to the office of Lord High Admiral.

In the United States, strictly speaking, there are no droits of admiralty; for all prizes, to which no persons can entitle themselves by a public or private commission of war, are condemnable to the government itself in its sovereign capacity. (The Joseph, 1 Gallis., 545.) But the phrase droits of admiralty is often used in legal adjudications in the United States, as equivalent to condemnations to the United States, in virtue of their general sovereignty and prerogative, as enforced in the courts of admiralty.

But although non-commissioned persons cannot, by making a capture, entitle themselves to the benefits of prize, yet where their conduct has been fair in all cases of condemnations as droits of admiralty, the prize court will, in its discretion, award them a recompense; and even in some cases will award them the whole value of the prize, where there has been great personal gallantry and merit. (The Haase, 1 Rob., 75*] 286; The Amor Parentum, 1 Rob., 303.) It is not necessary to enumerate at large the various cases in which property is deemed a droit of admiralty, or a prize to the government jure coronæ. The preceding authorities will be found to contain almost all the learning on the subject.

It being ascertained who are the captors, and that they are duly commissioned, the next subject is, the distribution of the prize proceeds; and this is regularly to be done by the prize court having possession of the cause. (The St. Lawrence, 2 Gallis., 19.) Regularly, there should be a decree of distribution; and neither any officer of the court nor any prize-agent, having prize proceeds in his hands, can be safe in distributing them without a decree to this effect. (Kean v. The Brig Gloucester, 2 Dall., 36; Penhalow v. Doane, 3 Dall., 54; The Herkimer, Stewart, 128; S. C. 2 Hall's Am. Law Journ., 133.) And the prize court have a most unquestionable and exclusive jurisdiction to decree a distribution, either upon its own motion or upon the application of the parties interested. (Kean v. The Brig Gloucester, 2 Dall., 36; Bingham v. Cabot, 3 Dall., 19; Home v. Camden, 1 H. Bl., 476, 524; S. C., 2 H. Bl., 633; 4 T. Rep., 382; Duckworth v. Tucker, 2 Taunt., 7.) Nor can any person claim a share in a prize whose claim has not been admitted and supported in the prize court. (Duckworth v. Tucker, 2 Taunt., 9.)

In respect to public ships, the distribution is to be made according to the act of Congress of April 23d, 1800, ch. 33, s. 5 and s. 6. Besides the officers and crew of the capturing ship, the commander of the fleet or squadron is entitled to one-twentieth, which is called the flag twentieth. In England, the commander of the fleet or squadron is entitled to a flag eighth. Many cases have arisen in England as to the circumstances under which the commander is or is not entitled to share. These cases are collected in a recent decision in our own courts, to which the reader is referred. (Decatur v. Chew, 1 Gallis., 506.) And to the authorities there collected may be added the *following: The Dio- [76 mede, 1 Acton, 69, 239; Gardner v. Lyne, 13 East, 574; Drury v. Gardner, 2 Maule & Selwyn, 150; Duncan v. Mitchell, 4 Maule & Selwyn, 105. Upon the construction of our own act, it has been held that the commander of a squadron, to whose command a ship of war is attached, and under whose orders she sails, is entitled to the flag twentieth of all prizes made by such ship, although the other part of such squadron may never have sailed on the cruise, in consequence of a blockade by a superior force; and that to deprive such a commander of his flag twentieth on account of his having left his station under the act, it is indispensable that some local limits should have been assigned to him. (Decatur v. Chew, 1 Gallis., 506.) And it seems that a person acting by regular authority as commander of a ship pro tempore, though not commissioned as such, is entitled to the commander's share of all prizes taken. (Pill v. Taylor, 11 East, 414.) And the captain of a ship, actually on board at the time of a capture, is entitled to prize money, though under arrest at the time, and though another officer had been sent on board to command the ship. (Lumby v. Sutton, 8 T. R., 224.) But to entitle a person to share as an officer of the ship under the prize act, he should not only be on board, but also an officer of, and attached to the ship, and not a mere passenger. (The Nostra Signora del Carmen, 6 Rob., 302; See Wemys v. Linzee, Doug., 324; Lumley v. Sutton, 8 T. R., 224.) But soldiers who are on board a public ship are, under the English prize act, entitled to share, although they are invalided, and returning home in the capturing ship. (The Alert, 1 Dodson, 236.) And even passengers, under the expression in our prize act, as well as the English prize act, are entitled to share in the lowest class of distribution, as "persons doing duty on board." (The Alert, 1 Dodson, 236; Wemys v. Linzee, Doug., 324.)

Besides the prize proceeds, by the act of April 23d, 1800, ch. 33, s. 7, a bounty is given of $20 for each person on board any ship of an enemy at the commencement of an action, which shall be sunk or destroyed by any ship of the United States of equal or inferior force, to be divided among the officers and crew as prize money. No legal adjudications have as yet taken place on this clause of the act. But under *the [77 British act giving this bounty, or head-money, as it is called, it has been decided that head-money is not due when the captured ship was not a duly-commissioned ship of war (Several Dutch Schuyts, 6 Rob., 48); that constructive joint captors are not entitled to head-money (L'Alerte, 6 Rob., 238); that it is not due for British prisoners on board of the captured ships (The San Joseph, 6 Rob., 331); but is due for all the crew on board at the time of the attack, although some afterwards escape. (The Babillion, Edw., 39.) Head-money is also due whether the surrender has been produced by actual combat or not; but it is never granted unless the act of capture or of destruction is consummated. (La Clorinde, 1 Dodson, 436; L'Elise, 1 Dodson, 442.) The military character of a hostile vessel is not so lost by capture and recapture as to extinguish the right to head-money. (The Matilda, 1 Dodson, 367.)

In respect to privateers, the prize act of June 26th, 1812, ch. 107, s. 4, gives the whole proceeds, after condemnation, and deducting duties and other public charges, to the captors, according to any written agreement among them; and if there be no written agreement, then one moiety to the owners, and the other moiety to the crew, to be distributed as nearly as may be among the officers and crew as in cases of public ships. A mariner who has engaged for the cruise, but is by sickness and other inevitable casualty prevented from doing duty on the cruise, is entitled to share; but it would be otherwise if the disability occurred during the cruise. (Ex-parte Giddings, 2 Gallis., 56.) And if one of the crew be illegally turned on shore during the cruise, he is entitled to share in all the prizes made during the cruise. (Kean v. The Brig Gloucester, 2 Dall., 36.) And the persons of the crew who are put on board of prizes are entitled to share in all subsequent prizes made by the privateer, and so in the converse case, the privateer will share in the prizes made by any prize vessel after capture. (The Frederick and Mary Ann, 6 Rob., 213; The Brutus, 2 Gallis.) Agreements between the owners and officers of two privateers to share in all prizes are valid; but the master and officers have no authority to make such an agreement without the consent of the owners. (Bynk. Q. J. Pub., lib. 1, ch. 18; Du Ponceau's ed., p. 139, 141.)

78*] *When a distribution has been decreed, it often becomes necessary, in order to perfect the decree of the court, where the proceeds are in the hands of prize-agents, or of officers of the court, to institute a suit to compel the proper parties to come in and account for the proceeds, and make due distribution. And for this purpose a suit may be maintained in the prize court by any party interested, or by any representative of the party, or by any assignee duly entitled. (The St. Lawrence, 2 Gallis., 19; The Brutus, Ib.) Where the cause is in possession of an appellate court, the application may be made there, by a supplementary intervention, or petition; or it may be made by a direct original suit in personam, brought in the District Court. (Ib., Home v. Camden, 1 H. Bl., 474, 524; S. C., 2 H. Bl., 533; Willis v. Commissioners, &c., 4 T. R., S. C., 5 East, 22; The Noyse, 7 Ves., 593; Smart v. Wolff, 3 T. R., 323; Bingham v. Cubot, 3 Dall., 19; Kean v. Brig Gloucester, 2 Dall., 36; The Pomona, 1 Dodson, 25; The Herkimer, Stewart, 128; S. C., 2 Hall's Am. Law Journ., 133.) And it is a general principle that the power of the prize court subsists after a general adjudication to compel captors and other persons having proceeds of prize in their hands, to bring the same into court, until all claims respecting the prize are definitively settled. (Ib.) And the remedy is not confined to the stipulation taken in the cause; but the prize proceeds will be followed, in whose hands soever they may be, unless they have been purchased bona fide, and Wheat. 2.

without notice of the claim. (Per Buller, J., 3 T. R., 323; Per Grose, J., 5 East, 22; The Pomona, 1 Dodson, 25.) This subject, indeed, has been already treated of in an early part of the present note, when we were considering the subject of prize jurisdiction; and to that part the reader is respectfully referred for further information. A few additional particulars respecting prize-agents, &c., may, however, not be without use.

It is no discharge of a prize-agent, that he has paid over to his principal the prize proceeds, after full notice of a libel pending for restitution of the property (Hill v. Ross, 3 Dall., 331); *nor to a marshal, that he has distributed prize proceeds pending an appeal, or where an appeal is wrongfully denied. (Penhallow v. Doane, 3 Dall., 54.) But an agent is only liable for the prize proceeds which have come to his own hands, and not for the proceeds which have come to the hands of his co-agents. (Penhallow v. Doane, 3 Dall., 54.)

Where the prize court has decreed distribution, and allotted the shares, and required the prize-agent to make payment of the proceeds accordingly, if he refuses to obey the order, the court may proceed in personam (Per Lord Loughborough, Home v. Camden, 1 H. Bl., 474, 524); and in such case it will decree interest to be paid by the agent. And, in general, the prize court may compel prize-agents or others, having prize proceeds in their hands, to pay interest on the proceeds, where a proper case is laid before it; for such proceeding is a mere incident to the prize jurisdiction. (The Louis, 5 Rob., 46; Willis v. Commissioners, &c., 5 East, 22; The Pomona, 1 Dodson, 25.) And it is no objection that there has been a previous decree for interest against the captors personally. (The Polly, 5 Rob., 147, note; Willis v. Commissioners, &c., 5 East, 22.) Interest is not usually allowed against a prize-agent, unless it has been actually made by him, or there has been an unjustifiable delay in payment. But it seems that a prize-agent has no right to detain property condemned, and in his hands for distribution, to answer demands arising, or which may arise, against the ship for other unjustifiable captures. (The Printz Henrick Von Preussen, 6 Rob., 95.) And interest is not usually allowed against a commissioner for appraisement and sale, or a marshal after sale, unless in cases of a fraudulent detainer or gross delay. (The Ereter, 1 Rob., 173; The Princessa, 3 Rob., 31; Willis v. Commissioners, &c., 5 East, 22.)

This note must now be brought to a conclusion, although some of the topics discussed are far from being exhausted. To some, perhaps, an apology may be necessary for the length to which it has already extended. When, however, it is considered that *no treatise exists in print, containing even a summary view of prize practice, any attempt, however humble, to collect and arrange what is so little methodized, and so little known, may be entitled to indulgence, or, at least, escape the severity of criticism.

[NOTE II.]

PRESIDENT'S INSTRUCTIONS TO PRIVATE ARMED VESSELS.

1. The tenor of your commission under the act of Congress, entitled, "an act concerning letters of marque, prizes and prize goods," a copy of which is hereto annexed, will be kept constantly in your view. The high seas, referred to in your commission, you will understand generally, to refer to low water-mark; but with the exception of the space within one league, or three miles, from the shore of countries at peace both with Great Britain and the United States. You may nevertheless execute your commission within that distance of the shore of a nation at war with Great Britain, and even on the waters within the jurisdiction of such nation, if permitted so to do.

2. You are to pay the strictest regard to the rights of neutral powers, and the usages of civilized nations; and in all your proceedings towards neutral vessels, you are to give them as little molestation or interruption as will consist with the right of ascertaining their neutral character, and of detaining and bringing them in for regular adjudication, in the proper cases. You are particularly to avoid even the appearance of using force or seduction, with a view to deprive such vessels of their crews or of their passengers, other than persons in the military service of the enemy.

*3. Towards enemy vessels and their [*81 crews, you are to proceed in exercising the rights of war, with all the justice and humanity which characterize the nation of which you are members.

4. The master and one or more of the principal persons belonging to the captured vessels, are to be sent, as soon after the capture as may be, to the judge or judges of the proper court in the United States, to be examined upon oath, touching the interest or property of the captured vessel and her lading; and at the same time, are to be delivered to the judge or judges all passes, charter-parties, bills of lading, invoices, letters and other documents, and writings found on board; the said papers to be proved by the affidavit of the commander of the capturing vessel, or some other person present at the capture, to be produced as they were received, without fraud, addition, subduction or embezzlement.

By the command of the President of the United States.

JAMES MONROE, Secretary of State.

Were there on board any other, and what arms and ammunition, and when and where were they put on board, and by whom, *or by what authority, or for what purpose or destination, and on whose account were they put on board? [*87]

REPORTS OF THE DECISIONS
OF THE
Supreme Court of the United States.
FEBRUARY TERM, 1818.

JACKSON, Ex DEM. THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK,
v.
CLARKE.

G. C., born in the colony of New York, went to England in 1738, where he resided until his decease; and being seized of lands in New York, he, on the 3th of November, 1776, in England, devised the same to the defendant and E. C., as tenants in common, and died so seized on the 10th December, 1776. The defendant and E. C. having entered, and becoming possessed, E. C., on the 3^d December, 1791, bargained and sold to the defendant all his interest. The defendant and E. C. were both born in England long before the revolution. On the 22^d March, 1791, the legislature of New York passed an act to enable the defendant to purchase lands, and to hold all other lands which he might then be entitled to within the state, by purchase or descent, in fee-simple, and to sell and dispose of the same in the same manner as any natural born citizen might do. The treaty between the United States and Great Britain of 1794 contains the following provision: "Article 9th. It is agreed that British subjects who now hold lands in the territories of the United States, and American citizens who now hold lands in the dominions of His Majesty, shall continue to hold them according to the nature and tenure of their respective estates and titles therein; and may grant, sell, or devise the same to whom they please, in like manner as if they were natives, and that neither they nor their heirs or assigns shall, so far as respects the said lands and the legal remedies incident thereto, be considered as aliens." The defendant, at the time of the action brought, still continued to be a British subject. Held, that he was entitled to hold the lands so devised to him by G. C. and transferred to him by E. C.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of New York.

This was an action of ejectment commenced in the Supreme Court of the state of New York, and removed thence into the Circuit Court of the United States, for the New York district, where, in September, 1815, a trial was had, and a special verdict found, in the words following, to wit:

At which day in this same court, at the city of New York, in the New York district, came the parties aforesaid, by their attorneys aforesaid, and the jurors aforesaid being called also come, who, to say the truth of the above contents, being elected, tried and sworn, say, upon their oath, that long before the above-mentioned time when the trespass and ejectment above mentioned are supposed to have been committed, namely, on the tenth day of April, 1706, Anne, Queen of England, by letters patent under the great seal of the then colony of New York, did grant unto Sampson Broughton, and divers other persons in the said letters patent named, and their heirs, a certain tract of land, situate in the then colony, now state of New York, to have and to hold the same to them, their heirs and assigns, forever, as tenants in common, and *not as joint tenants. And that the lands [*3 and tenements, with their appurtenances specified in the foregoing declaration of the said James Jackson, were part and parcel of the said tract of land granted, as aforesaid, by the said letters patent. And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, further say, that the said Sampson Broughton, and the said other persons to whom the said tract of land was granted as aforesaid by the said letters patent, being so seized in fee-simple, and possessed of the said tract of land by virtue of the said letters patent, did afterwards, to wit, on the twelfth day of April, in the year last aforesaid, by good and sufficient conveyance and assurance in the law, for a valuable consideration, grant, bargain, sell, and convey unto George Clarke, now deceased (who was formerly Lieutenant-Governor of the said colony, and who was then a subject of England, and who remained so until the time of his death), and to his heirs, one equal undivided ninth part of the said tract of land granted as aforesaid, in and by the said letters patent, to have and to hold to him, his heirs and assigns, forever. And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, further say, that partition of the said tract of land mentioned in the said letters patent was afterwards, to wit, in the year last aforesaid, made in due form of law, between the last aforesaid George Clarke and the other proprietors of the said tract of land mentioned and granted in and by the said letters patent. And that by virtue of the said partition, the last aforesaid George Clarke became, and was sole seized in fee-simple, and possessed of the lands and tenements, with the appurtenances specified in the said declaration of the said James Jackson, *and continued to be so seized and pos- [4 sessed thereof, until the time of his death. And that the last aforesaid George Clarke died so seized and possessed, in the year 1759. And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, further say, that George Clarke, who was late secretary of the colony of New York, was the eldest son, and heir at law of the before-mentioned George Clarke, formerly Lieutenant-Governor as aforesaid. And that upon the death of the said George Clarke, formerly Lieutenant-Governor as aforesaid, the said George Clarke, late secretary as aforesaid, as son and heir aforesaid, entered upon, and was seized in fee-simple, and possessed the lands and tenements, with the appurtenances, specified in the said declaration of the said James Jackson. And being so seized and possessed, did afterwards, to wit, on the thirtieth day of November, 1776, at Hyde, in the county palatine of Chester, in the kingdom of Great Britain, make and publish, in due form of law to pass real estate, his last will and testament, and did thereby devise unto his grand nephews, the said George Clarke, the defendant in the said declaration named, and Edward Clarke, and to their heirs and assigns, as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants, the lands and tenements in the said declaration specified with the appurtenances. And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, further say, that the said George Clarke, late secretary as aforesaid, afterwards, to wit, on the tenth day of December, 1776, at Hyde aforesaid, in the said county palatine of Chester, in the said kingdom of Great Britain, died so seized and possessed as aforesaid, and without having altered or revoked his 5] said last will and testament. And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, further say, that upon the death of the said George Clarke, late secretary as aforesaid, the said George Clarke, the said defendant, and the said Edward Clarke, claiming under the said last will and testament, entered upon and became possessed of the said lands and tenements, with the appurtenances, in the said declaration specified. And the said George Clarke, the said defendant, and the said Edward Clarke, being actually possessed of the said lands and tenements, with the appurtenances, in the said declaration specified, as under the said last will and testament, the said Edward Clark did afterwards, to wit, on the twenty-third day of December, 1791, by a deed of bargain and sale, duly executed, grant, bargain and sell, for a valuable consideration, to the said George Clarke, the said defendant, and his heirs, one equal moiety of the said lands and tenements, with the appurtenances, in the said declaration specified, and all the estate and interest of the said Edward Clarke, in and to the said lands and tenements last aforesaid, with the appurtenances, to have and to hold the same to the said George Clarke, the said defendant, his heirs and assigns; by reason whereof the said George Clarke, the said defendant, entered upon, and became, and was actually possessed of, the said lands and tenements, with the appurtenances, in the said declaration specified, claiming to be seized thereof in fee-simple, and so continued until the entry of the people of the state of New York, hereafter mentioned. And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, further say, that the 6] said George Clarke, *late secretary as aforesaid, was born in the city of New York, in the late colony, now state of New York, and that in the year 1738 he went to that part of Great Britain called England, and thenceforth continued to live and reside there on his family estate, until and at the time when he made and published his said last will and testament, and ever after, and until and at the time of his death. And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, further say, that on the fourth day of July, in the year 1776, the late colony of New York, together with the other colonies of Great Britain in North America, now called the United States of America, declared themselves free and independent states, and that from that day to the first day of September, in the year 1783, the said United States and the citizens thereof, were at open and public war with the King of Great Britain and his subjects. And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, further say, that the said George Clarke, the said defendant, was born in England on the twenty-eighth day of April, in the year 1768. And that the said Edward Clarke was born in England on the twenty-eighth day of November, in the year of our Lord 1770. And that the said George Clarke, the said defendant, and the said Edward Clarke, were born British subjects.

And the jurors aforesaid, on their oath aforesaid, further say, that the said George Clarke, late secretary as aforesaid, died without issue, and that at the time of his death one George Hyde Clarke was his nephew; and that the said George Hyde Clarke, if he is capable of inheriting the real estate of the said *George [*7 Clarke, late secretary as aforesaid, within the state of New York, is the heir at law of the said George Clarke, late secretary as aforesaid; and that the said George Hyde Clarke was born in Great Britain before the fourth day of July, in the year 1776, and hath ever since resided, and still doth reside, in Great Britain, and is still living; and that no other person than the said George Hyde Clarke is, or can be, the heir at law of the said George Clarke, late secretary as aforesaid; and that the said George Hyde Clarke is capable of inheriting the real estate of the said George Clarke, late secretary as aforesaid, within the state of New York, unless he is incapable of inheriting such real estate, by reason of his having been born, and having resided in Great Britain, as aforesaid. And the jurors aforesaid, on their oath aforesaid, further say, that on the eighth day of February, in the year 1791, the said George Clarke, the said defendant, caused to be presented to the legislature of the state of New York, a petition, in the words following, to wit:

To the honorable, the Senate and the Assembly of the state of New York, in legislature convened: The petition of George Clarke humbly sheweth, that your petitioner was born in England, and is great grandson of George Clarke, formerly Lieutenant-Governor of New York; that he resided in the city of New York for about a year preceding the month of October last, with intention, at the end of two years, to have been naturalized under the statute of the United States; that he was unexpectedly called abroad on important business, but expects to return in the course of the *ensuing summer; and as his naturalization must now be unavoidably suspended, to the great embarrassment of his affairs, your petitioner humbly prays that his name may be inserted in the bill now before the honorable, the legislature, to grant a similar privilege of holding lands within this state, notwithstanding the want of naturalization, and your petitioner shall ever pray, &c. GEORGE CLARKE,

By GOLDSB. BANYAR, and JAS. DUANE, his attorneys.

And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, further say, that on the twenty-second day of March, in the year 1791, an act was passed by the legislature of the state of New York, in the words following, to wit: "An act to enable Francois Christophe Mantel, and the several other persons therein named, to purchase and hold real estates within this state. Be it enacted by the people of the state of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, that it shall and may be lawful for Francois Christophe Mantel, Samuel Clows, Jun., Samuel Richardet, William Robert O'Hara, Eric Glad, George Turnbull, Thomas Mounsey, and Jan Barnhard, respectively, to purchase lands, tenements and hereditaments within this state, and to have and to hold the same to them respectively, and their respective heirs and assigns, forever, as fully to all intents and purposes as any natural born citizen may or can do, any law, usage or custom to the contrary notwithstanding. And be it further enacted by the [*] authority aforesaid, that it *shall and may be lawful for George Clarke, who is great grandson of George Clarke, formerly Lieutenant-Governor of New York, to purchase any lands, tenements or hereditaments within this state, and to have and to hold the same, and all other lands, tenements and hereditaments which he may now be entitled to within this state, by purchase or descent, to him, the said George Clarke first above named, his heirs and assigns, to his and their own proper use and behoof forever, and to sell and dispose of the same, or any part thereof, as fully, to all intents and purposes, as any natural born citizen may or can do, any law, usage or custom to the contrary notwithstanding." And the jurors aforesaid, on their oath aforesaid, further say, that the said George Clarke, the said defendant, and the said George Clarke, great grandson of George Clarke, formerly Lieutenant-Governor of New York, mentioned in the said act, is one and the same person. And the jurors aforesaid, on their oath aforesaid, further say, that on the first day of May, in the year 1810, the said George Clarke, the said defendant, was in the actual possession and occupation of the said lands and tenements, in the said declaration specified, with the appurtenances, and that on the day and year last aforesaid, the said people of the state of New York, lessors of the said James Jackson, entered into the said tenements, with the appurtenances, and from thence put out and removed the last aforesaid George Clarke, and were seized thereof as the law requires; and being so seized thereof, the said people, on the day and year last aforesaid, demised to the said James Jackson the *tenements aforesaid, with the appurtenances, to have and to hold to the said James Jackson, and his assigns, from the said first day of May then last past, until the full end and term of twenty-one years from thence next ensuing, and fully to be complete and ended, in the manner in which the said demise is set forth in the said declaration of the said James Jackson. By virtue of which said demise, the said James Jackson entered into the said lands and tenements, with the appurtenances, and was thereof possessed; and he being so possessed thereof, the said George Clarke, the said defendant, afterwards, to wit, on the tenth day of May, in the year last aforesaid, with force and arms, &c., entered into the said tenements, with the appurtenances, which had been demised to the said James Jackson as aforesaid, and ejected, expelled and amoved the said James Jackson from his said possession, as the said James Jackson hath above complained against the last aforesaid George Clarke.

And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, further say, that at the time of the commencement of this action, the tenements aforesaid, in the said declaration specified, were, and ever since have been, and yet are, of a value exceeding the sum of five hundred dollars, exclusive of all costs and expenses. And the jurors aforesaid, on their oath aforesaid, further say, that the said James Jackson, at the time of the commencement of this action, was, and yet is a citizen of the state of New York, in the United States of America. And that at the time of the commencement of this action, the said George Clarke, the said defendant, in the said declaration named, *was and yet is a [*11 subject of the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. But whether upon the whole matter aforesaid, by the jurors aforesaid, in manner aforesaid found, the said George Clarke, the said defendant, is guilty of the trespass and ejectment above mentioned, the said jurors are entirely ignorant, and pray the advice of the court thereon. And if it shall appear to this court that the last aforesaid George Clarke, in construction of law, is guilty of the trespass and ejectment above mentioned, then the said jurors say upon their oath that the last aforesaid George Clarke is guilty of the trespass and ejectment in the said declaration of the said James Jackson mentioned, in manner and form as the said James Jackson hath above in his said declaration complained. And they assess the damages which the said James Jackson hath sustained by reason of the said trespass and ejectment, besides his costs and charges by him about his suit in this behalf expended, at six cents, and for his said costs and charges at six cents. And if it shall appear to the court, that the last aforesaid George Clarke is not guilty of the said trespass and ejectment, then the said jurors say upon their oath that the last aforesaid George Clarke is not guilty thereof, in manner and form as he hath above in his plea alleged.

On the foregoing special verdict, judgment was rendered for the defendant, George Clarke, by the Circuit Court, to reverse which, this writ of error was brought.

Mr. Champlin, for the plaintiff in error, made the following points, and cited the authorities in the margin: *1. That Secretary [*12 George Clarke, at the time of his death, was an alien enemy, and there being at that time no statute of wills in force in the state of New York, the people of the state, at his death, became seized of the premises.¹ 2. That Secretary George Clarke, being an alien enemy, had no power to make a valid will, or alien his estate in any manner whatever.² 3. His will being void, and George Hyde Clarke being an alien enemy, took nothing by descent. 4. That, after the death of Secretary George Clarke, there was no person competent to take the premises by inheritance or devise, whereby the people of the state of New York, at his death, became ipso facto possessed thereof, without office found.

Mr. D. B. Ogden, contra, was stopped by the court.

MARSHALL, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court, that every question arising in the cause had been settled by former decisions.

*Judgment affirmed with costs.*³

[PRIZE.]

THE FRIENDSCHAFT.

WINN ET AL., Claimants.

Informal and imperfect proceedings in the District Court corrected and explained in the Circuit Court.

A bill of lading, consigning the goods to a neutral, but unaccompanied by an invoice or letter of advice, is not sufficient evidence to entitle the claimant to restitution; but is sufficient to lay a foundation for the introduction of further proof.

The fact of invoices and letters of advice not being found on board, may induce a suspicion that papers have been spoliated. But even if it were proved that an enemy master, carrying a cargo chiefly hostile, had thrown papers overboard, a neutral claimant, to whom no fraud is imputable, ought not thereby to be precluded from further proof.

*The native character does not revert, by a [*15] mere return to his native country, of a merchant, who is domiciled in a neutral country at the time of capture; who afterwards leaves his commercial establishment in the neutral country to be conducted by his clerks in his absence; who visits his native country merely on mercantile business, and intends to return to his adopted country. Under these circumstances, the neutral domicile still continues.

British subjects resident in Portugal (though entitled to great privileges), do not retain their native character, but acquire that of the country where they reside and carry on their trade.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court for the District of North Carolina.

The brig Friendschaft was captured on a voyage from London to Lisbon, by the privateer Herald, and brought into Cape Fear, in North Carolina, where the vessel and cargo were libeled, in July, 1814, as prize of war. The commercial agent of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent of Portugal, interposed a claim to several packages, parts of the said cargo, on behalf of the respective owners, whom he averred to be Portuguese subjects and merchants residing in Portugal. The cargo consisted of many different shipments. Most of them were accompanied with bills of lading, directing a delivery to shipper or order. Of these a few were specially indorsed. Generally, however, they were without indorsements, or with blank indorsements only. A few shipments were accompanied with bills of lading, deliverable to persons in Lisbon, specially named in the bills.

Very few were accompanied with letters or invoices. These, it was alleged in the claim, had probably been sent by the regular packet.

In August, 1814, the District Court pronounced its *sentence, condemning as [*16] prize of war "all that part of the cargo for which no claim had been put in," and "all

3.—In the case of M'Ilvaine v. Coxe's lessee (4 Cranch, 209), the court determined that a person born in the colony of New Jersey, before the declaration of independence, and residing there until 1777, but who then joined the British army, and ever since adhered to the British government, has a right to take lands by descent in the state of New Jersey. But in Dawson's lessee v. Godfrey* (4 Cranch, 321), it was held that a person born in England before the declaration of independence, and who always resided there, and never was in the United States, could not take lands in Maryland by descent.

And in the case of Smith v. The State of Maryland (4 Cranch, 286), it was determined that by the acts of Maryland, 1780, ch. 45 and 49, the equitable interests of British subjects in lands were confiscated, and vested in the state, without office found, prior to the treaty of peace of 1783, so that the British cestui que trust was not protected by the stipulation in that treaty, against future confiscations, nor by the stipulation in the 9th article of the treaty of 1794, securing to British subjects, who then held lands in this country, the right to continue to hold them.

In the Supreme Court of New York it has been held that where a married woman was a subject of Great Britain before the revolution, and always continued such, but her husband resided in this country both before and after that period, she was entitled to dower out of those lands of which he was seized before the revolution, but not of those of which he was subsequently seized. *Kelly v. rison, 2 Johns. Cas., 29. The same court has also determined, that where a British subject died seized of lands in the state in 1752, leaving daughters in England, who married British subjects, and neither they nor their wives were citizens of the United States; even if the marriages were subsequent to the revolution, such marriages would not impair the rights of the wives, nor prevent the full enjoyment of the property according to the laws of the marriage state, especially after the provision in the 9th article of the treaty of 1794. The court seemed also to think that where the title to land in the state was acquired by a British subject prior to the revolution, the right of such British subject to transmit the same by descent, to an heir in case at the time of the revolution, continued unaltered and unimpaired; the case of a revolution or division of an empire being an exception to the general rule of law, that an alien cannot take by descent. Jackson v. Lunn, 3 Johns. Cas. 109. See also Jackson v. Wright, 4 Johns. R. 75. The treaty of 1794 relates only to lands then *held by British subjects, [*14] and not to any after-acquired lands. Jackson v. Decker, 11 Johns R. 418, 422.

In the case of Fairfax's devisee v. Hunter's lessee, 7 Cranch, 603, and ante Vol. I., p. 304, it was adjudged, 1st. That an alien enemy may take by purchase, though not by descent; and that, whether the purchase be by grant or by devise. 2d. That the title thus acquired by an alien enemy is not divested until office found. 3d. That whether the treaty of peace of 1783, declaring that no future confiscations should be made, protects from forfeiture, under the municipal laws respecting alienage, lands held by British subjects at the time of its ratification, or not, yet that the 9th article of the treaty of 1794 completely protected the title of a British devisee, whose estate had not been previously divested by an inquest of office, or some equivalent proceeding.

that part of the cargo which was shipped, as evidenced by bills of lading, either without indorsement or with blank indorsements, and not accompanied by letter or invoice, viz. :

And that part appearing by the bill of lading to consist of forty bales of goods shipped by Moreira, Vieira, and Machado. Further proof was ordered with respect to the residue of the cargo and the vessel.

From this sentence the claimants appealed to the Circuit Court. That court, in May, 1815, dismissed so much of the appeal as respected the brig, and that part of the cargo in respect to which further proof was ordered, as having been improvidently allowed before a final sentence, and affirmed the residue of the decree, except in regard to the forty bales shipped by Moreira, Vieira, and Machado, with respect to which further proof was directed, to establish the right of Francis Jose Moreira to restitution of one-third part thereof.

In April, 1816, further proof was exhibited to the District Court, in support of the claim for the parts of the cargo comprehended in the bills of lading numbered 108, 109, 141, 122, 118, which bills being deliverable to merchants residing in Lisbon, whose names were expressed therein, were not indorsed. The further proof was deemed sufficient, and restitution was ordered. The vessel and the residue of the cargo were condemned as prize of war.

From so much of this sentence as awarded 17*] restitution, *the captors appealed; and in May, 1816, the Circuit Court decreed as follows: "This court being of opinion that the former sentence of the District Court, affirmed by the sentence of this court, rendered in May term, in the year 1815, having been left imperfect by omitting to recite the particular claims intended to be involved in the condemnation pronounced in the District Court in terms of general description; and being also of opinion that the words 'all that part of the cargo which was shipped as evidenced, by bills of lading, either without indorsement or with blank indorsements, and not accompanied with letter or invoice,' could be intended for those bills only which were to shipper or order, and not to those addressed to consignee named in the bill itself, is of opinion that there is no error in the sentence of the District Court, and doth affirm the same."

From this decree the captors appealed to this court. On the interposition of this appeal, the Circuit Court ordered that Joseph Winn, a British-born subject, resident in Portugal, in whose behalf a claim was filed to No. 118, should be permitted to offer further proof to the Supreme Court, to be admitted or rejected by that court.

Mr. Wheaton, for the appellants and captors. 1. The decrees of the District Court, of August, 1814, and of the Circuit Court, of May, 1815, were final and conclusive, and ought to have precluded the District Court from subsequently allowing further proof as to these five claims. The terms of general description, which are 18*] *used by the judge of the District Court, are equivalent to a particular designation of the claims intended to be condemned. "All that part of the cargo which was shipped as evidenced by bills of lading, either without indorsement or with blank indorsements, and not accompanied with letter or invoice," is as effectually condemned by the sentence as if the particular portions of the cargo thus documented had been specifically enumerated. The portions now claimed were shipped as evidenced by bills of lading, either without indorsement or with blank indorsements, and not accompanied with letter or invoice. Consequently, they were included in the condemnation by the District Court, which became final and conclusive upon the parties, by the decree of the Circuit Court rendered at May term, 1815, affirming that of the District Court, and from which no appeal was entered. The subsequent proceedings, by which the District Court admitted the claimants to further proof, were, therefore, coram non judice, and utterly null and void. These branches of the cause were completely extinct, and could not be revived in any court. 2. And can this court have the least doubt of the justice and legality of this decree of the District Court, as thus understood and explained? Is it possible that it is come to this, that in a court of prize, a mere bill of lading to A. B. or assigns, unsupported by any other documentary evidence found on board, or by the oath of the master, shall be regarded as sufficient, even to entitle the party to further proof? If goods shipped in the enemy's country can pass *the seas under so thin a [*19 veil as this, the defects of which may afterwards be supplied by fabricated proofs, what security is there for belligerent rights? To what cause are we to attribute a transaction so unusual and irregular in commerce, but to the desire of the British shippers and owners to retain in their own hands the double power of stopping the goods in transitu and of enabling the consignees to claim them in the prize court in case of capture? If this practice be tolerated by the court, the enemy shipper need resort to no complicated machinery of fraud in order to cover his property. He need do no more than put on board a bill of lading, unaccompanied by any invoice of the goods, or letter of advice showing in whom the property vests. In case of capture, nothing more will be necessary than to enter a claim in the name of the neutral consignee, and to demand an order for further proof, and under that order to ransack the great officina fraudis to find the instruments of forgery and perjury; the aid of which will not become necessary, in case the shipment, thus made, escapes the vigilance and activity of the belligerent cruisers. Should they thus escape, the goods will be sold on account of the enemy shipper, and the proceeds of the sale will be remitted to him again by the same process; and thus the whole of the enemy's trade may be effectually screened from the perils of war. A bill of lading is an instrument too easily fabricated to permit a court of prize to consider it alone as furnishing any proof (even presumptive) of property in the consignee. Whether the goods had been previously ordered by the Portuguese *consignee, or sent by [*20 the British shipper for sale on his own account, they would equally have been accompanied by the same document, which is equivalent to no evidence whatever of proprietary interest found on board. Unless some such evidence be found on board, or a foundation be laid by the preparatory examinations of the captured crew, to let the claimants into further proof, the necessary simplicity of the prize proceedings forbids a resort to extraneous testimony: and, as that originally before the court is insufficient to entitle the party to restitution, condemnation must ensue. Not only are the bills of lading unaccompanied by invoices and letters of advice, but they do not express the shipment to be "for account and risk" of the consignees; and the freight is payable in London, and, of course, by the consignors. These circumstances distinguish this case from all those cases in which it has been determined (under the municipal law) that a bill of lading, expressing the shipment to be for account and risk of the consignee or his assigns, vests the property in him, subject only to the right of stoppage in transitu; and the same circumstances liken it to those where the obligation on the part of the consignor to pay the freight was held to authorize him to bring an action against the carrier master for the goods, notwithstanding the form of the bill of lading.¹ It is wholly incredible that the letters and invoices which ought to have accompanied these shipments were sent by the Lisbon packet (as suggested), since, [21*] *though duplicates of such papers may be sent, and frequently are sent, by conveyances other than that of the ship in which the goods are transported, yet it is unusual and mercantilely irregular not to send the originals with the goods. The invoices are, by the revenue laws of most, if not all countries, indispensably necessary to enter the goods at the custom-house, avoiding the inconvenience of unpacking and valuing them. These papers are required by the law of nations, and the prize code of every country, to accompany the bill of lading, in order to fortify and confirm it. The absence of them does not, indeed, in all cases, furnish a substantive ground of condemnation, and exclude the party from further proof. But in order to avoid this consequence there must be some favorable presumption raised by the circumstances of the case, and the nature of the documentary evidence found on board. This presumption cannot exist in the case of a shipment in the enemy's country, of goods, the growth or manufacture of that country, under a bill of lading, unsupported by the oath of the master, and unaccompanied by any invoice, letter of advice, or other document whatever. The privilege of further proof is imparted under the sound discretion of the court, where foundation is laid for it, by the papers found on board, and the depositions of the captured persons. Neither the documentary evidence nor the examinations in preparatorio afford any foundation for it in the present case; since they do not furnish any, the slightest reason for believing, that it belongs as claimed. [22*] The court would be *opening a wide door for fraud were it to extend the privilege of further proof in such a case, which is neither one of honest ignorance or mistake. It is impossible that the parties should have been ignorant of what both the usage of trade and the practice of prize courts require. It is impossible that they should have omitted by mistake what could not have been omitted but by design. The ancient French prize law, and the prize regulations of many other countries, do absolutely exclude further proof, and condemn, or restore, upon the original evidence only. If, by the more mitigated practice which this court has adopted, further proof be sometimes allowed, it is not as of strict right, but of equitable indulgence, where the circumstances of the case lay a foundation for it, and the claimants do not forfeit the privilege by their own misconduct. 3. No additional further proof ought to be admitted in this court, under the special orders of the Circuit Court, in the claim of Mr. Winn, giving him liberty to produce still further proof (in addition to the further proof exhibited to the District Court) in this court, to be admitted or rejected, at the discretion of the court. It is a settled principle of practice that further proof cannot be introduced in this court, unless, under the circumstances of the case, it ought to have been ordered in the court below. Such is the limitation to the admission of further proof in the appellate tribunal, which has been established by the lords of appeal in England and adopted by this court. If, as has been contended, further proof ought not to *have been admitted in the District Court, [*23 the consequence follows that it ought not to be admitted here. But the lapse of time alone ought to preclude the claimants from this indulgence. They were fully apprised of the nature of the proof which their case required: they had it in their power to produce it; and, after two years have elapsed, the necessity of suppressing the frauds which might be consequent upon such excess of indulgence, demands that the court should reject the additional further proof now offered by them.² Mr. Winn's claim ought to be rejected, because, supposing his proprietary interest to be made out ever so clearly, he is a British-born subject, who offers a claim upon the ground of his being a resident merchant of Portugal, although at the time of the first adjudication he was not domiciled in that country.

The claimant makes an affidavit at London, in June, 1815, in which he describes himself as "of the city of Lisbon, in Portugal, now in London on mercantile business, swears to the property in himself, and that at the time of the shipment and capture he was a domiciled subject of Portugal, and had resided in Lisbon for several years preceding the capture, and until the 12th of June, 1814," when he left Lisbon for Bourdeaux, and "has since arrived" (without saying when) "in this city on mercantile business;" that he still is a domiciled subject of Portugal, &c. "The native character easily reverts," says Sir W. Scott,³ and it is so, not merely because *he says it, but from [*24 the very nature of things, and the gravitating tendency (if the expression may be allowed) which every person has towards his native country. Here Mr. Winn was returning to his native country, shortly after the capture, and we may safely conclude, arrived there long before the first adjudication. There he continued until long after the peace, without resuming his acquired domicile in Portugal; and more than a year afterwards, we find him still resident in his native country. He was not in transitu to regain his neutral character, like Mr. Pinto in the case of The Nereide;¹ but he was in transitu to regain his native hostile character. He did regain it, and became a redintegrated British subject. That the party must be in a capacity to claim at the time of adjudication, as well as entitled to restitution at the time of sailing and capture, is an elementary principle which lays at the very foundation of the law of prize. It is alluded to by Sir W. Scott in a leading case on this subject;² it is evinced by the anciently established formula of the test affidavit, and sentence of condemnation, both of which point to the national character of the party at the time of adjudication, as an essential ingredient in determining the fate of his claim. Mr. Winn had no persona standi in judicio at the time of the first adjudication; and unless he has been rehabilitated by the subsequent intervention of peace, and restored to his capacity to claim by a species of the jus postliminii, his native character still remains fixed upon him, and his property must be condemned by relation back to the time of the first adjudication, *to which period everything must be referred. 5. But even the Portuguese domicile of Mr. Winn will not avail to avert the condemnation of his property, because his native character is preserved, notwithstanding his residence and trade in Portugal. As the native domicile easily reverts, so also, it may with truth be affirmed that it is with difficulty shaken off. Every native subject of a belligerent power is, prima facie, an enemy of the other belligerent. To repel this presumption, he must show, not merely that he has acquired a personal domicile in a neutral country, but that, under all the circumstances of the case, he is unaffected with the hostile character of his native domicile. The political relations between Great Britain and Portugal completely recognize the privileged national character of British subjects in Portugal, which is preserved to them, in a manner analogous to that of European merchants in the East, who are held to take their national character from the factory to which they are attached, and from the European government under whose protection they carry on their trade.³ Thus, also, Sir W. Scott states, in The Henrick and Maria,⁴ that British subjects resident in Portugal retain their native national character in spite of their Portuguese domicile, even in the estimation of the enemy himself (France), and that they exercise an active jurisdiction over their own countrymen settled there. This peculiar immiscible character of British subjects in Portugal is strengthened 26*] *by the circumstance of that country having been, from the earliest periods of her national existence, the ally of Great Britain; and something more than a mere common ally, as Sir W. Scott observes, in The Flad Oyen.⁵ The case of The Danaos, cited in a note to The Nuyade.⁶ in which the lords of appeal allowed a British-born subject resident in the English factory at Libson, the benefit of a Portuguese character, so far as to legalize his trade with Holland, then at war with England, but not with Portugal, must be considered as a departure from principle, and imputed to some motive of national or commercial policy, operating on the lords at the time. Certain it is, that the reasons on which Sir W. Scott grounds the opinion expressed by him, are entitled to much more weight than is the mere authority of the lords, unsupported by any reasons whatever. This court, which is the supreme appellate prize tribunal of this country, will scrutinize carefully all the precedents settled in the British prize courts (since the United States ceased to be a portion of the British empire), and will regard rather the reason than the authority on which they are founded. Trace the treaties between Great Britain and Portugal, and it will be found that they impress something like a provincial dependence on Portugal, and an independent character on British subjects resident in that country. It is to the lights of history that we must resort to account for compacts so singularly unequal. Before the subjugation of Portugal by Spain, the ancient *Portu- [*27 guese kings granted special immunities to English merchants settled in their dominions. The want of capital in a poor and comparatively barbarous country made it necessary to encourage the establishment of foreign merchants in factories, which were essential to their protection, on account of the difference of language, manners, religion, and laws, almost (if not quite) as great as between Christendom and the countries of the East.⁷ On the restoration of the monarchy by the house of Braganza, in 1640, John IV. was supported by Charles I., of England, who was the first prince that acknowledged the new Portuguese monarch, and entered into a treaty with him. Under the English commonwealth, this treaty was renewed by Oliver Cromwell, whose energy in maintaining the foreign influence and commercial interests of his country is so well known. Charles II. married the Infanta of Portugal, confirmed all former treaties, and made a new and perpetual one with Alfonso VI. Under his mediation and guarantee, Spain acknowledged the independence of Portugal; which Great Britain has since constantly maintained, by succoring Portugal against her enemies. In return for a friendship so ancient, so unalterable, and so beneficial, Portugal has lavished upon the subjects of Great Britain the most precious commercial privileges; and for them has even relaxed her commercial monopoly, and opened to them the sanctum sanctorum of her possessions in the two Indies. These privileges have been uniformly *revived and renewed in [*28 every successive treaty which has been formed between the two countries, and may be enumerated under the following heads: First. Prizes made by British subjects, from nations at peace with Portugal, may be carried into the Portuguese ports for adjudication, and condemned whilst lying there.⁸ If the ports of Portugal can be so far considered as British, as that British prizes may be carried into them, and condemned, surely they must be considered such in respect to British subjects residing and trading there. The rule of reciprocity or amicable retaliation may be extended to them (being enemies), though it may not be extended by the court to the subjects of Portugal (because they are friends), and the judicial department cannot reciprocate to, or retaliate on them the unjust proceedings of their nation. Second. Portugal is bound, by treaty, to deliver up British vessels captured and brought into her ports by the enemies of Great Britain, but her friends.¹ Third. British subjects resident in Portugal are exempt from the ordinary jurisdiction of the country; and are amenable only to the judge conservator appointed by themselves, who has cognizance of all civil causes in which they are concerned; and the ordinary authorities of the country cannot proceed against them in criminal cases, without a permission in writing from the judge conservator, except only where the offender is taken flagrante delicto.² Fourth. 29*] *The Portuguese courts of probate, or orphans' court, have no authority whatever in the distribution of the effect of British subjects deceased, in Portugal, but the same is referred to the judge conservator, under whose superintendence administrators are appointed by a majority of the British merchants resident in the place.³ Fifth. British subjects in Portugal have the privilege of being paid their debts due to them by Portuguese subjects, whose property may be seized by the inquisition, or the king's exchequer.⁴ Sixth. They are exempted from the operation of the fundamental law of the Portuguese monarchy, which has immemorially excluded every other religion from Portugal, except the Roman Catholic; and they are permitted to enjoy their own religious principles and worship as Protestants.⁵ Seventh. This favored nation are also exempted from all the monopolies, and other exclusive privileges, with which the internal and external commerce of Portugal and her colonies are cramped and restrained, and to which Portuguese subjects are exposed. The only exception to this immunity is the crown farm, for the exclusive sale of certain precious productions.⁶ The treaty of 1810, now subsisting, confirms and renews all the privileges and immunities granted by former treaties, or municipal regulations, except only the stipulation that free ships should make free goods. These privileges and immunities segregate British residents in *Portugal from the general society, and from the commercial, political, and ecclesiastical regulations of the country. They distinguish those residents from the other inhabitants, as much as the merchants of Christendom are distinguished from the natives in the oriental countries. The privileged character of Christians, established in those countries, depends as much upon the conventional law as does that of British subjects settled in Portugal. The treaties and capitulations between the powers of Christendom and the Porte secure to the subjects of the former, privileges not more extensive than those which are now enjoyed, and have been enjoyed from time immemorial by the British in Portugal.⁷ It is true, that by the treaty of 1810, art. 26, His Britannic Majesty renounces the right of establishing factories or corporations of merchants in the Portuguese dominions, but there is a proviso that this concession "shall not deprive the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, residing within the dominions of Portugal, of the full enjoyment, as individuals engaged in commerce, of any of those rights and privileges which they did or might possess, as members of incorporated commercial bodies; and, also, that the trade and commerce carried on by British subjects shall not be restricted, annoyed, or otherwise affected, by any favors within the dominions of Portugal;" and in the case of Mr. Fremeaux, the lords of appeal in England decided, that the claimant was to be considered as a Dutchman, because he carried on trade at Smyrna, under *the protection of the [*31 Dutch consul, although it was proved in that gentleman's case that there was no Dutch factory at Symrna, and that the Dutch merchants there are not incorporated.⁸

Mr. Gaston, for the respondents and claimants. 1. On the first point the claimants have to encounter a difficulty purely technical, which cannot pretend to a foundation in justice, and which, indeed, aims to prevent a decision upon the merits of the controversy. If this difficulty can neither be surmounted nor escaped without a violation of the established principles and rules of jurisprudence, the claimants must submit without repining. But it will be impossible for the friends to the repose of nations, and to the impartial administration of justice in the courts of belligerents, not to regret that the highest tribunal in our land should find itself so fettered with forms as to be unable to do what shall appear to them to be right; as to be compelled to condemn as prize of war what the inferior tribunals shall have restored (in their opinion justly) as neutral property. The captors' objection is founded on a literal exposition of the decree of August, 1814, inconsistent with its obvious meaning. However desirable it may be that precision should be used in drawing up the decrees of judicial tribunals, yet the infirmity of human nature, and the imperfection of human language, alike demand that these decisions should not be perverted by verbal criticism from their substantial import. No one can doubt the *meaning of the sentence of August, 1814. No one can hesitate to say that it designed not to condemn such parts of the cargo as were evidenced by bills of lading addressed to consignees, specially named in them. This design appears as distinctly as though it had been expressed in the most formal terms. The court exempts from condemnation, and reserves for further proof, all the cases of bills of lading deliverable to shipper or order, which are specially indorsed to consignees. A fortiori, it could not but exempt from condemnation those where the bills of lading are addressed to consignees specially named in the bills of lading. It is the order of the English shipper for the delivery of the goods to the Portuguese consignee that raises the doubt where resides the proprietary interest—whether in the shipper or in the consignee. And unquestionably the probability that such interest in the consignee is, at least, as strong where the consignment is original, and on the face of the bill of lading, as where it is made by an indorsement of the bill. The sentence of August, 1814, which is insisted on as condemning the property in question, could not have that effect until it was completed. A blank was purposely left for the insertion of the parts of the cargo intended to be condemned. Until this blank was filled up, or something done by the court equally definitive and precise, the sentence was necessarily imperfect, both in substance and in form. This imperfection continued as to the District Court until August term, 1816, and then the property in question was not only not condemned, but ordered to be restored. The affirmation of the sentence of August, 1814, by 33 the Circuit Court, was in general terms. It cannot, therefore, have any other effect than if the sentence affirmed had been repeated in totidem verbis. The sentence of condemnation, therefore, of the Circuit Court, of May, 1815, was incomplete; and remained so until November term, 1816, when in direct terms it was declared that it should not apply to the present claims. Whatever informalities or errors of proceeding may have been had below, yet as the property to which the claims apply is still in the custody of the law, and the whole case in relation to it is now before this court, all these errors and irregularities will be so corrected, as to make the final decision of the controversy, and disposition of the property, conform to the rights of the parties litigant. Whether the District Court, in August, 1814, did or did not condemn this part of the cargo; whether it did or did not decree that further proof should be heard in relation to it; yet if it ought not to have been condemned—if further proof ought to have been received in relation to it—this court will receive such further proof. 2. But, it is contended, that whatever might have been the meaning of the sentence of the District Court of August 1814, affirmed in the Circuit Court in May, 1815, it ought to have condemned the goods in question and not to have let in the claimants to further proof. And this position is founded on the assertion that the bills of lading, No. 108, 109, 141, 122 and 118, furnish no evidence whatever of proprietary interest in the consignees, and on the apprehension that the admission of further proof in cases so circumstanced might destroy all security for belliger- 34 ent rights. And, does a bill of lading furnish no evidence, not even presumptive, of proprietary interest in the consignee? It is understood, and such was the language of this court in the case of The St. Jozse Indiano,¹ that in general the rules of the prize court, as to the vesting of property, are the same with those of the common law. Now, “every authority which can be adduced, from the earliest period of time down to the present hour, agree, that at law, the property does pass as absolutely and as effectually (by a bill of lading) as if the goods had been actually delivered into the hands of the consignee.” “If, upon a bill of lading” (says Lord Hardwicke, in Snee v. Prescott),³ between merchants residing in different countries, the goods be shipped and consigned to the principal expressly in the body of the bill of lading, that vests the property in the consignee.” The right of the consignor to stop goods in transitu is not founded on any presumed property in the consignor, but necessarily supposes the property to be in the consignee; for, “it is a contradiction in terms to say a man has a right to stop his own goods in transitu.” It is a right founded wholly on equitable principles, “which owes its origin to courts of equity, and the question is not whether the property has vested under the bill of lading, for that is clear, but whether on the insolvency of the consignee, who has not paid for the goods, the consignor can countermand the consignment, *or, in other [35 words, devert the property which was vested in the consignee.”⁴ Unless, therefore a totally different rule, as to the vesting of property, is to be asserted in a court of prize from that which is established at law, a bill of lading absolutely vests the property in the consignee, and, of course, is the appropriate and definite evidence of his proprietary interest. But, it is said, these bills of lading do not express the shipment to be for the account and risk of the consignees, and state that the freight has been paid in London, and, “of course, by the consignors.” Surely it is not seriously contended that the omission to declare the shipment to be on account of the consignees, and the declaration that the freight has been paid in London, and, “of course, by the consignors,” could have been designed to secure to the consignors the right of stopping in transitu. This right is founded on principles of equity which give it a direct application to shipments made on account of the consignees, and which have no connection whatever with the legal consequences of the payment of freight. Let us see, however, what inferences may be fairly drawn from the peculiarities which are noticed in the bills of lading. They omit to state that the shipment is on account and risk of the consignees. Shall we thence infer that the shipment is on account and risk of the consignors? This is not the inference of the law. If the bill of lading vests the property in the consignee, he, of course, sustains the peril of the shipment, unless there be an agreement to the contrary. It would be a singular *absurdity, indeed, if the law, [36 upon the instrument, presumed that the consignee was the owner, and at the same time inferred that he did not bear the ordinary risks of ownership. Where the shipment is on account and at the risk of the consignor, and not of the consignee, there it may be proper to express the fact, because it is opposed to the legal presumption. But that an omission to state, what, without statement is presumed can be converted into an argument against the presumption, will be an instance of intellectual dexterity, rather fitted to surprise than to satisfy the inquirer after truth.
